I may say here in passing, that when you erected the Territory, you knew the habits of these people; you knew their ways of thinking; you knew their peculiarities, just as well as you do now. I would not have given them the benefit of a territorial organization; but Congress having done it, rather than quarrel with them when they are so far removed from us that by no act of theirs can they put in jeopardy a single right of American citizens, I would repeal the act establishing the territorial government; I would withhold all appropriations for their support; I would leave them under the influence of the principles of popular sovereignty to regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, because in doing so it would be impossible that they could injure anybody else. I think this would have been the wiser course. By doing this, I believe they would have gone the way of all men who are acting on erroneous principles founded on falsehood and error. I believe their own extravagances, the anomalous nature of their creed, their practices, incompatible with the permanency of any people would have caused them to fall to pieces if you had not by your policy concentrated them together. They would soon have divided themselves and arrayed themselves under different leaders; schisms would have arisen, and their absurd ideas would have scattered them to the four winds of heaven, if by your opposition you had not undertaken to concentrate them and bind them together. I have no doubt that the movement of the army which you are making against them at such expense, will not only make their councils harmonious, but will doubly increase the fanaticism that now reigns there, and render it permanent, and they will have sympathizers also, because we know that the blood of the martyr is the seed of the church. It has been so in all ages, and will be so here; and in this respect, it makes no difference whether the religion that is persecuted is founded in truth or falsehood.

We are now commencing this enterprise at a cost of $3,000,000 to start with. We know not where it will end; but let me predict that if you get out of it with $80,000,000 you will do well. You might make a railroad to California for the money it will take you to conquer this little band; and when you have conquered them, it will be as expensive to keep them in subjection as it is now.

What is it for? It is that this great nation may say that Brigham Young and his associates have succumbed to the overwhelming power of this Union! Well, sir, it will not teach us anything new. We know that he must succumb if we bring our physical force to bear on him; but it is a barren victory. No honor is won, the rights of no man are redressed, because Mormonism has not yet trenched upon the rights of anybody outside of their own circle; and it is not likely to do so for generations to come. I regret and deplore, then, that we have entered upon this enterprise; I think it was exceedingly absurd that we should have done it; I think the Executive is to blame for the course he has taken. Whether he had constitutional law to support him or not, he should have consulted Congress. I think that if he had done so before Senators would suppose themselves committed to this sort of policy, the vote would be very different from what it will be now.

But is it so, sir, that the President of the United States can commit Congress to any course of proceeding, or involve us in any war that he sees fit? I know that it has been avowed on this floor that he can do it. If he does it, he does it in violation of the spirit and letter of the Constitution, and the act ought to work an impeachment of any Magistrate, because the war-making power, by the Constitution, is vested in Congress, and he that avails himself of the position which he occupies, as Commander-in-Chief of your armies, to commit the nation to a war deliberately, has violated the Constitution as flagrantly as he could do it in any other way. We must teach Presidents this. I do not speak now as a partisan. If the President were an angel, it would not do to invest him with this enormous power of war and peace. It will not do to say, upon this floor, that the President may rightfully involve us in a war, and when he has done it there is nothing left for us but to back him up with all the money and all the men that he may require to carry out his nefarious enterprises.

Sir, I deny it. I know that, by an injudicious movement—one bordering on folly, I was about to say idiocy—he did, late in the season, order a division of your Army into the mountains to be wintered there, and in such force that he knew they were too weak for any offensive operations, and too numerous to carry the olive branch of peace. Why, in the name of Heaven, any man should suppose that, in September last, it was wisdom to order a division of your Army into the mountains and over the deserts to be wintered, I know not. If the winter had not been exceedingly favorable, undoubtedly they would have perished there, and any man might have foreseen it. Why was it done? Was it done to commit us to this state of things, "now you shall vote all we ask, because if you fail to do so, you jeopardize the army?" Are you going to leave them to starve in this wilderness? No, sir; I will not do that; those men are not to blame for the position they occupy. They are there; and I go with Senators to appropriate money enough to assist them—but call them off. Yes, sir, I will not begrudge the money to call them home and put everything in statu quo, just as it was before your President marched the troops, no matter at what expense, so that Congress may then fairly be consulted. Is it for the interest, is it for the honor of this Republic, that we should wage deliberate war on this lot of fanatics in a wilderness?

That question then devoid of prejudice, devoid of commitments from the Executive, might be propounded to Congress, and I should not doubt that Congress would come to the conclusion that it was asking too much for the fame of conquering this band of Mormons to incur all the expense and hazard not only of their conquest but of holding them in subjection for all future time; because when we conquer them the Army must be posted there, and the same force would be requisite to continue your government over them that was required to subdue them.

For the reasons which I have stated, I have come to the conclusion that all this expense ought to have been avoided, that the real principles of our Constitution ought to have been vindicated in this difficulty, which was well known beforehand. There was no necessity for immediate action. The President ought to have consulted Congress first, before this expense was incurred. Such undoubtedly will be the judgment of everybody who examines the question impartially. I know there may be exigencies where your Executive may be called upon to act in a sudden emergency, and I am not the man to complain of him nor to scrutinize with an eagle eye what he does, if he acts in good faith to defend any portion of this Union against a foe that is dangerous to it. I will not be particular about what the Constitution and the law requires, when such a state of facts exists; but that is not the case here. The Mormons could threaten nothing. It was perfectly safe to leave them alone for years, while you deliberated what you would do. This expedition was started a short time before the assembling of Congress—the great council of the nation—the representatives of the people and of the States. They ought to have been consulted on this great policy. Is not an Executive censurable in the last degree, who, withholding everything from them, commits them to such an uncertain enterprise as this, incurring an enormous expense of money and the raising of new troops, quartering them upon your Treasury, bankrupt as it is?

Sir, I deplore the apparent necessity which your Executive has brought upon the nation. I will not go the length you propose to go, for I am well aware that the amendments restrictive of these enormous sums should have been maintained; that these contracts which have been illegally entered into, as has been shown, should never have been entered into; that the Constitution has been stretched here even to breaking for the purpose of extending patronage to certain favorites in Army contracts; nay, sir, I suspect and fear that the patronage connected with this miserable war has been the principal inducement why it has been so rashly undertaken.

Mr. GREEN. I should like to have the vote if it be agreeable to Senators. I do not see that we are shedding any new light on the subject. I therefore propose that we now take the vote by general consent.

Mr. HARLAN. I do not intend to engage in a general discussion on the propriety of the passage of this bill, as I discover considerable solicitude on the part of its friends to take the vote immediately. The earnestness I have manifested to have this bill pruned, is justified by a consideration of the amount of money that will have to be paid by the people whom I in part represent on this floor. I suppose, for reasons that I shall not now take time to detail, that the State of Iowa is, in point of wealth and ability to pay the indirect taxes levied by this Government, a full average State of this Union, and consequently that one thirty-first part of this large sum of money must be paid out of their pockets. The gross sum of the appropriations in this bill as footed up by me, is $9,704,000, which, divided by thirty-one, the number of States, would give $316,258 to be paid by the people of my State for purposes which have never hitherto been authorized by Congress. That people have believed heretofore that the proper province of the President of the United States was to apply the money appropriated by Congress in executing the law, as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the nation. Here, however, is nearly ten million dollars virtually appropriated by the President of the United States—appropriated by the executive department of this Government, to which the people of that State, by their representatives, have never given their sanction.

I make this statement at this time, as the general reason which will control my vote now, and which will control my vote hereafter, when appropriation bills are pending. Not a single dollar shall be appropriated or paid, with my consent, which I do not believe would be approved by a majority of the people I represent. Were they consulted to-day whether a tax of $316,000 should be levied on them to carry on a war against the Mormons, unauthorized by Congress, in my opinion, nine tenths of them would record their votes against the proposition.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time; and the question was stated to be, "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. HALE. Before that question is taken, I desire to say a few words. I shall vote against the passage of this bill, and I shall vote against any supplies to the Army with which are mixed up any appropriations for this Utah war. As I shall do this, I want now, so that I may not be misunderstood, to state very briefly my reasons. I believe that this bill involves, if not an actual, a virtual, violation of the Constitution. I believe that this war is a weak and wicked one, and that a greater piece of folly, politically speaking, could not have been committed than sending an army out into the wilderness to winter. I do not believe they will ever have occasion to strike a blow, or that a blow will be struck; and if the President would ask for an appropriation to bring them back, I would vote for it. I am glad to have this opportunity to vote against this bill, because it is said to be popular—and it has been alluded to in this debate many times—to vote for supplies when there is war; and the ghost of the Federal party, for their opposition to the last war with England, has been used as a bugbear to frighten men with ever since; and a good many men have not got over it yet. I was not old enough to vote on that war; but the next war that came was the Mexican war. I believed that to be—what I believe to be true of this—a weak and a wicked war, commenced in falsehood and prosecuted in injustice.

I was always willing to vote the President just enough money to bring that army home by the shortest route and in the cheapest mode, and I am willing to do the same here whenever he wants it. I voted against that war and against all supplies to carry it on, and I voted alone against thanking the generals who won the victories. I should be glad to do it over again, if I had the chance. I shall vote against this war for the reason that I believe now, as I believed then, that it is all wrong. With wicked rulers one of the most prominent devices has ever been, when they want to divert public attention from their mischievous domestic policy, to plunge their country into war; for that reason, I shall vote against the supplies for which an appropriation is to be made by this bill. I shall vote against every supply with which is mixed up a dollar of this Brigham Young black mail. Having said that, I am willing to take the vote.

Mr. CHANDLER called for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill, and they were ordered.

Mr. WILSON. I shall vote, Mr. President, against this bill, but not precisely for all the reasons that have been urged against it in the course of this debate. I believe the Government made a great mistake in sending the army to Utah last autumn. If sent at all, they should have been sent early in the year. I believe the Government has made a mistake in regard to the Mormons from the beginning of this trouble. It ought to have sent commissioners there, and righted their wrongs, if they had any, and at the same time let them know that they must obey the laws of the country. I think the Government should have done this at first. They have chosen to act otherwise. I regard these appropriations as extravagant; they are very large, and I cannot give my vote for them. But I have no justification to make for the Mormons. I think their conduct has been rebellious against this Government; and if we had proceeded, as I think we should have done, to send out commissioners, and had dealt with them as we should have done, and then they had continued to act as they have acted and are now acting, I would vote any amount of money out of the Treasury of the United States to maintain the laws of the country, and to bring these people to obedience to the laws which they are violating.

Mr. SLIDELL. My colleague, Mr. BENJAMIN, has requested me to state that he has paired off with the Senator from New York, Mr. SEWARD.

Mr. HUNTER. My colleague, Mr. MASON, has paired off with the Senator from Maine, Mr. HAMLIN.

The vote was taken; and resulted—yeas 29, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Biggs, Bright, Brown, Clay, Evans, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Greer, Gwin, Hammond, Henderson, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Mallory, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Slidell, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Wright, and Yulee—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Harlan, King, Simmons, Stuart, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—19.

So the bill was passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. BAYARD. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. BIGLER. I hope that motion will not prevail: there is a very important judgship to be filled.

The motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and, after some time consumed therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, April 24, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. JABEZ FOX.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Attorney General, asking an appropriation for services of special counsel, and the reasonable expenses of the late and present district attorneys, and other expenses in defending the title of the United States to public property in the State of California; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

CONTRACTS FOR THE ARMY OF UTAH.

Mr. CURTIS asked the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be directed to examine the contracts made to supply the army of Utah, and ascertain the nature and bearing thereof; and that said committee also ascertain whether any modifications of the law are necessary to prevent fraud, and secure the utmost economy in the purchase and transportation of Army supplies. That the Secretary of War, and the heads of various departments of war, be, and they are hereby, severally directed to furnish copies of all orders to purchase, and contracts made by them relating to the furnishing supplies to said army of Utah, accompanied with a full statement of the time and place of advertising and negotiating such contracts.

Mr. WARREN objected.

OLD SOLDIERS' PENSION BILL.

Mr. SAVAGE. I move the usual resolution terminating debate upon the bill giving pensions to the soldiers of the war of 1812, in three hours after the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union shall resume its consideration. The special order on this bill terminates to-day, and unless this resolution is adopted, we shall not be able to finish the bill to-day, and it will pass from under the consideration of the committee, never to be brought up again without a suspension of the rules, and another particular day being fixed for its consideration. I am exceedingly anxious to have the matter determined to-day, and I make the motion only from the absolute necessity of the case.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, called for tellers on the adoption of the resolution.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. CLEMENS and WALDRON were appointed.

The House was divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 93, noes 96.

Mr. SAVAGE demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 107, nays 93; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Anderson, Atkins, Avery, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Bishop, Blair, Bliss, Bowie, Bratton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burns, Burroughs, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, John B. Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Shorter, Singleton, William Smith, Stallworth, Stanton, Stephens, Tappan, Miles Taylor, Tompkins, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Warren, Elihu B. Washburne, Whiteley, and Winslow—93.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Pending the call,

Mr. GARTRELL stated that Mr. STEWART, of Maryland, had paired off with Mr. THOMPSON.

Mr. STEVENSON stated that had he been in the Hall when his name was called he should have voted in the affirmative.

Mr. SAVAGE. I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted, and to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. CHAFFEE. I move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

ADMISSION OF KANSAS.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the consideration of the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARRIS,] to lay upon the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HILL] to the motion to postpone the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the Kansas bill was agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to withdraw the motion to lay upon the table for a moment. I will renew it if he requests me to do so.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. The motion was made by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BURNETT,] who renewed it at my request, after I had withdrawn it. I have no objection to its being withdrawn from the gentleman from Georgia, as I have extended the same courtesy to other gentlemen.

Mr. BURNETT. Then I withdraw the motion to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. As I stated yesterday, all that I want is that the House shall thoroughly understand this bill, and fix an hour when they will come to a vote upon it. The time, sir, is not so important to me as that every gentleman shall have an opportunity to understand the bill. I thought that a postponement till Monday would give ample time. I think that two weeks from Monday, at this advanced stage of the session, is entirely too far off. As I stated yesterday, the House will do me the justice to say that I have acted fairly on this question from the beginning. Considerations personal to myself, as well as health, require my absence at an early day, and that I should return home.

I therefore ask it as a personal favor of the House that they will reconsider the vote taken yesterday, and fix on next Wednesday, at one o'clock, as the time when the vote may be taken on the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I will hear the gentleman, but I do not yield the floor.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, the report of the committee of conference, which is an entirely new proposition, in regard to Kansas, has this moment been laid upon our tables. There are many reasons why I desire to absent myself from the House for some ten days. I desire to leave on Monday. There are other gentlemen called away, who desire to leave this evening. I think we cannot have a deliberate consideration and discussion of this bill prior to Wednesday next. And, as it is impossible for me to go to my home and return by Wednesday next, I suggest to the gentleman from Georgia that the proposition submitted by his colleague, and adopted by the minority of the committee of conference on the part of the House, is the preferable motion. This is an important subject, and the gentleman from Georgia certainly does not desire to precipitate the action of the House upon it without full and mature deliberation and discussion.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I do not wish to prolong the discussion. I just want the House to know my views upon the subject. The first question will be upon the motion to lay upon the table the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARRIS] to reconsider. If we vote that down, then we can reconsider the vote by which the amendment of my colleague [Mr. HILL] was agreed to, and when that is done, we can amend the original proposition by fixing Wednesday next as the day for the consideration of this question. I would prefer that it should be done by common consent of the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I desire to ask the gentleman whether he proposes merely to postpone the consideration of the question till Wednesday, so that it shall then come up under the rules?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Yes, sir, under the rules; and if a majority of the House are not then ready to vote without discussion, why the bill will be subject to the rules.

Mr. GOODE. I wish to know if I understand the gentleman correctly. Do I understand him to say that he will withdraw the motion to postpone till Monday, when it comes up, and move to postpone till Wednesday?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Yes, sir; but I should like the matter to be postponed till Wednesday by common consent, without taking the intermediate votes.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. The reply made by the gentleman from Georgia to me has been somewhat misunderstood upon this side of the House. What I desired to know from him was, whether it was his design to have the question postponed until Wednesday, then to come up under the rules of the House, and then, if a majority desired to debate the question, they would be at liberty to do so.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I answered the gentleman distinctly that that was my purpose.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I so understood the gentleman from Georgia, and, of course, I should prefer that it should be postponed with that condition; but I still think it better that the subject should be postponed to the day proposed by the gentleman's colleague, [Mr. HILL.] Monday two weeks.

Mr. HILL. I desire, with the leave of my colleague, to say one word. I wish to state, this morning, most distinctly, that in making the first motion which I made yesterday, it was made without any consultation with any human being. It was a suggestion personal to myself, emanating alone from my own mind. That proposition was suggested by me to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. HOWARD], and accepted by him. But the motion which I subsequently made, to postpone the consideration of the bill until the second Monday in May, was made at the request of certain personal, but not political, friends. I made it to accommodate them. I would have done it to accommodate any gentleman who might have made the appeal to me.

So far as I am concerned, it is not my desire to debate this bill at any great length, or to have it debated. It occurs to me that if we agree to postpone the bill until the second Monday in May, and then allow two or three days for debate, fixing upon the Wednesday or Thursday following as the day upon which the vote on the bill shall be taken, no great public interest can suffer. I make the suggestion in good faith. I desire to be here, and to vote upon this measure. I particularly desire that it shall not be voted upon in my absence. I intend, in giving my vote, to do what I think is best for the country, and do not expect, when I do it, to make an apology to any person in this House, or to any person anywhere on the face of the earth. If it satisfies me, I shall be content.

Mr. CLAY. Will the gentleman from Georgia yield me the floor for a moment, in a matter personal to myself?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I just wanted to explain my views, and not to go into any general debate. I will, however, yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. CLAY. I merely wish to state that I, myself, like many other gentlemen in this House, wish very much to go home. I want to get back to my country. I want to see the grass growing in this beautiful season. I want to see how my stock are doing. I want to see my calves and my colts. But, sir, this is the first time in the history of legislation that I have known the affairs of a great country like this to be postponed to meet the private inclinations or wishes of gentlemen. I am inclined to believe that there is not a gentleman on this floor whose mind is not this day, and this moment, made up as to how he will finally vote upon this question; and I do think and believe that, for the peace and quiet of the country, and that we may all get home in good time, the sooner the vote is taken on the question, the better. Therefore, I am decidedly in favor of the proposition made by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] who has been so kind as to give me the floor. I have done.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I desire to say that for two consecutive weeks I have been waiting patiently to start for my home. I have been here from the commencement of the session, while other gentlemen have been absent. I have been upon this floor every day in which the House has been in session from the first meeting of Congress until the present time. My private affairs demand my presence at home. I appeal to the House not to force on the vote upon this question at a time when I cannot be present. I cannot have time to go home and get back by Wednesday next. I cannot conceive any reason why it should not be postponed. I ask, what injury can possibly arise from postponing this vote till the second Monday in May next? If the object is to cut off my vote, I suppose it will be accomplished if the House choose to force the vote at the particular time mentioned by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS.] I cannot remain until that time, much as I desire to vote upon this question.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I would suggest to the gentleman that he can easily get a pair. Now, sir, I hope the House will, by general consent, fix Wednesday next as the day to which this question shall be postponed. If not, then, in pursuance of my promise, I will renew the motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider. Let us vote that down; and then we can reconsider and fix a day.

Mr. GROW. We give no unanimous consent to that proposition.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Then I renew the motion to lay the motion to reconsider on the table, hoping that the House will vote it down, reconsider the vote taken yesterday, and postpone the report until Wednesday next.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded the yeas and nays upon the motion to lay on the table.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Is a motion to lay the whole subject on the table in order now?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Will that motion carry the bill and report with it?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I make that motion.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, and others, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The motion to lay the whole subject on the table cannot be entertained pending the motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider. As soon as that shall be disposed of, it will then be in order.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I will then withdraw the motion to reconsider, and make the motion to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I object to the withdrawal of the motion to reconsider.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. It is entirely within my own control.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. As I understand the rules, it cannot be withdrawn except during the day on which the vote is taken.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is competent for the gentleman to withdraw the motion to reconsider, either on the day when the vote is taken or the day following.

Mr. CRAIG, of North Carolina. Can the gentleman cut off the motion to reconsider by such a motion as this?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has withdrawn the motion to reconsider.

Mr. HUGHES. I now call the previous question upon the report of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARRIS] will take precedence.

Mr. HUGHES. I desire to inquire whether, if the motion of the gentleman from Illinois fails, the call for the previous question which I interposed will not then come before the House?

The SPEAKER. A demand for the previous question will be in order.

Mr. HUGHES. Is it not in order to demand it now, and will it not then come up in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. ENGLISH. I wish to inquire whether, if the motion prevails, it will not carry with it the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MONTGOMERY?]

The SPEAKER. It carries everything, and settles the question, so far as this bill is concerned.

Mr. BONHAM. Does it carry both the House bill and the Senate bill?

Mr. SICKLES. The whole, everything, Kansas and all.

Mr. HILL. The gentleman from Illinois withdraws his motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the proposition which I had the honor of presenting was adopted: I wish to inquire whether, if I renew the motion to reconsider and lay on the table, it will take precedence of the motion of the gentleman from Illinois?

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Illinois would take precedence.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I rise to a privileged motion. I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion to postpone the subject until the second Monday in May was agreed to, and move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table. I understand it is in order to have that motion entered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to have the motion entered; but it cannot be considered until the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, to lay the whole subject on the table, has been disposed of.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. There are several gentlemen who say they want further time to consider this subject. I therefore withdraw the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I then call up my motion to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. BURNETT demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 105, nays 101; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Bonham, Brayton, Bryan, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Horace F. Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochran, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cox, Cragin, Curtis, Darnell, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Edie, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Goodrich, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, J. Morrison Harris, Thomas L. So the motion to reconsider was laid upon the table.

Pending the above call,

Mr. NICHOLS stated that he had paired off with Mr. DOWDELL, who had suffered last night with a severe chill. Although Mr. DOWDELL might have come up to the House, it was thought best that he should not endanger his health by doing so. He also stated that his colleague, Mr. HORTON, had paired off with Mr. KUNKEL, of Maryland.

Mr. PHILLIPS stated that his colleague, Mr. LANDY, had been called home by illness in his family, and had paired off with Mr. RICAUD.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois, stated that he had paired off with Mr. LAMAR.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Maryland, stated that his colleague, Mr. STEWART, had paired off with Mr. THOMPSON.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE stated that his colleague, Mr. TAYLOR, had paired off with Mr. WOOD.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana, stated that he had paired off with Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. HUGHES. I call for the previous question on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. GROW. That motion is not in order.

The SPEAKER. Why not?

Mr. GROW. The whole question has just been postponed by a vote of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman labors under a misapprehension; the question of postponement is still pending. The motion to reconsider and lay upon the table was made on the amendment to the original motion to postpone, and the question now recurs on agreeing to the motion as amended.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. In that event, then, and as this is an important vote, I move first that there be a call of the House; and on that question I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 46, nays 155; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Bunting, Burlingame, Burroughs, Chaffee, Horace F. Clark, Clawson, Colfax, Curtis, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dick, Duce, Edie, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hoard, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Leach, Leiter, Montgomery, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morse, Freeman H. Morse, Potter, Aaron Shaw, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, and Elihu B. Washburn—46.

NAYS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Anderson, Andrews, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bocoek, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Burnett, Burns, Caruthers, Caskey, Horace F. Clark, John B. Wright, John V. Wright, and Zollicoffer—155.

So the motion for a call of the House was disagreed to.

The question recurred on seconding the call for the previous question.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, and CLINGMAN were appointed.

Mr. CAMPBELL. What will be the effect of seconding the call for the previous question?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that it will cut off the pending motion to postpone, and bring the House directly to a vote on the main proposition.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and the motion was not agreed to.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—yeas 89, nays 103.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. DEWART moved (at ten minutes to two o'clock, p. m.) that the House adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—yeas 92, nays 101.

Mr. DEWART demanded the yeas and nays. On ordering the yeas and nays there were thirty-one in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair, that is not a sufficient number to order the yeas and nays.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, demanded tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. CLEMENS and COLFAX were appointed.

Mr. HILL. I move the adoption of the motion to postpone as amended.

The SPEAKER. The motion pending, and on which the question must be put first, is the motion to adjourn.

The House was divided; and the tellers reported yeas fifty-six; (more than one fifth of those present.)

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 106, nays 99; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Anderson, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bocoek, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Burnett, Burns, Caruthers, Caskey, Horace F. Clark, John B. So the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly (at ten minutes past two o'clock) adjourned till Monday, at twelve o'clock, m.

ST. MARY'S RIVER.

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire to call up a joint resolution which I offered on Saturday. It is a matter of some importance, but it will not occupy more than a few minutes. The engineer of the work on the St. Mary's river has discovered a cheaper and easier channel; and he desires that the change may be left to the direction of the Secretary of War. If the Clerk will read the resolution, I think it will pass without opposition. It is an important matter, and it is desirable that it should be acted upon at once. I ask for the reading of the resolution. I think there will be no objection to it.

There being no objection, the joint resolution (S. No. 31) authorizing the Secretary of War to expend the appropriation made July 8, 1856, upon such channel of the St. Mary's river as he may select, was read a second time.

Mr. BIGLER. I suggest to the Senator from Michigan whether it would not be proper to refer that proposition to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. STUART. That is not necessary. It is simply to authorize the Secretary of War to use the appropriations already made, in another direction.

Mr. BIGLER. I understand that. It proposes to give the Secretary discretion as to changing the use of the money.

Mr. CHANDLER. The engineer has discovered a cheaper, and, as he thinks, a better line for the channel, and he merely desires to leave it in the hands of the Secretary of War, at his discretion, upon the evidence submitted by the corps of engineers, to change the line.

Mr. POLK. I should like to know from the Senator from Michigan if any of the money referred to in this resolution has been expended.

Mr. CHANDLER. Yes, sir, a few thousand dollars, but a very small portion of the appropriation.

Mr. POLK. How much?

Mr. CHANDLER. I cannot name the precise sum; but a small portion of the amount has been expended on another channel. Last fall a new channel was discovered, the adoption of which, it is thought, will save some seventy or eighty thousand dollars. I have the report of the engineer in my hand which may be read.

Mr. POLK. I should like to hear it read.

Mr. BIGGS. I suggest to the Senator from Michigan, that in any point of view in which this matter ought to be presented to us it seems to me it ought to go to a committee. I move to refer it to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CHANDLER. Very well; let it go to that committee.

It was so referred.

RELATIONS WITH PARAGUAY.

Mr. MASON. I ask the Senate to take up the resolution of the Committee on Foreign Relations in relation to our difficulties with Paraguay.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask the Senator to withdraw that motion, in order to allow me to call up a bill to which I am sure there will be no objection.

Mr. MASON. I am sorry that I cannot oblige the Senator, but I cannot withdraw the motion. If this resolution is to be passed at all, it is necessary to be passed at once.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think it can hardly pass without debate.

Mr. MASON. Then the sooner we take it up, the more its consideration will be advanced.

The motion of Mr. MASON was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. No. 23) for the adjustment of difficulties with the Republic of Paraguay, the pending question being, on the motion of Mr. COLLAMER, to strike out the words, "and use such force."

Mr. MALLORY. The President of the United States, sir, in submitting to the consideration of Congress the relations of this country with foreign nations, has summed up those having reference to Paraguay in two short paragraphs; and the Committee on Foreign Relations, in response to so much of his message as relates to that subject, have reported this joint resolution. In opposing the form of this resolution, I wish to say that I have the same object to attain as that which the Committee on Foreign Relations aim at, namely, not only the atonement for some wrongs which we have suffered at the hands of Paraguay, but the negotiation of a treaty of commerce with them, in order that we may avail ourselves of the opening commerce of Paraguay, which is now pretty much engrossed by England, France, and Brazil; but the form of the resolution, in my judgment, will defeat the object we have in view. This debate will reach Paraguay, and the ears of General Lopez and his special council, just as rapidly as if he had an agent here to report to them.

The history of this transaction briefly is this: we negotiated a treaty with Paraguay, or General Lopez and his council of State, in 1853, on the 4th of March; and on the 12th of March that treaty was ratified. By the terms of the treaty fifteen months were allowed for the exchange of ratifications. General Lopez could not conceive, when the voyage from Paraguay to the United States was but three months, why fifteen months would not be a period amply sufficient for the exchange of ratifications. The treaty came on and was returned to him nineteen months afterwards, the Senate having made thirty-three amendments to the treaty, and extended the ratification to twenty-four months, if my recollection serves me. The treaty therefore was returned to him with these amendments, and with this particular amendment in relation to the time of ratification extended. General Lopez would probably, as Chief of Paraguay, have accepted the treaty, but in the mean time difficulties had occurred. Foreigners had been invited to settle in Paraguay, to develop its resources, and among others who went there were a few merchants from Rhode Island, called the Rhode Island Navigation Company. A few Americans were settled there. Difficulties grew up particularly between them and the Government, and as General Lopez contends they were totally in the wrong. He contends to this day that to enable them to leave the country, he advanced from the public chest $10,000, and that that company is indebted to him for that much money. When they sought to leave the country, General Lopez demanded, before he would grant them passports, that their debts should be paid. But the United States steamer Water Witch being there, Captain Page, its commander, offered those men facilities for leaving the country. A hostile feeling grew up immediately towards Captain Page on the part of General Lopez.

Here I may say that General Lopez is one of the leading men in South America. I presume that no man who knows his career will hesitate to say that he is the leading spirit of the whole of South America. He is a man of much political sagacity, and of a great deal of learning. He was educated in a Jesuit college. He is a man who is endeavoring, under its peculiar form of government, to develop the resources of Paraguay as rapidly as possible. He felt, of course, no cordial feeling towards the commander of the United States vessel there. When we sent the treaty out to have it ratified, it was sent by this very Captain Page, towards whom these feelings were entertained by the Government of Paraguay. He sent a note to the President of Paraguay that he had the treaty, and was ready to exchange the ratifications. The President returned that treaty, through his Secretary, with a brief and pithy note, refusing to receive it, as Captain Page had not accompanied it with a translation in the Spanish language, but had sent it in English.

This, I concede, was a mere pretext, nothing more; but I apprehend if we had sent an indifferent party, any other than Captain Page, toward whom these feelings were entertained, but who had yet done nothing more than his duty, that the treaty would have been accepted and ratified notwithstanding the extension of the period for ratification, and notwithstanding the amendments made to it; for the amendments are, in most respects, merely formal, changing the verbiage. In August, 1854, the difficulty with Hopkins commenced. In October following, Captain Page received this treaty, while these angry feelings were still in existence. That treaty remained in the box in which it was placed, in the office of our Minister at Buenos Ayres, for two years subsequent to the negotiation of the treaty. We then sent a special messenger there, Colonel Fitzpatrick, whose correspondence is before us, to exchange ratifications. This special messenger landed at Buenos Ayres, and went immediately to Assumption, where our Minister resident to the Argentine Confederation had never been before, the Congress of the Argentine Confederation being at Parana. Our special messenger went to Assumption. He was received with all kindness by General Lopez. He was not authorized to enter into any negotiations with reference to the previous attack upon the Water Witch, or with reference to the expulsion, from the country, of this commercial agency, of whom Mr. Hopkins, our former consul, was the agent; but he was sent there, and his mission was confined solely to the ratification of this treaty. General Lopez asked him at once if he came there to negotiate a treaty, because, if he did, he was anxious to do so; he was anxious to be on good terms with the United States, and desired to cultivate friendly relations, and to negotiate a commercial treaty with them. Finding, however, that Colonel Fitzpatrick was not authorized to prepare a treaty, he requested Colonel Fitzpatrick to make these feelings known; and his son, who was commander-in-chief of the whole forces of the Republic of Paraguay, told our agent, very frankly, that there was a very general regret in relation to the firing into the Water Witch; and that, had he been present at Assumption at the time, this act would never have occurred, and that the moment a treaty was negotiated, a proper atonement would be made.

Now, sir, thus stand our relations toward Paraguay. The President tells us we have suffered wrong, and that this company have been expelled, and lost a good deal of money. There are two sides to that question. They undoubtedly committed an outrage in firing into the Water Witch, which must be atoned for; but it is the first time in the history of the country, that I know of, although the Committee on Foreign Relations say that in reporting this resolution they have simply followed well-known precedents that negotiations with an independent nation commenced by an offer of force. General Lopez has never refused to make atonement for those outrages. He has never refused to negotiate a treaty; and whenever he has spoken on the subject, he has avowed his readiness to do so. But this very treaty would have expired by limitation in a few years. He preferred to negotiate a new one, covering all open transactions between the two countries. He did not wish to negotiate a treaty, and leave out two reclamations—one for the outrage on the Water Witch, and the other in reference to this commercial company, unprovided for.

Now, sir, I object to the use of the word "force" in this resolution, because it has a tendency to defeat directly the object we have in view. We have never yet called upon the Government of Paraguay to make atonement or negotiate a treaty; and, in using this language towards her, we must reflect how far we have gone towards other nations. Why did not the Committee on Foreign Relations, when our vessels were fired into by Spanish men-of-war, when the Spanish frigate Ferolana fired into one of our mail steamships, recommend that we should open negotiations with Spain on a similar basis? Why did not the President then take this ground, not only in regard to that, but a thousand other outrages that Spain has perpetrated towards us by the use of force?

I should vote to-morrow, I am free to say, to place the whole Army and Navy of the United States at the hands of the President of the United States to correct these wrongs, for I can see a thousand committed by Spain against this Government for which there has been no redress. Every time I hear the name of Crittenden, I feel induced to a vote of that kind. But this is an isolated case. Paraguay is a small nation, some eighteen hundred miles up the La Plata river, and that is one reason, taken in connection with our great desire to open amicable relations with her, why we should not make her an exception to the general rule we have pursued towards other countries.

I would trust the President of the United States with this resolution. My opposition arises, not from any doubt that he would use this force when it was uncalled for, though I have no entire confidence in the infallibility of man. I would trust the President of the United States as soon as I would any man on earth; but I fear the effect this resolution itself may have on the Government of Paraguay, when we send a commissioner there to demand a redress of these wrongs, and send him with a force to enforce his demands, when as yet we do not know what the defense of Paraguay is upon this subject.

I do not wish to detain the Senate. I have stated the prominent objections I have; and I will only say in addition, that the agent we sent to Paraguay, and the only one we have sent there since this treaty was negotiated, has returned to us, reporting the commerce of Paraguay as exceedingly important to this country; reporting the spirit of General Lopez as exceedingly favorable to this country, and reporting his confident belief that if we take only these ordinary steps towards Paraguay that we have towards other nations, and propose to make a treaty of commerce, we shall undoubtedly succeed. This idea is confirmed.

Mr. MASON. Will the Senator be good enough to state who has made such reports, and from whom these reports come?

Mr. MALLORY. I said distinctly it was from the only agent we have sent to Paraguay. I did not use the word "report" in its formal parliamentary sense here, as a written report. I say he has told me so repeatedly and repeatedly. He is a competent gentleman; he has traveled in that country a great deal.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Fitzpatrick?

Mr. MALLORY. Yes, sir. He speaks the Spanish language as fluently as a Castilian. He has been all over South America, and is perfectly competent to judge; and he is the only man I know of who has been there recently that is competent to judge. He was treated with great consideration and kindness by the Government of Paraguay. This opinion receives additional confirmation from the fact that Paraguay has now opened all her rivers to the commerce of the whole world—even this very river where the Water Witch was fired into between Corrientes and Paraguay. She has opened her commerce to the whole world, and England, France, and Brazil are trading there, reserving to herself the right to exclude or admit vessels of war. But this objection is more technical than otherwise, because vessels of war drawing more than five or six feet of water cannot enter those waters at all.

I think there is no necessity for this resolution in its present form; and I venture to predict that if it passes in this form it will defeat the object in view; but if you pass a resolution in the ordinary form, giving the President the right to send a messenger to demand reparation for these wrongs, and to negotiate a commercial treaty, you will succeed.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was unfortunately out of the Chamber when the Senator from Florida began this debate. As I understand him, he thinks that the clause as to force is a new provision in a resolution of this sort, unusual in the history of the relations between this Government and foreign nations. There is a similar provision, I think, in the law passed in 1811, when the President had this discretionary power given to him in reference to Florida, but there may be some distinction between that and this.

Mr. MALLORY. The Senator from Rhode Island will permit me one moment. I trust if he refers to that resolution he will take the condition of East Florida at that time into consideration. It was in the hands of a set of patriots, and was about to be taken possession of by the enemy.

Mr. SIMMONS. But it was before we had an open enemy. It was in 1811, when we were at peace with all the world, that the President was authorized to use the Army and Navy of the United States, and take possession of that country if he thought the occasion justified it. It was a matter of discretion merely. I say we have hitherto given to the President the discretion which is contemplated to be given here.

I now come to speak of the facts in this matter. It is said this is the first opportunity we have had to negotiate on the question of these outrages. By the correspondence in the report before us, it will be seen that when this treaty was presented for ratification, (by referring to the correspondence between our agents and the Minister of Paraguay,) instead of the Paraguayan Government showing any disposition to make redress for these wrongs and outrages, they suspended this treaty on the ground that the United States had not made reparation for their taking the Water Witch.

Mr. MALLORY. I will say to my friend from Rhode Island, that the treaty had not the slightest reference to any outrages or wrongs whatever. They were not under consideration.

Mr. SIMMONS. I know that; but I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that when the treaty was presented, the Minister of Foreign Affairs of Paraguay said what I will read. After speaking of the credentials of our agents, he said:

"It is requisite, therefore, that you should be pleased to declare the object of said special commission in order that we may understand the halt in the pending questions in regard to the complaints of this Government against that of the United States for the serious offenses offered to it by the scandalous hostilities of the commanding officers of the Water Witch, a United States vessel of war."

He calls this firing into the Water Witch a scandalous hostility on the part of the Government of the United States. This is very singular language, coming from a nation who fired into the Water Witch and killed one of the crew. After doing this, they call on us to make reparation for that injury! This matter of redress for the insult to our flag, runs through the whole of this correspondence; and the amendments made to the treaty which were also said to be objections to its ratification, were mere verbal amendments in reference to the title, whether this should be called the United States of North America, and the North American Republic, instead of being called the United States. These were the amendments that caused the necessity of sending it back to be ratified on the part of that Government, and they took that mode of pushing the matter off.

There were quite a number of these alterations; and inasmuch as our agent was not charged with making redress, and perhaps brought these matters under their consideration, they finally dismissed him until he could come clothed with authority to make redress for the injuries the Government of Paraguay had received by their attacking the Water Witch, and confiscating the property of our citizens! With such a half barbarous people, I think the best way is not to send a great many men back and forth, allowing three or four years to elapse between, but to send a proper commissioner, clothed with power to treat these people properly, and let them understand that this sort of bombast cannot be used with impunity; that these attacks on our flag cannot be made without some danger of being rebuked. I have no doubt you might keep up negotiations for years, and you would get just the same kind of redress. I think we ought to pursue a more vigorous policy in our dealings with these people, and with other nations also; I have suffered great mortification in hearing our citizens complain of the difference between the treatment they received and that received by subjects of other maritime Powers, in all the countries of South America, and pretty much all over the world. We permit these outrages, and let them go until everybody has forgotten them before there is any redress. They take advantage of our lenity to inflict a great many outrages on our citizens, and it is a reflection on us that they are not promptly redressed.

I can see no motive the President can have in exercising this discretion injuriously to the trade and commerce of the United States. It is his particular duty to see to these negotiations, and if he cannot be clothed with some authority to accompany his messenger of peace with a force that will make his authority respected, he will return rebuffed in the same way you were before. No man can read this correspondence without regretting that there had not been some armed force there to bring to their senses people who talk of a halt in our foreign relations on account of the insults they offered when they fired into the Water Witch, killed the man at the helm, and cut her adrift. I hope the resolution will pass.

Mr. MALLORY. I think my friend from Rhode Island will find that he totally misapprehends this case; and when he talks about a precedent being furnished for the introduction of the word "force" here growing out of our relations with Florida in 1811, he is certainly mistaken. He will recollect that there was a patriot war in Florida; that the English were there agitating for the possession of the country, and there was a party in favor of transferring it to them. They had possession of it from 1762 up to 1787, and there was a large party favorable to the acquisition of that country by the English Government. The course then taken by Congress was to authorize the President to take possession of the country if there was a party there ready to transfer it to us. That is no precedent for this case.

When the Senator says that President Lopez refused to ratify this treaty on the ground that there was a halt in their relations with us on account of our outrages, he is mistaken. General Lopez referred solely and exclusively to what he considered the outrage on the part of Captain Page, by facilitating the egress from the country of parties who had not paid their liabilities. That was the outrage he complained of. He did not allude to the firing into the Water Witch. If the Senator will look at the dates he will see that the difficulty grew up in August, 1854, the treaty was received in October of the same year, and the firing into the Water Witch was in February, 1855.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was reading from a letter of the Paraguayan Minister dated in November, 1856. It might have preceded this, but the date does not.

Mr. MALLORY. The Water Witch had not been fired into at all when the treaty was presented for ratification. The President of the Republic had reference solely and exclusively to the transactions between Captain Page and the ten Americans. When I say ten I put it at the outside. I think there were only six or eight. The names of the witnesses which are appended were only four, and I presume they got all they could. Probably the Americans did not exceed ten. General Lopez had reference exclusively to that difficulty and no other. He contended then, as he does now, that there were open and unsettled difficulties between these persons and himself, which ought to be rectified before the treaty should be ratified, and he claimed that those difficulties should be covered by any subsequent treaty.

Now, I will ask the Senator from Rhode Island whether he does not know that we never have claimed any reclamation of General Lopez? We have never given him an opportunity to say whether he will atone for this wrong or not. I will go as far as the furthest to demand atonement for that wrong, and to enforce the demand properly. I will certainly give an opportunity to Paraguay to do it without an act of force on them—without going to them and demanding reparation sword in hand, particularly when they have informally told our agent that they were ready to negotiate, and offered on the spot to negotiate a treaty which should be entirely satisfactory, if he would only bring it to this Government. He was not empowered to do it, and did not do it. If you will strike out the word "force," you will accomplish this: you will send an agent there who will speak the language of the country, which you have not done before; he will negotiate a treaty covering these transactions, and accomplish all you expected to gain by the treaty of 1854.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator must certainly be mistaken. I read from a letter addressed to Mr. Fitzpatrick in November, 1856, about this very treaty. Here is the instruction of Mr. Marcy to him, dated August, 1856. That was subsequent to these outrages; subsequent to the confiscation of this property; subsequent to the firing into the Water Witch by this fort; and the Paraguayan Minister then said:

"I have the honor to address myself to the special commissioner of his Excellency the President of the United States of America, to say to him that I have observed in his credential letter of the 30th of July, of this year, his special authorization for the sole purpose of exchanging the ratifications of the treaty of the 4th of March, 1853, and that the honorable Secretary of State of the United States, in a note which he has addressed to me, dated the 5th of August last, makes known that you have been appointed special commissioner to confer with me on all the matters connected with the interests and relations of our respective Governments."

"It is requisite, therefore, that you should be pleased to declare the objects of said special commission, in order that we may understand the halt in the pending questions in regard to the complaints of this Government against that of the United States for the serious offenses offered to it by the scandalous hostilities of the commanding officers of the Water Witch, a United States vessel of war."

"I avail myself of this opportunity to salute the special commissioner with my most distinguished consideration and esteem. NICOLAS VAZQUEZ."

That is subsequent to all this.

Mr. COLLAMER. I would suggest to the Senator from Rhode Island, whether that allusion was not to the fact of the Water Witch interfering to get people away from that country contrary to the order of the President—not to the firing.

Mr. SIMMONS. But he does not say what it is. He speaks of the scandalous conduct of the Water Witch.

Mr. COLLAMER. That was the matter they complained of. Then it ought not to be represented that they were complaining that they fired into the Water Witch.

Mr. SIMMONS. No. I say that it was the Water Witch matter they were talking about.

Mr. COLLAMER. The complaint about the Water Witch carrying away those people is a distinct thing from the firing.

Mr. SIMMONS. There is nothing in these letters showing to you that they were carrying away these people.

Mr. MALLORY. If the Senator will look into the dates, he will see that the difficulty with the commercial agency occurred in August, 1854. The treaty was received at Paraguay in October of the same year, and offered by Captain Page to be ratified. The President of Paraguay refused it. That was after the transaction between the merchants and the Government, and the subsequent refusal of Colonel Fitzpatrick merely followed up the first.

Mr. SIMMONS. I see that, in this correspondence, he dismissed our Minister—I do not know but that it may be very friendly, though I do not think so—because he does not make reparation for their firing. I consider that is about the whole matter, so far as the facts are laid out there. The vessel left one channel and went into the main channel; which, I say, according to law, is open to any vessel. They fired into her. I do not hear the facts disputed. I do not doubt the vessel took the men away. I suppose the Government there wanted to get something out of them besides their property, before they would let them run.

Mr. PUGH. I hope the yeas and nays will be taken on the amendment; because I think, if these words are stricken out, the resolution had better lie on the table, for there is nothing in it but that. Nobody doubts that the President has power to send an agent to ask reclamation. I consider this clause the pith of the whole resolution. I do not wish to prolong negotiations with these people. I do not know the people of Paraguay; but I know something about the Spanish American race, and they will talk until the afternoon of the day of judgment with you, and you will never have a settlement until you use force, or threaten it. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment, for I think it is a defeat of the resolution.

Mr. MASON. The difference between the Senator from Florida, in the view he takes of this resolution, and that of the Committee on Foreign Relations, I think results from this: the honorable Senator from Florida bases his recommendation to the Senate of the course which the President shall be advised to pursue, upon information that the honorable Senator says he has received in conversation with some person or persons who has or have been in that part of South America, and from whom he derives the representations upon which he proposes to act. He has so declared in debate, that he has held conversation with some person or persons who has or have been in that quarter of South America, and he has been informed by them of the kind and conciliatory disposition which exists on the part of President Lopez.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. BIGGS in the chair.) The Chair is under the necessity of reminding the Senator that the hour of one o'clock has arrived.

Mr. MASON. I shall not speak more than a few minutes, and then I hope we may have a vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the Senator will proceed. The Chair hears none.

Mr. MASON. The report of the Committee on Foreign Relations shows that what it recommends to the Senate is in compliance with the recommendation of the President, based on the official documents which the President has communicated to the Senate. I presume I need hardly say, in the face of the country, that if any action is to be taken by the Senate on the subject, it must be based upon information which comes to them officially, rather than upon information that comes from unofficial and irresponsible sources. Now, what is the recommendation? Not that the President shall be authorized to use force in order to procure a proper atonement and redress for the insult to our flag, for the shedding of American blood that has been practiced by this President Lopez; but he himself says that it is his purpose, if authorized by Congress, to make proper application in a conciliatory though in a firm manner, to the President of this Republic, for proper redress and atonement for the injury and insult he has inflicted on our flag; and he recommends, because of the peculiar character of that people, that he should be authorized, should he find it necessary, to enforce that demand, if it be refused, by the use of force. The Senator from Florida seems to contemplate that we are to fire a gun first and ask for atonement afterwards. That is not in the contemplation of the resolution before the Senate, nor is it the recommendation of the President. The Senator from Florida says that he has been informed that President Lopez is ready to make a treaty, and after the treaty is made he will be prepared to make atonement.

Mr. MALLORY. The Senator is mistaken. I said no such thing.

Mr. MASON. I certainly misapprehended the Senator then, for that is what I understood him to say. We have no minister at this Republic at all.

We have a minister at the Argentine Confederation—a distinct Government.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Is there any appropriation for one there?

Mr. MASON. None. The treaty which was framed, and which the President of the Republic of Paraguay has rejected, was a treaty that was framed during the last Administration, by our Minister at Rio Janeiro, (Mr. Pendleton,) who was sent on a special mission to Paraguay, and to one or two other Republics, in company with Mr. Schenck. We have no Minister there, and we have no access, of course, to that Republic unless it is authorized by Congress, or unless the President deems it proper in his general discharge of his executive duty, to commission some one of our Ministers elsewhere to go there for the purpose. But the President knows, not from unofficial sources, but from the official papers sent home by a responsible officer of the Government, Captain Page, who commanded the Water Witch, that from the temper evinced by President Lopez towards American interests there, and towards the American officers, it would be humiliating again to approach that Government unless it was aware that our President had power to enforce the demand if it should be refused. A steamer prepared for the purpose, as I am informed, has already been sent out there, not as an armed vessel at all, but as a vessel which Captain Page is to command, again to explore the waters of the La Plata; and the President proposes to avail himself of that mission to make demand of this redress from the Government of Paraguay. How? Not by sending an armed force to those waters, I take it for granted. He will either send a special commissioner, or deputy one who may be in that region, to effect the object; but he will send a commissioner there in some form, I take it for granted, with specific directions to make a specific demand for ample redress and atonement for this injury; and if it is granted, very well; if it is not, then I presume orders will be given to our fleet upon that station to furnish an adequate force to compel it. That will be the course, and it is the only course; and it seems to me that it is consistent with the relations now subsisting between this Government and that distant and small Republic.

I understand the Senator from Florida to make some reflections upon the manner in which the duty was discharged, confided to Captain Page at first and afterwards to a special commissioner in the exchange of the former treaty. Now I have no unofficial sources of information whatever; I have no information except what I derive from the information we get from the official papers; and the information we get there is simply this: Mr. Pendleton negotiated that treaty; it was submitted to the Senate, and ratified by the Senate with certain amendments. It was then sent out by our Secretary of State to Captain Page, an officer commanding the Water Witch, on a pacific expedition, into which he had been invited by the authorities of Brazil, who had concurrent jurisdiction over the river in which he was. The treaty was sent to him with instructions from the Secretary of State to proceed to Asuncion, the capital city of Paraguay, and there propose an exchange of ratifications. Captain Page received the treaty in 1854; and he reported from Corrientes, a neighboring province to Paraguay, one of the Argentine Confederation, to Mr. Marcy, Secretary of State, under date of October 17, 1854, that he had received the treaty; and then he says:

"Yesterday I dispatched an officer of this vessel bearer of the communication from myself to the Secretary of State of the Republic of Paraguay, informing him that I had received from the President of the United States a commission and power to act in the exchange of ratification, and desiring to be informed if I should proceed to Asuncion, the capital of Paraguay, for that purpose."

Then he goes on to say that he had sent his officer there instead of going himself, because Paraguay had recently issued a decree prohibiting foreign men-of-war entering or ascending the river Paraguay. The reason for that Mr. Page gives in this language:

"This decree has been issued in consequence of the part taken by the Water Witch, under my command, in protecting and relieving American citizens, whose residence in that country had become subjected to restrictions almost amounting to persecution."

In November, 1854, he informs the Secretary of State of the failure of this mission of his officer in this language:

"I now have the honor to inform the Department that yesterday Lieutenant Murdaugh, the officer dispatched to Asuncion with my letter to the Secretary of State, informing him that I had been commissioned by the President of the United States to exchange the ratification of the treaty, and desiring to know if I should proceed to Asuncion for that purpose, returned, bringing me the inclosed letter from the Secretary of State, together with my letter returned to me.

"Lieutenant Murdaugh stated to the Secretary of State, on presenting my letter, that it related to the treaty. It was known to the Government of Paraguay that the ratification had reached Buenos Ayres some days previously to the arrival of Mr. Murdaugh. The letters alluded to in the note of Mr. Secretary José Falcon, of the 29th and 30th of September, were addressed to me, returning my letters of the 28th and 29th, copies of which I have transmitted to the Navy Department. In his letter of the 29th of September, Mr. José Falcon, Secretary of State, says my letter of the 28th is returned without an answer, because it is written in the English language; and his of the 30th of the same month, in reply to mine of the 29th, and returning the same, is simply a repetition of the same excuse for not noticing it.

"I could see no obligation on my part to correspond with the Government of Paraguay in any other than my own language, knowing full well that it possessed the means of having my letters translated into its own language. I had reasons, apart from the consideration that President Lopez, in his presumptuous exercise of authority, might conceive himself empowered to force me to correspond in his own language, for writing in English. The only person associated with me who is at all capable of translating English into Spanish is my clerk, and his imperfect knowledge of the language, (as a translator,) coupled with the fact that his translation would not be a fair and true expression of the tenor and import of my letters, determined me not to put myself in a position, in my official correspondence, to be misrepresented."

These were his reasons for writing in English. When this answer was sent back, and his letter returned in that contemptuous manner, Mr. Page then very properly wrote again to Mr. Falcon, Secretary of State to the Government of Paraguay, telling him:

UNITED STATES STEAMER WATER WITCH,
CORRIENTES, October 16, 1854.

SIR: The undersigned, lieutenant commanding the United States steamer Water Witch, Thomas J. Page, has the honor to inform his Excellency José Falcon, Secretary of State and Minister of Foreign Relations, that he has this day received from the President of the United States a commission to act on the part of his Government in the exchange of ratification of the treaty concluded between the United States and the Republic of Paraguay on the 4th day of March, 1853.

With this commission, the undersigned has received the treaty, which he is instructed to exchange.

The undersigned desires to be informed if he shall proceed, according to the instructions from his Government, to the capital of Paraguay, for the purpose of effecting the exchange of ratification above alluded to.

The undersigned will dispatch this communication by Lieutenant William H. Murdaugh, of the United States steamer Water Witch, who will, in person, hand it to his excellency, and will receive his reply.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to renew to his excellency the assurance of his distinguished consideration.

TH. J. PAGE,
His Excellency JOSE FALCON, Secretary of State, and Minister of Foreign Relations, Asuncion, Paraguay.

Here is the reply:

ASUNCION, October 21, 1854.
In accordance with the conditions (set forth) in my letters of the 29th and 30th of the past, I return to you your letter dated October 16, in Corrientes, written in English, without accompanying it (or me) a translation signed, wondering that you should continue in your idea of mortifying me.

Your attentive servant, "De U. S. atento servidor," JOSE FALCON.

Mr. THOMAS J. PAGE,
Commander of the steamer Water Witch.
[Does not say where.]

The honorable Senator from Florida said, a few days ago, as I understood him—I may have misunderstood him—that the Government of Paraguay had been treated with some neglect, if not contumely, by those who had been sent out to exchange ratifications, because the treaty had been allowed to remain at the mouth of the river some twelve or eighteen months. Here is the evidence that, as soon as the treaty was received by the officer to whom it was sent, he put himself immediately in communication with that Republic, and was rebuffed in a contemptuous manner, as expressed in the letter of the Secretary of Paraguay. What was done afterwards? A special messenger (a Mr. Fitzpatrick) was commissioned to proceed to Paraguay for the purpose of exchanging those ratifications, and the Government there refused to exchange ratifications, on the ground that the Senate had made various amendments to the treaty which the Republic of Paraguay considered was not exactly respectful towards it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question? It is whether the treaty was ever presented to that Government within the period fixed in the treaty for the exchange of ratifications?

Mr. MASON. The period fixed in the treaty for the exchange of ratifications, at first, was, I think, fifteen months; but it was found from the time that it took the treaty to get here, and the delay that occurred before the Senate, that it would be impracticable to exchange ratifications within the time originally prescribed, and then the time was extended, I think, to a period of twenty-four months.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Extended by whom?

Mr. MASON. Extended by the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. By our Senate?

Mr. SEWARD. Will the honorable Senator excuse me for a moment? The amendments to the treaty were generally insignificant; but one was to extend the time within which the United States were to ratify it. All the rest were the striking out of the word "North" before the word "America," and the striking out of the words "North American" so as to make the title of this country "the United States" instead of the erroneous one which the treaty contained.

Mr. MASON. It was presented to the Government of Paraguay within the extension of time which was made by one of the Senate amendments.

Mr. MALLORY. It was nineteen months from the making of the treaty.

Mr. MASON. I advert to this treaty not because their failure to ratify it is any reasonable ground of complaint on our part—it will not be found to be made any part of the complaint in the President's message—because it has been adverted to by the honorable Senator from Florida as furnishing some ground of reasonable complaint on the part of the Republic of Paraguay against this Government. We have no cause of complaint that she did not ratify the treaty. The cause of complaint is, that she has shed the blood of an American citizen, which is unatoned for at this day. The honorable Senator from Florida says we have made no demand for atonement. We have not; we have no minister there. It has not been in the power of the President to do it. The request now is that Congress will place it in his power to do it, and it is objected to because the President has been informed from official sources—and I confess I should agree perfectly with the President, from the tenor of the information laid before him and by him before the Senate—that to send a minister there to ask for redress, unless the President of that Republic knows that that minister will have it in his power to enforce it if it is refused, will be very idle and very fruitless, and, in my humble judgment, a very unworthy movement on the part of this Government toward that Republic. We have no minister there, and it is necessary, therefore, that a commissioner in some form should be dispatched for the purpose.

Again, sir, the honorable Senator from Florida says that this Rhode Island company was prohibited from leaving the Republic of Paraguay, and their passports were revoked because they made an effort to go away without paying their debts, and that the Water Witch, under Captain Page's command, properly interposed and brought them away, having first obtained from the President of Paraguay permission to go. I will say to that honorable Senator that a very different version is given in the official report (whatever he may have found in unofficial reports) made by Captain Page of the conduct of that Government towards these citizens of ours. The version there given is that they had, under invitation of that Government, embarked a very large property, sent out a number of men, made large establishments within the domains of Paraguay in the prosecution of their business, and that President Lopez, for purposes of his own, (for he seems, according to their account, to have been himself largely engaged in the business of the country,) finding that his personal profits were likely to be invaded, took measures at once to oppress them and sequester their property, and compel them to go away. That is the version given in the official report.

Be that as it may, the question submitted to the Senate, and I am sorry to have detained them so long on it, is a very simple one. The President informs us that this insult and injury have been committed not only upon the American flag, but have been accompanied by the loss of the life of an American citizen in the service of the Government under that flag; that, in addition to that, American citizens who had been invited to that country, and who had embarked large property there, had their property confiscated, were subjected to very heavy losses, and ignominiously driven from the country, and he asks that authority be given to him to demand redress, and to enforce it if it is refused.

I can conceive of no reason why this recommendation of the President should meet with anything but favor at the hands of the American Congress. The Senator from Florida inquires why, when our flag was fired into by the Spanish ships at Havana, the Committee on Foreign Relations did not propose the same measure? I should have supposed that that honorable Senator could have answered the question very satisfactorily himself. That country is close by. As soon as information was received that our flag had been fired into, the President of the United States, having a minister at the court, according to proper usage, took immediate measures through that minister to demand redress, and redress was obtained; and if Paraguay was within our reach, small and feeble as it is, I should be of the opinion, for one, if we had a minister there, that that minister should be instructed to require redress without accompanying it by force; but we have none; the country is distant; and the facts before us satisfy my mind that there is a necessity for this measure. I am strengthened in this opinion by reflecting on the condition of that country, and the character of General Lopez, who, the Senator says, he is informed is the leading spirit in South America. He may be, but his conduct has shown him to be the leading brigand of that whole region; and I apprehend, from the unfortunate condition of their population, the character of their population, their ignorance, the character of the mixed races there, that the leading spirit among them always will be the leading brigand. That is certainly the character of Lopez.

The honorable Senator says that Lopez has a son who is a different sort of man; and that son said that if he had been at Asuncion when the insult was committed on the Water Witch, he could have prevented it, or could have obtained redress for it, I do not know which. That may be true. All I have to say is that we have no information about the son, or the disposition of the son. In the official correspondence we can treat only with the father; and there is enough in that correspondence to show that, although he may be a leading spirit, it is the spirit of a leading ruffian, and requires to be checked, if he should refuse our demand. I have no idea that he will refuse, if he is made aware that the Government of the United States has a competent force ready to ascend into his waters, and enforce redress. Then he will not refuse; for all leading spirits of that sort cower and quail in a cowardly manner immediately, as soon as force is presented to enforce a demand. I will not detain the Senate longer.

Mr. MALLORY. The chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations has said a great deal, and raised issues which are entirely irrelevant to this subject, to which I will not attempt to reply. I gave the source of the information I obtained. It is as reliable as that upon which the Senator relies. It was from the only agent that we ever have sent to Paraguay—the only one we have ever sent there to negotiate any treaty. In regard to the very treaty which has been brought to the attention of the Senate, the time for its ratification was extended from fifteen months fixed in the treaty, to twenty-four. We presented the treaty in about nineteen months, but we presented it through Captain Page, who was at that time engaged in an angry controversy with the President of the Republic of Paraguay; and it was a personal objection to Captain Page, undoubtedly, that induced the rejection of the treaty. When we presented it by our special agent, sent to present it, about three years after it was framed, it was long after the time had expired, even as extended by ourselves, and under no consideration was President Lopez called upon to ratify it. Notwithstanding all that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations has said, he has not told us whether we have ever informed General Lopez that we have a cause of quarrel with him. We never yet have done so. We have never signified to him that we are dissatisfied; that we stand in need of reparation; and until we do so, with great deference to the judgment of the Committee on Foreign Relations, I say that we ought not to talk about force when the information we have, reliable or not, coming from our special agent, is, that they are ready to make a treaty. The Committee on Foreign Relations rely a great deal on the testimony spread out in the report. Their judgment is reliable, just as it is supported by the facts. If we can give a better reason against the report they make, the Senate, I presume, will take it. In this very correspondence, the Minister of the Republic of Paraguay says distinctly to Colonel Fitzpatrick:

"I am likewise directed by his Excellency the President of the Republic to make known to you that his Excellency is in the best disposition to renew the negotiations of a treaty of friendship, commerce, and navigation, as soon as his Excellency the President of the United States may desire to send a plenipotentiary to this city for the purpose, with suitable instructions."

He offered to negotiate then. Our agent said that he was not empowered to do so. He then says to him officially, I will negotiate one at any time that you may send a person here empowered to do so.

"With such an opportunity, the pending questions, to which I have referred in my previous note to you of the 8th instant, can be settled, it not being easy to continue longer without a solution which shall strengthen the good understanding of the two Governments."

There he makes a most distinct and unequivocal offer to negotiate a treaty. It comes from him. We have never offered to make one. We sent this treaty to be ratified by Colonel Fitzpatrick three years after it was negotiated, long after the time extended for the ratification by ourselves. My friend from Virginia says we have no minister at that country. It is well known our minister is at the mouth of the river, at Buenos Ayres, and his mission is to Parana. Steamers start weekly to Asuncion from Buenos Ayres, and the English and French ministers go to Asuncion. They negotiated their treaty when we negotiated ours, and theirs has been ratified. They are trading under it. That is another objection. We can empower our minister at any time to go to Asuncion in any vessel and make a treaty. It is only ninety days from Baltimore to Buenos Ayres, and only eighteen hundred miles up the river from there to Asuncion.

I concede, sir, that for the blood of American citizens shed full atonement must be demanded, and must be had, and that no indulgence should be allowed. But when the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations undertakes to brand President Lopez as a brigand, it only shows that he knows very little of the character of President Lopez. It shows that he knows very little indeed of the amelioration of the condition of Paraguay which President Lopez has superinduced. It betokens very little knowledge indeed of the resources which the President of Paraguay has himself developed in that country. So far from being a brigand, he is a statesman, and one of the leading men in South America.

I oppose this proposition only because I have at heart precisely the same end that the chairman of the committee has, and because I feel confident that if you go there with force before you have made any demand for redress, thus excepting Paraguay from that usual routine according to which you treat other nations, you will not attain the object. You may obtain reparation; you may obtain the money which this company claims, and you may obtain redress for the shedding of American blood; but will you negotiate a treaty of commerce? Is that the way to beget friendly relations with an American Power, when we have at that very place the agents of France and England opposing us, and endeavoring to engross the whole trade for their countries? We have to compete with them. They will throw every obstacle in our way, and, as a matter of course, if we empower our agents to use force without making any demand for redress, we shall get reparation for these injuries, but we shall make no treaty of commerce.

Mr. SEWARD. Mr. President, I was one of the Committee on Foreign Relations by whom this resolution was reported. I did not apprehend (at the time the report was made) it to be a subject of any doubt; and I wish to state very briefly the view which I took of the case. Under a decree of the Government of Paraguay, citizens of the United States emigrated to that country, and established themselves in manufactures, agriculture, and trade.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. BIGGS.)
Does the Senator from New York yield the floor?

Mr. SEWARD. With the greatest pleasure always to the honorable Senator from Missouri, provided he does not come in the questionable shape of Kansas.

Mr. GREEN. I desire to ask the Senator if he is willing to yield the floor in order to permit me to move to take up Kansas. It is the special order, and if it is not an interference with his present plan of speaking, I should like to have it taken up.

Mr. SEWARD. When the honorable Senator makes a request of me, it is on the subject of Kansas, and as he is chairman of the conference committee, to which I belong, I suppose I must receive it as a command.

Mr. GREEN. Not at all.

Mr. SEWARD. I come down.

KANSAS—LECOMPTON CONSTITUTION.

Mr. GREEN. I move to take up for consideration the report of the committee of conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will remark to the Senator from Missouri that there are other special orders having precedence of that.
The proper motion will be to move to postpone all prior orders.

Mr. GREEN. That will be my motion; but I think this has precedence, according to parliamentary law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There are other special orders having precedence, but it is competent for the Senator from Missouri to move to postpone all prior special orders.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I think the Chair is slightly mistaken in regard to the rule. This report being set apart specially for to-day, has to be called at one o'clock to-day, and takes precedence over all other special orders; but if it loses its place to-day, it goes among the other special orders. I think, however, it comes up first today.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair stands corrected. It is moved to proceed to the consideration of the special order made on Friday.

Mr. STUART. Before voting on that question, I should like to have the subject of that order read. Let us see what it is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the order making it a special order.

Mr. STUART. Not the order making it, but the subject which it is proposed to take up.

The Secretary read: "The report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. No. 161) for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union."

Mr. STUART. I want the report read that it is proposed to take up, so that I may see what the Senator from Missouri proposes to take up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will remark that, according to the order heretofore made by the Senate, when the hour of one o'clock arrived, this report would properly have been before the Senate as the special order, as the Chair understands. But when the hour of one o'clock arrived, the Senate was engaged in the consideration of the resolution reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations; and, by unanimous consent, the Senate continued the consideration of that resolution. That resolution, by unanimous consent, is now before the Senate; and it is necessary to dispose of that before calling up any special order.

Mr. STUART. So far as that question is concerned, I do not deem it important; but the Chair was right in his first statement to the Senate. If he will look to the rule, he will see that the special order first made is the special order first to be taken up; and the Senator from Alabama was in error in supposing that this matter took precedence for to-day. It does not take precedence at all. The bill in regard to the fishing bounties is the first special order according to the rule, as the Chair will see by reading it. But that does not affect this question. The Senator from Missouri proposes to postpone in order to take up. Now
I want to hear read what he proposes to take up, so that I may see what it is.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. In answer to the remarks of the Senator from Michigan, I will say, that I am well aware of the rule to which he refers;
and if all the special orders, made previous to the one made on Friday, be called up, the oldest special order will be the one properly in order now;

but when the Senate determined on Friday specially to set apart this day for the consideration of this report, I hold that, according to the practice of the Senate, it must now be taken up if it be called for by any Senator. If, however, to-day passes without calling it up, it then takes its place among the special orders, and at the foot of them.
Such I understand to be the rule and practice of the Senate.

Mr. STUART. That is a mistake. The rule settles that question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is obviated entirely by the motion of the Senator from Missouri. The Secretary will read what is desired by the Senator from Michigan.

The Secretary read as follows:

"Mr. GREEN, from the committee of conference, on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. No. 161) for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union, made the following report:

"The committee of conference, appointed to consider the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment to the Senate bill No. 161, entitled 'a bill for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union,' report:

"That they have had the subject under consideration, and have given it that careful, patient, and mature deliberation which they conceive its importance demands, and have agreed upon an amendment, in the nature of a substitute, for the House amendment to the Senate bill."

Mr. STUART. The statement in the report is that the committee have agreed upon an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the amendment of the House of Representatives. Now, I ask that the amendment of the House of Representatives be read, to see how it varies from the one the committee offer as a substitute for it.

Mr. HUNTER. I apprehend the Senator has no right to call for the reading of anything except the report. That is the question on which we have to act. That he may call for the reading of, but nothing else.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now before the Senate is on postponing all prior orders, for the purpose of taking up the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. STUART. If the Chair understands, as I do, that the motion to take up the report will be a proper motion after the prior orders have been postponed, then I will wait until this question is taken; but on the question of taking up the report
I want to have the papers read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri, that the Senate postpone all prior orders to take up the report of the committee of conference for consideration.

Mr. STUART. For the purpose of taking it up.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The point is, whether this is one motion to postpone and take up, or whether the question is, first on postponing, and secondly on taking up. I suppose it is now first on postponing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first question will be on postponing; but usually, when such a motion as this is made, it is considered, when the postponement is agreed to, that it is the sense of the Senate to take up the matter proposed to be taken up. If insisted on, however, the first question is on postponing all prior orders.
The object of that motion, suggested by the Senator from Missouri, is for the purpose of taking up the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. HALE. It is suggested that the first prior order is a bill which relates to the repeal of the fishing-bounty duties. Then I suppose all who are for keeping that bill as it is, will vote to postpone.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I did not pay particular attention to the disposition of the subject now under consideration on Friday last; but if I am not mistaken, the Senate made this report the special order for to-day at one o'clock. That being the fact, to-day being specially assigned for the report, I take the ground that it comes up at one o'clock in its order, and overrides all other special orders that may have been assigned on previous days. After to-day, if it be not now considered, I admit it resumes its position with special orders formerly made, and goes to the foot of them. I hold that no motion is necessary to proceed to the consideration of the report as a special order; but after having postponed all previous orders, it comes up of course under the action of the Senate.

Mr. GREEN. I only made the motion to obviate all difficulty; I thought we should save time by it, rather than discuss points of order; I am satisfied that, under parliamentary law, at one o'clock this report came up on the demand of any one Senator, properly before the attention of the Senate, not upon the ground assumed by the Senator from Michigan that one prior order superseded another, but on the ground that this was a privileged question pending before the Senate on Friday; and though we chose to postpone it, it is still a privileged question, and takes precedence of all prior orders, or of subsequent orders not having a privileged character. It takes its right from its character, and not from the mere fact that it is made a special order; it was postponed to accommodate Senators. Its character is still retained as a privileged question, overriding and superseding all prior orders, because it is privileged.

Mr. STUART. I had supposed, sir, that the motion as submitted would dispose of these questions, for I confess I have very great repugnance to arguing them over and over again; but the Senator from Missouri will look in vain to find any law declaring this to be a privileged question. All there is about it is, the law of the Manual is, that a committee of conference may report at any time.
This committee has reported. What becomes of it then? It is no more privileged than any other question.

A word now as to the argument of the honorable Senator from Alabama. It will be seen at once, on the least reflection, that the Senate, in having assigned the consideration of this subject for to-day at one o'clock, has done no more, if you give it the largest latitude, than to make it the special order for to-day at one o'clock; and then the question is, when was it so made the special order? On Friday. By recurring to the rule, you will see that special orders made prior to that time take precedence of it. I do not wish to discuss this point. It is not involved necessarily at all. The Senator from Missouri has submitted a motion to postpone the prior orders, as he may do, and take up this subject. It is competent for the Senate to do it, for the rule expressly declares that all special orders are subject to a vote of the Senate. There is therefore no necessity for presenting this matter in this way; but if it is to be presented, we are obliged to meet it as such. If it is insisted now that this motion shall not be made, but that the Chair shall declare that this subject is, by its own force, before the Senate, then we have to meet that question.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Chair does not decide that.

Mr. STUART. That is the ground taken by the Senator from Alabama. If the motion of the Senator from Missouri be taken, and the Senate decides to postpone all prior orders, the question will recur whether the Senate will take up this subject, or some other subject. Those are legiti-mate motions, and motions that I do not dispute at all.

Mr. HUNTER. I suggest that we should get on faster by taking the vote on the motion which is made by the Senator from Missouri.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair entertained that motion. The question now is whether the Senate will postpone all prior orders for the purpose of taking up this report of the committee of conference.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is whether the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the report of the committee of conference?

Mr. STUART. Now, sir, I repeat the request that I made before. The report of the committee of conference, as they themselves state it, is that they have agreed upon an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the amendment of the House of Representatives. The House amendment was a substitute for the Senate bill. Now
I want it read, to see what it is.

Mr. HUNTER. I maintain that the Senator from Michigan has no right to make any such request; for, by the practice of the two Houses, the question is upon the report and not upon the bill; and for the purpose of showing distinctly that he has no right to make it, I beg leave to refer to a decision of this very point made in the last House of Representatives by Mr. Speaker Banks. On Tuesday, March 3, 1857, pending the question of agreeing to the report of the committee on conference on the tariff bill, the main question being ordered,

"Mr. KNOWLTON called for the reading of the Senate amendments referred to in said report.

"The SPEAKER decided that the report was the only paper the reading of which could be insisted upon at this time.

"From this decision of the Chair, Mr. GEORGE W. JONES appealed, pending which,

"On motion of Mr. LEWIS D. CAMPBELL,

"Ordered, That the bill be laid on the table."

This express point, therefore, was decided at the last session by Mr. Speaker Banks, and he was sustained, on an appeal by the House of Representatives.

Mr. STUART. I think as much of precedents as their weight entitles them to—no more. We all know that in legislative bodies the majority is very apt to decide as they want the thing done, without any reference to the existing rules or parliamentary law. Now, whether or not you may have anything but the report itself read, depends upon the character of the report. If the character of the report be such as necessarily to mingle other subjects with it in order to settle what is its effect, then you have a right to have every such paper read. No man can tell what is the effect of this report, as a substitute for another bill, unless he has that other bill read. If this was a complete report, reciting the Senate bill, reciting the House amendment, as a substitute for the Senate bill, and then reciting the proposition of the committee itself, the proposition of the Senator from Virginia would be true, because there would be no other paper connected with it necessary to explain its meaning. But, I ask the Senator from Virginia, suppose, as is generally the case on an appropriation bill, a conference committee comes in here and reports that the Senate shall recede from amendment number two; does the Senator say that it would not be competent to ask that amendment number two in the bill should be read? How are you to know anything about it? how are you to know what you are voting upon? whether you will agree to recede or not, until you hear it read? In the very nature of the case, it is impossible. I admit that a report may be so complete in itself, having no connection with another subject, as to spread before the Senate all that is desired in order to enable us to give an intelligent vote, or it may so connect itself with other papers as to make those other papers a part of it, and so that an intelligent vote cannot be given without seeing them.

Now, is the Senate prepared, in this case, to say that a Senator is obliged to vote on this report without seeing how it varies the House amendment or the Senate bill? The vote is upon this report as a whole; it is not amendable; but must we, therefore, take it as it is; and are we obliged to vote without seeing how it varies the amendment of the House or the Senate bill? That cannot be true. I have looked at the case referred to by the Senator from Virginia. My memory is not very clear as to what was the condition of the tariff bill at that time. If it was a distinct and complete thing in itself, the decision was right. If it was not, I do not hesitate to say it was wrong; but I submit here, sir, that I have a right to have such papers as are necessary to a full understanding of what this report is, read before I am called upon to vote on the question at all.

Mr. GREEN. I do not think there can be any real practical difficulty on the question now raised. The right of a Senator to call for the reading of a paper depends upon the fact of its existence in the possession of the Secretary, and I should like to know where is the right of any Senator to call for the reading of anything not in the possession of the Senate.

Mr. STUART. The Senator will allow me to interrupt him. I concede that if the paper is not in the possession of the Senate, of course I cannot have it read.

Mr. GREEN. Very well; that is the end of it, so far as that motion is concerned. But I want to get to the practical bearing of the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Missouri indulge the Chair for a moment? The Senator from Michigan asked that a certain paper be read. Does he insist upon that?

Mr. STUART. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will not decide that point as a question of order, but will refer to the rule, and submit it to the Senate.

By the 14th rule it is provided that—

"When the reading of a paper is called for, and the same is objected to by any member, it shall be determined by a vote of the Senate and without debate."

That is the rule.

Mr. STUART. That point has been presented to the Senate a great many times; and it has been decided that the rule read by the Chair has no reference to a case of this character. That rule has reference simply to an independent paper not connected with the subject before the Senate. For instance, if I propose to read a paper that is not immediately connected with the subject under consideration, and the reading of it is objected to by a Senator, that rule applies, and it is for the Senate to decide whether the character of the paper is such as in its judgment, will justify its being read. But, sir, the parliamentary law that any member of a legislative body has a right to have any paper read before he votes upon it, is another and entirely distinct right to which that rule does not apply at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair differs from the Senator from Michigan, and rules that the 14th rule applies to the present application made by him. That rule provides that—

"When the reading of a paper is called for, and the same is objected to by any member, it shall be determined by a vote of the Senate, and without debate."

Mr. STUART. I then shall be obliged to appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. PUGH. Will the Senator from Michigan permit me? The Vice President has decided that this rule does not apply to a paper of this kind.

Mr. STUART. I know he has at this session.

Mr. PUGH. I know he has decided it at this very session.

Mr. STUART. I am aware that the Vice President has decided it at this very session, and has talked with me side-bar in respect to the effect of the rule. I do not think it is necessarily involved in this question; but I am utterly opposed, in reference to this or any other subject, to having a construction given to our rules which must prove fatal hereafter. I therefore, with great respect, appeal from the decision of the Chair; and I ask for the yeas and nays on the appeal.

Mr. TOOMBS. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state the question. The motion pending before the Senate is a motion to proceed to the consideration of the report of the committee of conference. Pending that motion, the Senator from Michigan asks that a certain paper be read, and the Chair decides that the 14th rule applies to an application of the kind made by the Senator from Michigan. From the decision the Senator from Michigan appeals, and the Senator from Georgia moves to lay that appeal upon the table. The question is upon laying the appeal upon the table.

Mr. STUART. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 25, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Bigler, Bright, Clay, Evans, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gwin, Henderson, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Sisdell, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, and Wright—25.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bell, Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Colamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Douglas, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamilton, Harlan, King, Pugh, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—25.

So the motion to lay the appeal on the table was not agreed to.

Mr. STUART. The question now is on the appeal?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes, sir.

Mr. STUART. I have only a word to say in addition to what I said before. I remarked that the decision of this question, in my judgment, was not at all important for the object I had in view. The Senator from Missouri has stated distinctly the point to which I desired to attract attention. I acknowledge that I have no right to have a paper read which is not before the Senate. If the paper is not before the Senate, as is conceded by the Senator from Missouri, that answers my purpose.

But a word now in regard to this rule. It provides that if a Senator asks for the reading of a paper, and it is objected to, the question shall be submitted to the Senate to decide whether it shall be read or not. It will be seen, therefore, by the language of the rule, that it is not a question of order. If so, it would be decided by the Chair. But the object was to cover this case: a member proposes to read a paper that is offensive to some portion of the Senate. It may be offensive in its character; as has frequently happened here even within the short time I have been in the body. Some man sends in a letter, and wants to have it read; but a Senator, knowing that it is an improper paper, objects to it; and the question then is put to the Senate, "Shall it be read?" That does not involve a question of order, but is an independent proposition, the object being to preserve the proper decorum of the Senate. That is the interpretation of the rule, and so, as I said, the present Vice President has decided at this term. It is for that purpose alone, and not as affecting this question at all, that I suggested, with certainly great respect to the Chair, and equal respect to the Senate, that I think we ought not to make such a decision at this time as would stand subsequently in our path when it would be important. I should be glad to have this whole subject dropped as it is; and I have no objection myself to withdraw the appeal, provided it may generally be understood that the point made by the Chair upon it is withdrawn, so that the decision shall not be made.

Mr. TOOMBS. It cannot be generally understood. I entirely differ with the Senator, and insist on the point.

Mr. BIGLER. I am not certain that I understand the position of the question. If I understand it correctly, it is a motion to proceed to the consideration of the report of the committee of conference. The Senate have not taken up the report. Pending that question, the Senator from Michigan calls for the reading of certain papers. Now, if the Senate had proceeded to the consideration of the report, and the pending question was a vote on the adoption of the report, the Senator would have a clear right to call for the reading of the papers which would have a bearing upon the question of adopting the report, or affecting the report in any way; but I suggest whether his point of order be well taken now. What is the question? It is a question not of adopting a measure, but whether the Senate will proceed to its consideration. Is it to be a settled rule that when a motion is made to proceed to the consideration of a bill, a Senator, as his individual privilege, has a right to call for the reading of papers that bear not upon the question of whether the Senate ought to proceed with that particular subject, but upon the question of the bill itself? That subject is not before the Senate at all. It will be time enough when the Senate have proceeded to the consideration of the report of the committee of conference for the Senator from Michigan to call for the reading of the original bill on his right, because he has a right to have the matter read on which he is about to vote. That is the point wherein I think the Senator has made his question hastily; and I think the Senate is about to establish a precedent or rule which would become exceedingly embarrassing.

Mr. TOOMBS. This rule is very explicit, and it is a very useful one. It is based upon the idea that the Senate shall have the control of its own business. The point now presented here is, that upon a motion to take up a measure, a Senator can call for the reading of that or any other measure connected with it. Why, sir, that would defeat all the objects of this rule. One Senator here moves to take up the report of a committee. Another Senator rises and moves to have the bill read. In that way, the object of preventing the Senate from following its own business is attained; and we ought to know, from the experience of this body, that we are no more exempt than the other House from mere dilatory motions, and motions having no other intent than to delay and postpone the public business.

In the other House, where a similar rule prevails, a member cannot have a bill read. That question often comes up there; but heretofore, under the practice of the Senate, these points have never been used until recently to annoy and delay the Senate. Hence, the question has not arisen here; but in the other House it has frequently happened that when a bill is pending before the House, a member asks to have it read; and it is done only by permission of the House. This has been done again and again. Persons might, if they chose, delay business indefinitely if the right now claimed were conceded. One Senator gets up and moves to read a bill, which, like the civil and diplomatic bill, sometimes consists of a hundred pages. The Senator from Vermont may move to have it read for his information on a motion to take it up; the Senator from Delaware may ask to have it read again for his information; and so we might sit here for weeks if thirty gentlemen, less than a majority, desired to obstruct public business by asking for the reading of the same bill. This rule only puts it in the power of the Senate to determine its own business, and there is no wiser rule than that the Senate shall determine at once, without debate, whether a paper shall be read. You would facilitate the obstruction of the public business if you give any other construction to the rule. Public business might be defeated at any time by ten gentlemen of this body sitting in their seats, and calling for the reading and rereading of bills and amendments, if this course were allowed.

I know there is nothing in the rule that excepts the bill on your table. In its terms it embraces all; in its objects it embraces all. The true construction of this rule, like the construction of any other law, is to be obtained by considering the old law—the mischief, and the remedy. The great mischief was that much time was taken up in this and other deliberative bodies in the discussion of the order of business. I have seen the whole day spent here on such questions, and probably the object is to spend this day in the same way. It is likely that that may be the object in some quarters. In order to avoid the evil of spending the whole day to determine what you shall take up, or whether you shall read a paper, and to get at what you want to take up, the rule provides that you shall not read the paper without the consent of a majority of the House. It is a wise rule, and a good rule.

Mr. HALE. Ever since I have been in the body, I have been in a minority on this floor. Having been taught that rules are for the benefit of the minority, I have some care about their construction. Now, if the Presiding Officer made his decision upon the ground taken by the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, I am inclined to the opinion that the Senator from Pennsylvania is right; and as it is not often that he and I concur entirely, I am happy, when we do, to say so. If the Chair decided that the Senator from Michigan should not have that paper read because it was not pertinent to the consideration of the question whether the Senate would take up the bill or not, I should vote to sustain him, and say the decision of the Chair was right. If, however, after the bill was taken up, and we were called upon to vote upon the proposition, the Senator should suggest that he wanted the amendment read, and the Chair should rule as he has now ruled, I should say that he was wrong. Therefore, so far as my vote is concerned, I should be gratified if the Chair would state the grounds on which the decision was made.

Now, in regard to the practice of the other House, I think the honorable Senator from Georgia is mistaken in one fact; for, as a matter of practice, in the last Congress a very important bill was defeated simply by the pertinacity with which members who were opposed to it insisted upon its being read; and it was a bill longer than the New Testament, and it would have taken a longer time to read it through. I refer to the bill for the reorganization of the commercial law, codifying the revenue laws. It was a bill prepared with great labor, and reported by the Committee on Commerce; and, every time it came up, somebody insisted on having it read.

Mr. TOOMBS. They had to read it once.

Mr. HALE. Well, it will be time enough to consider the objections to having this paper read more than once after it has been read once.

Mr. TOOMBS. The Senator is mistaken. By the rules of the other House, they are bound to read a bill; but, in the case alluded to, the attempt was to dispense with the rules, and not read it at all. The question we are to act upon is the report. That is to be read, and has been read twice, I believe.

Mr. HALE. That is exactly where I stand on this question; and my vote will be governed by that consideration. I think the view taken by the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania is a highly sensible one—a practical one; and I shall certainly vote to sustain the Chair if he bases his decision on the ground suggested by the Senator from Pennsylvania; but if, after the report is taken up, the same point be made, I shall vote against such a decision.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senate the position of the question. He will decide no question in advance. It will be time enough to decide every point when it arises. The motion before the Senate is, whether the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the report of the committee of conference. Pending that question, the Senator from Michigan asked for the reading of a paper; and the Chair rules that that is to be determined by a vote of the Senate, without debate, under the 14th rule. Upon that, the Senator from Michigan appealed from the decision of the Chair; and the question before the Senate is, "Shall the opinion of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?" On this question, the yeas and nays are asked for by the Senator from Michigan, as the Chair understands.

Mr. STUART. Yes, sir.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BELL. I hope the Senator from Michigan will withdraw the appeal. The decision of the Chair under this rule I think I could not sustain if the question were made at the proper time; but here it is made in reference to taking up certain business. The reading of a paper which is not the paper immediately upon which the Senate is called to vote, is asked for when the only question before us is as to the priority of business, as I understand.

Mr. STUART. No sir. The Senator is mistaken. The question now is on proceeding to the consideration of the report of the committee.

Mr. BELL. I beg pardon. I thought it was a question of the order of business in another respect.

Mr. STUART. The question is on proceeding to the consideration of the report of the committee of conference. Now if the Senate will indulge me for a moment, I think I can satisfy my honorable friend from Pennsylvania that the very ground he has taken is precisely the ground that sustains my proposition. What is the report of the committee of conference? Is any Senator prepared to say that is the paper which they have signed? What is that? I will read it:

"The committee of conference appointed to consider the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment to the Senate bill No. 161, entitled 'A bill for the admission of the State of Kansas,' report that they have had the subject under consideration, and have given it that careful, patient, and mature deliberation which they conceive its importance demands, and have agreed upon an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the House amendment to the Senate bill.

"They cordially recommend the adoption of this amendment by the two Houses of Congress."

And that they sign. That is the report. That is all the report they have signed. Now, where is the subject that they offer us as a substitute? I have read the report. Senators are insisting that we are to vote on the report that they have signed. That report covers nothing. It does not cover the substitute. It is not embraced in it.

Mr. BIGLER. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. STUART. Certainly.

Mr. BIGLER. This discussion is entirely out of order. The Senator is discussing the report. The Senate has not proceeded to take it up at all. It is not before the Senate. Now the point which I made was, that the Senator could not call for the reading of the report, or any paper having reference to the report or subject-matter to be acted upon, because the Senate had not decided to proceed to its consideration. If we settle as a rule that, when a motion be made to proceed to the consideration of a bill or report or resolution, any member has the privilege under the rules of the body of calling for the reading of the subject to be considered, I suggest whether we shall not be complicated in business here, and destroy the whole system of our proceedings? He cannot insist; he can avail himself of no right at this point. When the Senate shall have decided to proceed to the consideration of the report, the Senator may make the point which he makes under the parliamentary law; but I must insist that he has no right to discuss the report, or to call for the reading of papers bearing on the report, until the Senate has decided to proceed to its consideration.

Mr. STUART. The Chair has certainly decided that I have the right to have the report read on the question of taking it up; and if the Senator from Pennsylvania could maintain his doctrine, he would put us in a bad position indeed; we should be obliged to vote to take up a subject without knowing what the subject was. That would never do. I am not discussing the report; but I am discussing what constitutes the report. I say that this paper which is signed by the conferees does not constitute the report, and does not purport to constitute it, but it refers to something else that they have done which is their report. They say they have carefully considered the question which was referred to them. What was it? It was the Senate bill to admit Kansas into the Union, with the House amendment. That was the subject referred to them, and the two Houses disagreed upon that subject. I beg the attention of the Chair and the Senate now as I proceed. That subject was referred to the committee, and upon that subject they report. Well, what do they report? They say that they report an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the House substitute. This report is not complete except by embodying in it in point of fact the original Senate bill, with the House amendment to it, and the substitute that the committee propose for both. That is the report. The moment you undertake to confine it to the paper that is signed by the conferees, it is nothing; but they refer to other papers; they refer to all these papers, and these papers are embodied in and constitute a part of the report.

That is the position in which the question stands before the Senate. By what right, I ask, does any Senator insist to-day, when the committee have signed this short statement and appended to it their substitute, that that is all there is of the report? Why, sir, they are obliged to report upon the subject submitted to them, and, as I said, in order to have drawn out this report in complete form, it should have stated that there was submitted to the committee the following Senate bill; and, after writing that out, the following substitute of the House of Representatives for the bill; that the committee have carefully considered these differences between the two Houses, and have agreed upon the following as a substitute for both. That would have been a complete report, drawn out in full form. The committee have not done that, and I am not intimating that they ought to have gone to all that labor; but I say that the Senate bill, the House amendment, and their own substitute are as much part of their report, as if they had drawn them all out in complete form, and that is the question presented here. If it is undertaken to insist that the report is what they have signed, then everybody will see that it is nothing, it is entirely unintelligible; you can make nothing out of it.

I said the Senator would see that I was right in claiming to have this whole report read. For what purpose? For the purpose of seeing whether the Senate is in a condition to take it up. I stated some time ago that the concession made by the honorable Senator from Missouri answers my purpose. He concedes that these papers are not here. That is all I want. I want simply to take the ground that the Senate cannot proceed to the consideration of the subject committed to the committee of conference until that subject is before us. Now, I say that the House amendment is a part of the report of the committee of conference, and I call for the reading of it. It is no answer to me to say that anything beyond what this committee has signed is out of the report. You must either take the ground that everything beyond what the committee has signed is not part of the report, or else you must take the ground that whatever is necessary to render their report intelligible and complete is a part of it, just as in the case I put before, of an appropriation bill. The committee report that the Senate recedes from its amendment number twenty-two. That makes the amendment a part of their report, and you turn to the bill to see what amendment number twenty-two is. It is just as much a part of the report as if it were drawn out in it. So here when this committee, in their report which they have signed, refer to a substitute of their own, and say that that is a substitute for the House amendment, the House amendment is a part of the report. They must show you in their report what it is that they propose a substitute for.

There is nothing clearer than that; and hence I say to my friend from Pennsylvania that this paper is part of the report, and the Senator is contending against the correct decision of the present occupant of the chair when he says that I have not a right to have any part of the report read. The Chair has decided that, and decided it correctly. The other point made by the Chair is, that the paper which I asked to have read is not part of the report; but the Chair will see, and the Senate will see, upon reflection, that it is part of the report; that the House amendment and the Senate bill are both a part of the report of this committee, and you cannot act intelligently on one without seeing the other, because they are interwoven—the one is made a part of the other, and the report covers the whole. We sent to this committee of conference the Senate bill and the House substitute, and they must come back here; the committee bring them back as a part of their report. They say they have introduced a substitute of their own which they recommend; for what? They recommend it as a substitute for the entire bill. The report, then, must show what it is that they propose to strike out, and what it is that they propose to substitute. That is their report. They propose to strike out the House amendment to the Senate bill, and insert their substitute. That is their report; and it as completely includes these papers as if they had drawn them out in the manner I have indicated.

Mr. HUNTER. I referred the Senate this morning to a decision of the House of Representatives, in which it was expressly decided that the whole question presented by the report of a conference committee was that report itself. I have shown you that it was decided in that case that a member had no right to call for the reading of the provisions of the bill to which it referred, because the question was not upon the bill, but upon the report of the conference committee. Now, sir, the Senator from Michigan says that the report of this conference committee is incomplete, and expresses nothing without the bill. He says that, to have made it perfect, it ought to have embodied the bill of the Senate and the substitute of the House; that is to say, when we report on the large appropriation bills, to make a conference report perfect, we must cover the appropriation bills in the report; yet no man knows better than the Senator from Michigan that such a thing has not been done; that the uniform practice of the Senate is completely the other way. So far from its being the fact that this report is incomplete without the bills, it shows on its face that it is complete without them. What does it say? It says that it presents a substitute for the substitute which the House offered for the Senate bill; that is to say, it expresses clearly that it presents this bill as a substitute for all; and the sole and exclusive question to be voted on, is contained in this bill, which is part of the report. Does the Senator from Michigan say that it is not part of the report because the names are not signed at the bottom? Is it not reported along with this, and expressly referred to, and necessary in order to make it intelligible? and when you have that, you have the whole report, the whole subject-matter which the conference committee proposes to bring before the Senate. If the ruling in the House of Representatives, to which I have referred, and which is consonant with the practice of both Houses, be correct, then it does follow that the paper, to wit, the bill which is not here, and for whose reading the Senator from Michigan called, is a paper out of the case, just as much as if he proposed to read a letter from one of the Departments, or any one else. The whole question is presented by the report of the committee of conference, and upon the report alone. Does it involve a question upon the original bill to which it refers? I say that, according to the practice of both Houses—and I believe that that probably would be the ruling of the old parliamentary law, which was made before bills were printed—the question is upon the mere report. Nor is there equity in such a demand, for we all know that these bills are printed; we are all aware that they are well known to every member.

Mr. COLLAMER. Will the gentleman indulge me one moment? The bill of the Senate, as passed by the Senate, has never been printed.

Mr. GREEN. Not by the Senate, but it has been by the House.

Mr. HUNTER. It was printed by the House, and, I believe, it is the uniform practice to interchange documents. It was printed in the House, and it was put on our table. I say that, if such an appeal is made to equity on that account, it seems to me it would be groundless. It is a matter I acknowledge, for the discretion of the Senate, whether they will consider the report of the conference committee now, or postpone it. That is a matter of discretion on considerations of equity and propriety; but as a matter of right, I maintain, and I think I am fortified by the unbroken usage of both Houses, that we have the right to consider this report at once, and that the question is separate and distinct from the bill itself.

Mr. STUART. The Senator does not state my position as I make it. Of course, I do not say that he does not intend to do so; but I say he does not do it. In the case I put of an amendment to a bill, I did not say that the whole bill should be put in; and in that case it would be unnecessary; because the two Houses did not disagree to the whole, but they disagreed upon a particular amendment, and the report of the committee is not complete unless they spread out the amendment that they propose the Senate shall recede from.

Mr. HUNTER. I will ask the Senator if he has ever known it to be done in his life? Has he ever seen it done in any conference report?

Mr. STUART. I will tell you what I have seen done. I have seen such reports presented to the Senate, and whenever the question was asked what is amendment number twenty-one, it was read, and read as a part of the report without objection. If it were not so, what would be the result? A committee of conference make a report in which they recommend that the Senate recede from amendment number twenty-one. No Senator off the committee knows what amendment number twenty-one is, nor what it is about; and you have to be voting without any knowledge at all, unless you can call for its reading. I do not say that in that case you must embody the whole bill in the report; but I say in this case you must do it because the amendment of the committee covers the whole bill. That is the reason; and to make a parallel case, suppose a committee of conference report to strike out amendment number twenty-one and substitute an entire amendment in its place: the report is incomplete unless you write out the amendment you propose to strike out and the amendment you propose to substitute, because without that there is no intelligent presentation of the case to the Senate. That is the reason; and in this case the Senator shows the fault in his argument. He says it is customary for each House to print bills, and for each House to reciprocate in that matter; but, sir, the parliamentary law proceeds on the ground that this is the first knowledge the bodies have of the question; that it is presented now as a new thing, and that each member, therefore, has the right to have the subject read once. It is not as the Senator from Georgia intimated that one Senator can demand it, and then another demand it, and so exhaust the session in reading. The parliamentary law says distinctly that that cannot be done, but that one reading is a matter of right. I think the honorable Senator from Georgia will see, if he inspects the rules of the House of Representatives, that this right to have a bill read through does not depend upon their rules as contradistinguished from the parliamentary law.

Our rules do the same thing; but it is only reenacting what the common law is. Our rules say that it shall be read once—so do the House rules; but that is no more than the law says without the rules. It is a right that every member has before he can be compelled to vote on a question, that it shall be once read; but having been once read, any number of gentlemen who happen to be in the legislative body cannot then successively demand that it shall be read again. Now, sir, my point is that this report, except in the branch of it that is now here, has not been read, and I have a right to insist on its being read.

Mr. PUGH. I voted against laying the appeal on the table, because I thought the Chair had misinterpreted the rule of the Senate, and the practice as settled certainly under the Vice President, who ordinarily occupies the chair. I understand the practice to have been settled by him, and I believe it is the true construction of the 14th rule, that the phrase "paper" contained in that rule means an irrelevant paper, or a paper not before the Senate officially. I know, for instance, that in executive session, upon the question of the confirmation of a nomination, where one Senator at this very session called for the reading of certain papers, which had been sent in from one of the Executive Departments, and it was objected to, the Vice President decided that any Senator was entitled, as a matter of right, to have those papers read, because they concerned the nomination. Therefore I think that when the question before the Senate is upon agreeing to the report of the committee of conference, any Senator has a right to hear not merely the new proposition read, but the proposition for which it is to be substituted. As to the question whether the Senator from Michigan could demand it on a motion to take up the report, that was not the point decided by the Chair at all; that is not a point upon which I gave any vote. I do not think he has a right to call for the reading of the papers on a motion to take up; but the appeal from the decision of the Chair was on the ground that the Chair said that under this rule relative to papers a Senator could not have the bill read with the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio will indulge the Chair. The Chair expressly disclaimed deciding any question except the one presented. This appeal was taken upon the question as presented before the Senate in this form: a motion was made to proceed to the consideration of the report, and then the Senator from Michigan asked for the reading of this paper. The Chair decided that he having asked for the reading of a paper under these circumstances, the 14th rule applied to the case. That is as far as the Chair has decided.

Mr. PUGH. The Chair read the 14th rule of the Senate:

"When the reading of a paper is called for, and the same is objected to by any member, it shall be determined by a vote of the Senate, and without debate."

I understood the Chair to say that that applied to a demand for the reading of the bill; that that was a "paper" referred to in the rule; and I thought the Chair erred in interpreting the rule. I do not think, on a motion to take up a question, a Senator is entitled to have the papers read, because we take it up for the purpose of having it read and considered. If that be the question before the Senate, or if that be the ground on which the Presiding Officer puts his decision, I shall vote to sustain his decision; but I shall never vote that a bill or amendment before the Senate is a paper the reading of which can be objected to, and thrown out in this way by a majority of the Senate.

Mr. GREEN. I hope we shall have a vote. We all understand the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, "Shall the opinion of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?"

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 30, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Bell, Bigler, Bright, Clay, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Green, Hammond, Harlan, Henderson, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Sebastian, Simmons, Sidel, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Trumbull, Wright, and Yulee—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Dixon, Doollittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Foster, Hamlin, King, Seward, and Stuart—14.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. BIGGS.) The Senator from Michigan having asked for the reading of a paper, the question, under the 14th rule, is, will the Senate order the reading of the paper? That is a question to be determined by the Senate under the 14th rule.

Mr. STUART. I suppose the vote of the Senate just taken is indicative that they do not intend to allow that paper to be read. I am willing to take that for granted; and the Senator from Missouri having conceded all that I wished to have conceded, that the paper is not before the Senate, I am enabled to present the question as I desired to present it, and as I should have been glad to get at it an hour ago. If we concede everything contended for on Friday, as to the right of the committee to report, I insist now that, as the subject-matter upon which they make the report is not before the Senate, we cannot now proceed to the consideration of it. Therefore, I am opposed to the motion which is made to proceed to the consideration of the report. We must have the subject brought back here from the House of Representatives, before it can be acted upon by the Senate; and I wish to suggest at this time a reply to an argument that was made by the present occupant of the chair [Mr. BIGGS] on Friday. He put the case of a conference committee reporting that they could not agree. Now, I propose to show that that makes no difference in the ground for which I contend. In that case, the committee of the House of Representatives take the bill to the House, if under the parliamentary law they be entitled to the papers, and they there make their report that the committee have been unable to agree. It is then competent for the House having the bill before them to recede from their amendment. That would be the first question in order. It is competent to insist upon their amendment, and ask for another conference. It is competent to refuse that, and vote to adhere to their amendment. Either of these votes being carried, they send a notice to the Senate of what they have done, and send the bill along with it; and when it is sent here, we have the papers on the subject before us. And then what could we do? We could recede from our disagreement; we could agree to their amendment with an amendment; we could insist upon our disagreement, and join in a request for another conference; or we could adhere to our own amendment, and thus put an end to the subject. Having the bill before us, we could act.

Thus it will be seen that there is no necessity which can arise in any case that is supposed to proceed to consider a report, or even to receive it, until the bill is returned, for if we do receive it we cannot act. The argument made by the honorable Senator from North Carolina is conclusive. Suppose we received a report that the committee had been unable to agree, could any proposition be made here to recede from our disagreement until the bill was here? Could any proposition be made to agree to the House amendment with an amendment? or could any proposition be made to adhere to our amendment before the bill was here? You can take no steps necessary to further action on the subject until the bill is returned. Now, sir, to-day it would be entirely competent for the Senate, if this bill were returned here, to vote down this report of the committee and adhere to our disagreement to the House amendment, or to take any other course a majority of the Senate might choose; but, in the present condition of things, if the amendment reported by the committee of conference were voted down to-day by the Senate, you could take no further action at all, because you have not got the bill before you. The House of Representatives, however, can take action. They can vote down this report of the committee of conference and proceed at once to further proceedings upon the bill, according to the pleasure of a majority of the House, whatsoever that pleasure may be.

But, sir, it will be seen that I was not premature in raising my objection on Friday; and, if I was, I am not premature to-day. Suppose the Senate should vote to agree to this report of the committee of conference to-day, and the House of Representatives should vote to reject the report, and reject the bill, where would your action be? Nowhere; it would amount to nothing. The object of parliamentary law is not thus to waste time by going on with a series of proceedings which may end in nothing. Until the House having possession of the bill has acted upon it, you know not whether you can take any further action here that shall be available. It is competent for the House of Representatives to reject the bill entirely, and end the proceedings upon it. Then why should we be considering it here when our proceedings can, in that contingency, be of no avail? It shows, Mr. President, that the ground I assumed is right and unanswerable, that neither House can act upon the bill until it has the bill before it. When the House of Representatives shall agree to this report, and send us notice that it has agreed, and ask our agreement, then nothing but our vote agreeing to the report will be necessary to complete action upon the bill.

Mr. PUGH. Does the Senator mean to say that we cannot take up the report? It may be an argument why we should not vote upon it; but does my friend mean to say that we cannot take it up to see what it is merely because the bill is not before us?

Mr. STUART. Yes.

Mr. PUGH. We might take it up, and finding it defective, send it back to the conference as no report; or we might object to it and put it aside. I cannot see, however, that at this stage of the question the objection is proper, and I say it with all respect.

Mr. STUART. I understand my honorable friend, and I only regret that he does not see this question as I do. You are proceeding to act on a subject that is not before you. That is my point. I do not speak of the paper not being here, but I speak according to the parliamentary law as stated the other day by the Senator from Virginia. The bill is where the law says it ought to be, and that is in the House of Representatives—the bill, the amendment of the House, the substitute of the committee, according to parliamentary law, are all before the House of Representatives. It is a mistake that some Senators have fallen into to suppose that the proposition of the committee is not a part of the papers left with the committee of the House of Representatives. It is just as much a part of the papers left with the House as the original bill. The language of the parliamentary law is—what? That you leave the papers with the committee of that House agreeing to the conference. What papers? All the papers relating to the subject. No exception is made. The parliamentary law does not say that you shall leave the papers that were referred to you, and bring back what you propose to substitute for these papers, but all papers that belong to the subject are left with that committee whose House has agreed to the conference. Why? For the very reasons that I have just been enumerating, because that House must act, and being able to act, must have all the papers before it. If this conference committee proposes a substitute for the whole proceedings, must not that substitute be there? It cannot be in two places. The confusion that Senators seem to have been led into, arises from the fact that they suppose the bill which is to become the law can be in two places at the same time. Can that be pretended? Can you take any bill and pass it in the House, and at the same moment pass an exact copy of it here, and call it a law? Not at all. The identical paper that you act upon in the Senate, must be acted upon in the House of Representatives—not an exact copy of it; that will never do. This report, I say to my honorable friend from Ohio, according to the parliamentary law, is in the House of Representatives; it is there, because, I repeat, as the Senator from Virginia has said, the papers are where the law says they ought to be, and the law says the papers are to be left with the committee of that House which agreed to the conference—all the papers, and this one as well as any other one. You might as well bring back the original bill—

Mr. BAYARD. Will the Senator allow me to read the parliamentary law on this point?

Mr. STUART. Certainly.

Mr. BAYARD. The parliamentary law is:

"In all cases of conference asked after a vote of disagreement, the conferees of the House asking it are to leave the papers with the conferees of the other."

Mr. STUART. Precisely; but the Senator has entirely misapprehended. We have had a vote of disagreement in this case. What was the vote of disagreement that made a committee of conference necessary? We disagreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives. If we had not voted upon the amendment of the House of Representatives, but had simply asked for a conference, then the papers would have come to us; but we voted to disagree. My honorable friend from Ohio made that point in the Senate here, and foretold what would happen. If we had, without voting to disagree, asked the House to appoint a committee of conference, the papers would have come to us, and we should first have acted; but we voted to disagree to the amendment of the House of Representatives, and then the parliamentary law says that the papers shall be left with the House agreeing to the conference, which, in this case, was the House of Representatives. They are there now, and there is no report here to act upon, and cannot be until it is sent from the House of Representatives.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri will allow the Chair to state what he understands is the condition of the question now. The Senator from Michigan withdraws his call for the reading of the paper?

Mr. STUART. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then, the question before the Senate is on proceeding to the consideration of the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. GREEN. I am not certain that that question opens up the latitude of debate which has been indulged in by the Senator from Michigan; but as it perhaps may, I shall briefly notice the points of which his objection consists. In the first place, he is in very gross error in supposing that either the Senate bill or the House amendment ever can, under the present state of the question, come before either House for subsequent action. When a bill has passed the Senate by three separate readings, it is carried to the House of Representatives, and it must be passed in that House by three separate readings, either with or without amendment. When there is a disagreeing vote between the two Houses, the two Houses meet together; they are then, in contemplation of law, one body, conferring together as equals, and as such equals they agree upon some mode of amendment that harmonizes their opinions on the disagreeing vote. For convenience sake, parliamentary law has said they shall select committees to do the work, and report it back to each House, and these reports are to be made at the same instant of time; and when the report comes into either House, the vote is simply upon concurring in the report, or disagreeing to it. We do not read it three separate times. That is not the parliamentary law. It does not assimilate in character to a bill. It is simply an amendment, the bill having already passed both Houses; but as it passed in a different shape in one House from what it did in the other, they are to harmonize upon an agreement, arranged by a joint committee of conference; but that amendment is read only one single time, and the question then is upon agreeing to the report of the committee. It, therefore, cannot be assimilated to a bill. It is no bill; it is a mode of adjusting a difference that exists in the opinion of the two branches of Congress. Instead of meeting in one body and there voting and conferring together, interchanging opinions, they meet by committee, conferring together, interchanging opinions. The result of that interchange comes back as a report, and the only question that can be put to the House on the report is, "Will the House agree and concur, or will they disagree and non-concur?"

So far as a paper in the possession of either House is concerned, it is important to keep this distinction in view: that a paper upon which the Senate or the House of Representatives must act, must be read upon the demand of any one member for information to know what the subject-matter proposed to be acted upon is; but any collateral paper, however important to shed light upon it, can only be read, if objected to, by a vote of the Senate or House. Now, the only thing to be acted upon in the Senate, is the report of the committee; and the Senator from Michigan sees the difficulty of his objection here, and the impossibility of sustaining it, except by making this far-fetched and illogical argument. He says this report necessarily includes the House amendment and the original Senate bill. It is no such thing. That was the subject-matter referred to them, and the report is the result of the conference. The Senate bill and the House amendment cannot be said to be the result of a conference and the opinion of a committee. On the contrary, the committee repudiated them both. The report of the committee upon which the Senate votes, is the opinion of the committee or the agreement of the committee. The other two bills are repudiated and rejected. This, therefore, comes in as the result of the deliberations of the joint committee of conference, and the report is nothing more than a statement to the two Houses of what the result of that conference was. What is that result? Why, on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, we propose this to the Senate. And in practice, is there any difficulty on the subject? I am satisfied, from all the experience I have had in both branches of Congress, that the uniform, invariable ble practice, with a single exception, as the Senator from Michigan knows, has been for each House to act at the same instant, if it saw proper, and neither House is compelled to wait until the other has acted, and sent it the papers to be read. He cannot, in the range of his long experience, or in the memory of the oldest inhabitant, find one instance in which it was the case, and the reason is palpable. We cannot act on the Senate bill or the House bill while this report is before us. This report is not amendable, even. It is a finality agreed upon by the two Houses, so far as they were represented on the conference, and no Senator is permitted to move to amend the report; you must either concur in it, or reject it. What subsequent proceedings may take place on the bill, if the conference report be rejected, is a matter entirely separate and distinct from the question before the Senate; for the question now is, will we consider the report?—not the bill; that has been considered in both Houses; it has been considered as long as it can be, until this report is disposed of. There is no other possibility of reaching either the Senate bill or the House amendment, except by rejecting the report of the committee of conference. You can never bring them to the attention of the Senate, or of the House of Representatives, until you reject the report of the committee of conference. The original bill and the House amendment are not before us, and cannot be before us until this report is disposed of.

The question may be asked, would it not be as a matter of information important for a legislator to compare together and read the bills, so as to know the effect of the proposed changes? I answer that might be important; Senators might desire to look at them; and if the Senator from Michigan will say that the object is not delay, not postponement, but that he really does not know what the amendment is which we propose to substitute, that he is entirely ignorant of what the Senate bill was, and the House amendment was, and that he does not want to be taken by surprise, but really wants to institute a comparison, I shall stop to consider his objection; but every Senator, every member of the other House, and every intelligent citizen of the United States, knows at this instant of time the purport of each, and knows with critical exactness the effect of either the bill or the amendment, and can make the comparison. It is accessible; it has been printed; it is in the document room. The Senate bill was printed as passed by order of the other House. The House amendment was printed by order of the Senate. Both have been printed, and in the newspapers; and as a mere matter of information, therefore, they are accessible. As a matter of legal right, they are not pending before the Senate, and cannot be. No question can come up in regard to the admission of Kansas except on the agreement or disagreement to the report of the committee of conference until that report is disposed of; and, therefore, I hold that there is no necessity, there is no propriety, there is no reason, in asking a postponement of this question because the House amendment or the Senate bill is not here. It is no legal right to have them here; it is no legal right to demand the reading of them; they are collateral papers; they are not the papers upon which we vote. That paper upon which we do vote must be read once, and any one Senator may demand its reading. All other papers not constituting the subject-matter upon which the vote is to be cast, can only be read, if objected to, by the order of the Senate, and it appeals to the sound discretion of the Senate. I know full well that the Senate is as well prepared to institute that comparison now as at any other time. If Senators desire to debate it, to defend themselves before the country, to present their positions in a proper light before their constituents, that is all proper, just, and right. So far as I am concerned, I believe the subject has been discussed as much as I wish. I, however, would not intimate a desire to prevent any other Senator from discussing the subject itself as much as he pleases; and I know that all sources of information with regard to the bill, and that which is proposed to be stricken out, are as accessible to him now as if both the bill and amendment were lying on the Secretary's desk. Such being the case—a truth that no Senator will deny—why is it that we stop and quibble upon little points like this? When the country is appealing to us in thunder tones to give it peace, are we to stop upon a little technicality contrary to parliamentary law, and to interrupt all useful legislation? I trust the question will be carried.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not profess to any experience in matters of order; but I want to get at this point, and I cannot conceive that we should necessarily disagree about it. The Senator from Michigan, I thought, made his point of order too early, and I voted against him. I am not quite certain that it is not competent to take up this report; but I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri, who states that this question can be acted upon by either House, how, if that be so, it can be possible that there can be any meaning to the rule which the Senator from Michigan has read as a rule of parliamentary law, which says that when a committee of conference is asked by one body, the papers are to be left in the hands of the committee of the House which accepts the proffer of a conference? I take it that means all the papers—all that admit of legislative action. Now, suppose the committee had reported to strike out the ninth and tenth lines in such a section which was a matter of controversy between the two Houses; suppose they had (as I heard at one time that it was proposed) reported to strike out that portion of the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky which authorized the President, by proclamation, to admit Kansas, and insert a provision requiring the new constitution to come back to Congress: I should like to know how the Senate could have acted on such a report without the bill before them? Would not the report have made such an alteration in the bill that it would be necessary to have the bill before us to enable us to understand it? Would not the whole proposition have remained with the bill itself in the hands of the House that accepted the conference? Would not that have been the case with any other such proposition affecting the disagreeing votes upon which the conference was asked?

Now I say, that in point of fact, when a proposition for a law of this kind has been acted upon by the two Houses, and they disagree, parliamentary law must place it in one House or the other for new action; and wherever that places it, that is the proper House for the action to commence; and then, when it goes through the two Houses regularly, the action will be complete. I can see no difference whether you strike out the whole of an amendment or part of an amendment in point of principle. This it seems, as far as I have heard the report read, strikes out the House amendment and the Senate bill too; so that, in point of fact, there is but little left of the original scheme. What I understand to be the meaning of the law which says the papers shall be left with the House accepting the proffer of a conference, is, that all the papers for the legislative action of the two Houses shall go to that House which accepts the proposition; and I can see no propriety, at least no useful purpose in taking up this report, provided the parliamentary law requires us to have the papers before us when we act. I recollect distinctly that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PUGH] made this very objection, when the two motions were coupled to disagree to the vote of the House of Representatives and to ask for a conference; but I supposed there was a reason for it, and I must confess that I felt I had spoken a little too quick then in asking that the motion be divided. I did not want it divided, on reflection, for fear we should have the papers. I thought there was a little stronger feeling here to get the matter through, by hook or crook, than there would be in the other House, and I wanted them to have the first blow at it.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Mr. President, I have been making several unavailing efforts to obtain the floor for the purpose of moving that this subject be postponed for a short time. Is such a motion in order now?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is on proceeding to the consideration of the report. If the Senate proceed to its consideration, it will then be in order to move to postpone it to a future day.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. But I wish to postpone the whole subject for a day or two. Is not that in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks it is necessary to take up the subject for consideration before a motion to postpone it can be in order.

Mr. HALE. Will the Chair indulge me with a single suggestion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. It strikes me, with great deference, that it is in order to move to postpone the consideration of the question to a given day, by the rule. If the Senator puts his motion in that form, it would certainly be in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The rule says: "That when a question is under debate, no motion shall be received but to adjourn, to lie on the table, to postpone indefinitely, to postpone to a day certain, to commit, or to amend, which several motions shall have precedence in the order they stand arranged."

The rule says "when a question is under debate." This question is not under debate. The report itself is not under debate, and, therefore, it seems to me to be necessary, first to take up the subject before a motion to postpone it can be received.

Mr. HALE. The Chair will indulge me for a moment, as I started this point. The question whether we shall proceed to the consideration of this report, is under debate; and under the rule which the Chair has just read, it is certainly competent for the Senator from Kentucky to move to postpone the consideration of that question either indefinitely or to a day certain; that is to postpone the consideration of the subject under debate, which subject under debate is whether we shall proceed to the consideration of this report. I think, on reflection, the Chair will see that that motion is in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will very readily yield to the suggestions of more experienced Senators; but he has universally seen the course suggested by him adopted, namely, to proceed to the consideration of a question, and then to entertain a motion to postpone it.

Mr. GREEN. I will remark that it is impossible to set the subject for any day without taking it up; and I would suggest also the propriety of permitting it to be taken up, and then let us hear whatever suggestions there may be on the subject of postponing it after it is up. I prefer to have it taken up for consideration now.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I wished to save as much time as I could in the discussion of mere questions of order. May I not attain the object by asking the Senator from Missouri to withdraw his motion? What is it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To proceed to the consideration of the report of the committee of conference, all prior orders having, by a vote of the Senate, been postponed. The motion made by the Senator from Missouri was to postpone the prior orders for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of this report. A division of that motion was called for, and the question was first put upon postponing the prior orders. The Senate having ordered a postponement of all the prior orders, the question now comes up on the remainder of the motion to proceed to the consideration of the conference report.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. But it is objected that we cannot proceed because the bill is not here. That is the argument, and that argument, it seems to me, may as well be postponed for the present.

Mr. COLLAMER. I understand the rule allowing a motion to postpone to be received relates to every question on which the Senate may be called to vote. There is a question before the Senate. The question is whether we will take up or proceed to the consideration of this report. Now, I understand the honorable Senator from Kentucky to move to postpone that question.

Mr. SEWARD. That subject.

Mr. COLLAMER. The rule says "question." The question now before us is, will we proceed to the consideration of the report? That is a question, I take it. If it is not a question we are debating nothing. I understand that question is before the Senate; and, clearly, if there is any question before the Senate, a motion to postpone it is in order.

Mr. GREEN. I would suggest to the Senator from Vermont that this report was, on Friday last, by a vote of the Senate, made the special order for to-day at one o'clock. To-day, to avoid all question about our right to take it up, we moved to postpone all the prior orders. That was ordered by the Senate. It is therefore now up, ["Oh, no!"] but I do not choose even to raise that question; for I prefer avoiding all these little technicalities when the substance can be reached by consulting the feelings of gentlemen around the Senate.

Mr. COLLAMER. I do not know that I understand the gentleman aright. The truth is, Mr. President, that the question of whether we will proceed to the consideration of this report at this time, is a question in itself which will occasion a great deal of debate; and it has already been started on the ground that we cannot properly take up and consider a subject that we cannot properly vote upon; and we cannot properly vote upon the disposition of a bill, which bill we have not here. It is not true that a committee of conference can make two bills out of their report, and send one to the Senate for action, and another to the House of Representatives for action. They can agree upon a report, as they have in this instance, and that report is part of the papers, and goes to the House having the bill. They may make duplicate copies of their report, but that amounts to nothing; for it is, after all, one report, and one bill, and it has not duplicated itself into two bills for action in the two Houses at the same time. Now, without elaborating that point, I say it is a debatable subject whether we can properly proceed to the consideration of this report now; and inasmuch as the question before us is, will we proceed now? and a motion is made to postpone that question, the point is, is that motion in order? I wish to know if this is decided by the Chair not to be in order? for, if so, I shall appeal from the decision. If it is in order, let us try it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will entertain the motion of the Senator from Kentucky, if he understands it.

Mr. COLLAMER. That is enough.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I am not prepared to proceed now to the consideration of this subject. I declare in all sincerity to the Senate that my object is not delay. It is a subject of great consequence, and complicated by the proceedings of the two branches of Congress. I have, to be sure, a general recollection of the amendment which I offered; but I have not had an opportunity of comparing it with the substitute proposed for it. I am not ready to pronounce my judgment upon this subject; and, for the purpose of further deliberation, I ask the postponement of this question for a day or two, and I throw myself on the justice and courtesy of the Senate to allow me that. It is no great space of time that I require. I am not prepared to proceed with the consideration of this subject now; and I move that it be postponed until Wednesday next.

Mr. GREEN called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. BAYARD. I wish to know exactly the motion that we are to vote upon. Is the question considered as up now? or, a motion having been made to proceed to the consideration of the report of the committee, is that followed by a motion to postpone the consideration of that? What is the exact state of the question before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Delaware that the Senator from Missouri moved to postpone all prior orders with a view of taking up this conference report. A division of that motion was called for, and the Senate voted to postpone the prior orders. The question before the Senate prior to the motion now made by the Senator from Kentucky, was, whether the Senate would proceed to the consideration of the conference report? Pending that question, the Senator from Kentucky moves to postpone the consideration of the whole subject until Wednesday next at one o'clock.

Mr. BAYARD. Then, as I understand it, the motion to postpone is out of order, for this reason: the pending motion of the Senator from Missouri is to proceed to the consideration of the report, and that report is not before us, and it cannot be postponed until after it shall have been taken up.

Mr. COLLAMER. That point has been decided by the Chair, and no appeal has been taken.

Mr. BAYARD. If the Chair has decided that the motion is in order, I shall say nothing further; but it strikes me that it is an indirect mode of settling the question. If you refuse to consider, you postpone.

The question being taken on the motion to postpone, by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 25, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Broderick, Cameron, Chandler,

Clark, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Douglas, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, King, Pugh, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Bright, Brown, Clay, Evans, Elitch, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Sebastian, Sidel, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Wright, and Yulee—29.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, will the Senate proceed to the consideration of this report?

Mr. DOUGLAS called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I do not wish to consume time in discussing this question; but it seems to me very extraordinary that we are asked to consider and vote upon a question when, according to the clear parliamentary law, as I think, the question is not before us. The Senator from Kentucky has just stated that he has not had an opportunity of comparing this substitute, reported by this committee of conference, with the House bill for which it is proposed to be substituted, and with the Senate bill as we passed it. He desires time to make that comparison; he is entitled to have those bills before him, in order that the comparison may be made. We are asked to adopt a substitute for a bill that is not before us, and we are not permitted to read the bill for which we are to pass a substitute; we are not permitted to compare their terms.

Now, sir, I respectfully submit that, when I am called upon to vote for an amendment to a bill, it is a matter of right that I shall have the amendment read and the bill read which it is proposed to amend. If the amendment applies to a single section, I have a right to have the section read. If it is proposed to strike out one section and insert another, I have a right to insist upon the reading of the section proposed to be stricken out and the one proposed to be inserted. If we are not entitled to that, how can we vote intelligently on the subject? I understand it to be a matter of right, under the rules, to have them read. How can we do it if they are not before us?

The proposition to proceed to the consideration of the subject now involves that very question. We shall be compelled to vote without the papers before us, and when the papers are in the other House. We are therefore to vote upon an amendment to a bill that is not in the Senate at all, but is in the House of Representatives, not only by law but in fact.

I have always supposed that our rules were made, and parliamentary law was made, to govern the body. I have never supposed that I had any more right to violate parliamentary law, and thus limit the rights of the minority of the body, than I had to decide wrongfully as a judge on the bench, for partisan or any other sinister purpose. I have never yet, on questions involving parliamentary law, or the rights of members under it, varied my vote so as to conform to my political preference, this way or that way. I hold that parliamentary law must be observed, because it is made for the protection of the members; it is the law of the body, and therefore is binding on the judgment and the conscience of each member of the body. I take it for granted that if any member votes to force us to the consideration of a bill that is not here, he construes the parliamentary law that way; but I humbly submit that the law does not so read. The law is that a bill not here in fact, is not here. We all recollect the discussion that took place last Friday, when, in point of fact, this bill was here for a few minutes, but in contemplation of law it belonged to the other House, and accordingly was taken back there.

Now, sir, has not each member of this body an undeniable right to have the bill that we are amending before us? Whenever I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill, and the Secretary says the bill is not here, we have to suspend until we can send for it and get it. I may say "it is only a substitute that I propose;" but the decision at once is that you cannot proceed to consider the substitute until the original bill is before the body. You have the right to have the one read, and then the other; consider each, and say whether you will substitute the one for the other. Then what is the object of denying us this right, or, if you choose so to call it, this privilege? I think it is a right. Why deny it to us? The House of Representatives, I understand, has fixed upon Wednesday for voting on the report.

Mr. TOOMBS. Out of order.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I do not understand that it is out of order to speak of a fact having transpired in the other House; but it is not in order to comment on their proceedings, or to censure their action. I have a right to speak of the fact that a bill has been defeated, or has been passed, or has been set down for action on a particular day in the other House. This measure has been set down for action there on Wednesday. One day's delay reaches that time. It only involves the delay of a day. For what purpose is it that we are to be rushed into a vote on this question without one day to consider it? I do not think it is just; I do not think it is fair. I certainly did not expect to find the Senate denying the request of the honorable Senator from Kentucky—that venerable Senator who was here before some of the members of this body were born; who served with distinction in the Senate before some of those who now deny him the right and privilege of comparing this substitute with his own bill were born. He rises here, and says that he has not had the opportunity of making that comparison; that he does not ask a postponement in any factious spirit. The Senate have in that Senator's character the assurance that he is incapable of asking it for factious purposes, for any sinister purposes, for any other object than that which he announces; and that is, that he has not had an opportunity of making that comparison which is essential to enable him to vote intelligently on the subject.

Then, Mr. President, I submit to the Senate that this attempt should not be persisted in, when it is seen that here is a large body of Senators, if not an absolute majority, who conscientiously believe that it is wrong to press this matter; and certainly the majority who are pressing it are not unaware that they are not unanimous on the point that they have the right to do it. They have members on this floor who they cannot get to vote, because they are conscientious in the belief that it is a matter of right to have the bill here before we can act upon it. There is no party drill that can bring them all up to it. It is a matter of conscientious belief with many that this course of proceeding violates parliamentary law. It is so with me. I do not believe you have any rightful authority to force the Senate to a vote on this question until the papers are here. Then, when it involves that great principle, why not yield to it? We only ask that it be thrown back one day. Why not yield it when you see that there is no factious spirit? There will doubtless be a debate on this question; a debate undoubtedly that will last a day, so that you cannot hope to have a vote here before the vote is taken in the House of Representatives. Why not let us have the papers here and proceed regularly? I am not able to discover the reason, and as a precedent in legislation I think this is dangerous.

The papers must be in one body or the other. We must both agree to the passage of the same law. The act passed in one body must be transmitted to the other for its concurrence. It is not competent for the Senator from Ohio to take one copy of a bill and introduce it here, and for one of his colleagues in the other House to introduce an exact copy there, let each be passed, and then say that it is a law. In that case although each House has concurred in precisely the same bill, word for word, you must exchange it and have a vote on the same identical paper. When it passes this House you must send the paper upon which you act to the other House for concurrence; and if that House precedes you in its action, it must send here for concurrence the paper upon which it acts. The vote must be taken in each House on the same paper. I submit that it is not competent for the House of Representatives to make concurrence there on their report, and for us to make it here leaving the papers there. The vote should be taken there; and then when they have voted, they should send here the report upon which they have voted, accompanied by the bill of the Senate and the House substitute, for us to vote upon those papers; otherwise, you are going to pass as a law that in which both Houses have not concurred; you propose that this House shall vote on one piece of paper, and the other House on another piece of paper. I submit that that cannot be done. You must vote in one House and send the paper to the other, to concur in that paper.

There is a great principle of legislation involved here. It is higher than the consideration of the delay of a single day. I believe it to be a fundamental principle. I think a departure from it is dangerous in legislation. This being the character of the question, and the courtesy of the Senate being appealed to to lay it over for only one day, I cannot yet believe that the Senate will deny a request so reasonable as that. It might be different if the other House had postponed the question for two or three weeks, although I think the right and the law would be the same then; but the question of courtesy would be very different. Under these circumstances, I think we ought to have the time that is asked. I am satisfied that then there will be no unnecessary delay. I am satisfied that there will be no factious opposition to a vote. I am satisfied the debate will not be an unreasonable one in length. I believe we shall save time in the business of the Senate by doing this.

These are my views, Mr. President; and I had hoped that we could go on quietly and courteously, and in conformity with that usage, those rules, and that parliamentary law which have governed us heretofore on such questions.

Mr. TOOMBS. The motion before the Senate is to proceed to the consideration of the report of the committee of conference upon the Kansas bill. The question of order was raised last Friday. It was the desire of the Senate then, I believe, very generally to take up the question; but at the instance of my honorable friend from Kentucky it was postponed until to-day. On this morning, shortly after the hour of one o'clock arrived, we took it up, and had a most elaborate argument on the question of order from the very learned gentleman on the rules from the State of Michigan, who enlightens us frequently—nearly every day—on the subject of rules. We listened to him, as we always do, with a great deal of pleasure. He failed to satisfy us. One of the principal objections to the argument of the honorable Senator from Illinois now is that his argument comes after the verdict has been rendered. The Chair made his decision; it was discussed; it was sustained by the Senate; and after the decision the Senator from Illinois makes his speech. I believe that most of us who felt any interest in the question of order ventured to give our suggestions at the proper time. I even threw in a few of my own poor suggestions on the question of rules, of which I am happy to say I know very little. My honorable friend from Virginia gave his long experience. I was satisfied myself that, according to the rules of both Houses, and according to my own personal observations of Congress, now running back for thirteen or fourteen years, reports of committees of conference are the sole subjects for action when such reports are made; and, according to my recollection, we have again and again, a hundred times in each House, as often as they have come in, established that precedent. I believe it to be in conformity with parliamentary law, and therefore I shall not discuss it, especially as the honorable Senator from Illinois did not give us the benefit of his reasoning on the subject until we had decided it. I do not choose to allow him to keep his knowledge and judgment until we give a wrong verdict. I will not open the case on a question of mere order.

I was surprised to hear the reasons given by the Senator from Illinois—greatly surprised and astonished. I did not know that these Senators had been acting in the dark all this time, and he among them, upon the Kansas question. I supposed it had had their best consideration. The Senate discussed it for months upon months. It passed a bill and sent it to the House of Representatives. That House substituted another bill for it. It came again to this body, and the Senate refused to accept the amendment of the other House. It went back to the House. It was a grave question, considered so by the whole nation, and the House of Representatives deliberately adhered to their position. The Senate insisted and asked for a conference. Then there was the Senate's bill discussed here for months, supposed by the people to have been considered before the Senate with all the lights we could bring to bear upon it; there was the project of the House which had received the judgment of the Senate, and it ought to have been an enlightened judgment; it ought to have been on a full knowledge of its provisions; it ought to have been for want of confidence in its wisdom and its propriety; it ought to have been in the full blaze of light which the subject was entitled to, and which every Senator was bound to give it. We sent these propositions to a committee of conference, and they come back and move an amendment. That amendment was brought in last Friday, and was laid over until to-day, in order that Senators might enlighten themselves on it. We did not suppose they wanted to know what the original Senate bill was. They voted on that after having discussed it for months. We did not suppose they wanted to know what the House amendment was. We supposed they understood it when they voted it down. They were presumed to understand it. It would have been a just cause of offense if I had told the Senator from Illinois: "You voted in the dark, and did not know what you were voting for when you voted to sustain the House amendment; there are provisions there you have not studied; there are things there which are wrong." I would not have been so impolite as to tell any honorable Senator on this floor: "You are voting for what you do not understand, and you affirm whereof you are ignorant."

Therefore, presuming that you knew the Senate's bill, that you knew the House amendment, and have had an opportunity to know this report, I insist that we are not compelling gentlemen to vote in the dark. I insist that, having voted on the Senate bill and the House amendment, I am bound in courtesy to the Senate to presume that they did understand them. Now this report has been brought in, and postponed for a day, that it might be read; and I presume there has been time enough to read it and comprehend it.

Mr. GREEN. It was printed on Friday night.

Mr. TOOMBS. I am informed by one of the committee that it was printed on Friday night. All of us have had the same opportunities to understand it, and I have no doubt these gentlemen are equally as ready to vote as I am. I was ready to vote on Saturday; I am to-day. The objection that they are entitled to have the bill, I will not say is a pretext, but it is an insufficient reason; because I am bound to believe that the honorable Senator from Illinois knows every word of it. His position in reference to this question, his great abilities, his long familiarity with everything connected with Kansas from the day of her birth to this hour, are such that I am constrained to believe he knows every word and every line and every provision of the bill. Then I am quite sure, as to himself, he will vote with a full knowledge of all the facts. He has had time enough since Friday night to understand the bill. It is not being pressed in the dark.

Besides, have we not spent time enough in the discussion of Kansas? Have we not spent time upon it at the expense of all other public business month after month? Are we incapable of deciding subjects here? Why, sir, the gravest questions of peace and war and finance and everything concerning a great Government, are decided in almost all countries in one sitting. Here, after years of labor, seas of words, boundless, illimitable seas of words, and speeches to enlighten others, we come now to what I trust is a consummation of this difficulty, and we are asked for time because gentlemen do not understand it. I do not think they will ever understand it any better. As all events, I am willing to venture my vote on my present judgment.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. President, I certainly mean to be actuated by no factious motive myself. I expect to vote for this proposition whenever it is properly before the Senate; not that I think it is the wisest settlement; not that I mean to give it my entire and unqualified approval; but I shall vote for it as the best settlement of which the case admits. But, sir, in my judgment, the bill is not before the Senate; and this does not result from the want of advisement, for I took the liberty—perhaps it was considered impertinent and annoying at the time—to warn the Senate how this matter would end, and to warn them in time; and what was the answer? Several Senators rose, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. Mason] among the rest, and said he was willing the bill should go to the House of Representatives, and let that House take the responsibility of passing it or defeating it. It was avowed on the floor of the Senate, at that very time, that this case should take just such a position; that the bill might go to the House of Representatives, and let that House take the responsibility of passing it or defeating it. I put in my caveat to the best of my ability. I put it in after having examined the question and all the precedents I could find in our own history and in the British Parliament. I implored the Senate to ask only for a committee of conference, without insisting, the effect of which would have been to retain the bill here, and give us a chance to vote for it; or, if we could find no proposition for a committee of conference, to give us a chance to amend the House amendment without a conference; but it was said, "it shall go to the House." Well, sir, it has gone to the House; it has gone in pursuance of a deliberate decision of the Senate; and now what is proposed? What is the vote to be taken in the Senate? I hear my friend from Missouri say that the Senate bill and the House amendment are not under consideration, and that the committee of conference have brought in a new bill. Very well, sir; let it be read three times, and be sent to the other House.

Mr. GREEN. The Senator is mistaken when he says that I remarked that the committee had brought in a new bill. I said we brought in an amendment to heal the difference or the disagreement, and that it would never be read three times, for it did not come in in the nature of a bill. I have said that explicitly and expressly. How the Senator could misunderstand me is most extraordinary.

Mr. PUGH. I think my honored friend from Missouri will find that the category is as inexorable as death. If it is an amendment, where is the original? How can you vote on the amendment without the original? The thing is impossible. If it is a new bill, let it be read three times and sent to the other House. There is no getting away from the alternative; it is perfectly fatal. The Senate has passed a bill and sent it to the House of Representatives. The House passed that bill with an amendment—that is the form of the expression, and its legal effect. It came back here, and we disagreed to the House amendment; but it was the same bill all the time. What followed? We sent that bill back to the House with a message announcing that we disagreed to their amendment. The House adhered to their amendment to the Senate bill. It was still the same bill all the time. That bill came back here, and we insisted on our disagreement and asked for a conference.

Mr. TOOMBS. My honorable friend will allow me to interrupt him. I stated that I would not argue the question, because there was no point of order before us. The motion is to take up the report, and on that motion the Senator is out of order in arguing a question of order which has been decided.

Mr. PUGH. With due submission to my friend from Georgia, I think I am entitled to give my reasons why I shall vote one way or another on a question, whether those reasons are points of order or points of argument. I have certainly a right to say that, according to my judgment, in parliamentary law, such a question ought not to be now put to the Senate. The Senate may not agree with me, or may agree. It is within the rules of order, in my judgment, for me to assign my reason; and there is nothing disrespectful to any Senator in what I have said.

I say, then, the Senate insisted on its disagreement, the effect of which was to send the bill to the House of Representatives. If we had simply asked for a conference, without insisting, the bill would have remained here. I cited the parliamentary law on that occasion to show that. Now, the committee of conference have made a report; and where is the bill? I am not so certain that it ought to be in the other House; I am not certain that, in point of law, it belongs to the House; but, in point of fact, it is in the House, and we cannot get it without sending for it. If we are entitled to it by the law, which I am rather inclined to think, under the circumstances, we ought to send a message asking for the bill; but we must have the bill before we can proceed another step. In my judgment, we might as well offer a Senate resolution to pass a bill that is now on the files of the House of Representatives. We might just as well offer a resolution in the Senate that such a bill, with such a number, and such a title, now on the files of the House of Representatives, shall become a law. Why, sir, we cannot even reconsider a bill after it has gone out of our possession. We must get it into our possession before a motion to reconsider can be made.

It seems to me that this is a question of very great importance. It is a question that concerns the order of legislation. It is a question of our duty as law-makers. How can we expect men to obey our edicts as laws when we ourselves set our feet on parliamentary law? We lose the confidence and respect of our countrymen when, in our anxiety to carry a given proposition, we trample under foot what is settled parliamentary law for more than two hundred years.

I implore the Senate to pause before it precipitates itself into action like this. We have not the Kansas bill here. If we are entitled to it in point of law—as I rather think we are—let us send a message, and ask the House of Representatives for it on the ground that they have it improperly, and that we ought to have it, and let us proceed in order. Why leave this question open? It has agitated the whole Republic; it has raised more ill blood than any question, probably, since the foundation of the Government. You propose a great measure of peace and conciliation. I take it as a measure of peace and conciliation, and I am anxious for its passage. I will do everything I can for its passage; but I do not want that which is offered as a measure of peace to become a new apple of discord in the country, upon the allegation that it never passed the two Houses of Congress according to the forms of law. Let us be careful, when we are making peace, or professing to make peace, that we do not make war.

Now, I think we should be careful how we proceed on a question involving so many mighty issues as this does. Why insist on passing the bill in this shape, leaving ground for a controversy to arise hereafter whether the bill for the admission of Kansas was ever rightly passed; whether the Senators and Representatives elected from Kansas would be entitled to take their seats in Congress? Why leave all these questions open? What difference do five or six days make? Yea, what difference do five or six months make? But I am satisfied it will all be settled in twenty days. I believe this proposition can pass both Houses of Congress—that is my judgment; I hope it will pass; but I want it to pass in such a form that when the President of the United States approves it, there will be no question behind as to whether it received the vote of the two Houses. Therefore, I implore the friends of the proposition—and I am one of them—to let this matter lie over, as the Senator from Kentucky proposed, until Wednesday or Thursday. By that time it may be that we shall hear from the other House, and have no further controversy.

Mr. GREEN. I do not believe any disposition has been manifested, on this side, to treat the opponents of this report harshly; and I really think a little hard of the Senator from Illinois, and the Senator from Ohio, charging us—

Mr. PUGH. I made no such complaint. The Senator misunderstood me.

Mr. GREEN. Charging us with trampling under foot parliamentary law. We do not so understand it; and there is no judge here to pronounce ex cathedra what the parliamentary law is.

Each member construes it for himself, responsible to the country and responsible to his God. For one Senator to charge others with trampling under foot parliamentary law, when each Senator judges of that law and its purport and meaning as a rule of action for a deliberative body, does not seem to sit very well on my stomach. My opinion about this law is clear; I am liable to err; and I accord to others the same right to construe the law that I claim for myself. I will not say that they are willfully violating the law, parliamentary or otherwise. I have said before, and I repeat now, that the bill has passed both Houses in all the forms of parliamentary law; but as it passed there was a disagreement between the two Houses, and to settle that disagreement the two Houses met together, and, in contemplation of law, they are now in one body, in the rotunda if you please. The conference committee represented them. Do you agree that the act of the conference committee is the only question? It is not the bill; it is not the amendment; and the bill and the amendment never can come before the Senate and House of Representatives, until the House and Senate pronounce judgment upon the act of the conference committee, for they are still legally in that large conference consulting together whether they can agree or not. It is still a matter of interchange of opinion—do we agree upon this point or not? If we agree, it requires no vote upon the bill; it requires no vote upon the amendment.

This is my view of it. This is in accordance with the uniform practice of Congress from time immemorial. Why gentlemen should spring a question now that we cannot act upon the report until a bill is brought before the Senate or House of Representatives, is to me very strange. If we had to act upon the bill, it would be true; if we had to vote upon it, we should be required to have it in our possession; and as we have to act upon the report, we must have that report in our possession. If it be necessary, to explain the report, for wise legislation so as to come to a correct conclusion, to have the bill, that is a matter which addresses itself to the judgment of the Senate, whether they will send for the original bill, or whether they will take printed copies known to be correct; and as we know it can prejudice nobody, as we know there are correct printed copies, we know it is a pretext—not because the bill itself, in its original shape, is not lying on the Secretary's desk—

Mr. FOSTER. Will the honorable Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GREEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. FOSTER. I would ask whether, in the event of the Senate's agreeing to the report of the conference committee, it would be requisite, after a vote thus agreeing, that we should send the report to the other House?

Mr. GREEN. I will answer. We simply inform the House of our action. We do not send anything for them to act upon. We simply inform them that the Senate concur in the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. FOSTER. Pardon me one question further. Suppose the House act upon the report of their conference committee: will they send us the original papers and their vote upon the report, asking our concurrence?

Mr. GREEN. I answer, that they will be sent to the Secretary, because the bill originated in the Senate, and the papers have ultimately to be lodged there. They will not be sent here for our action upon them; but we shall be informed that the House concurs or non-concurs in the report of the conference committee; and then we act, not upon the information coming to us from the House, but upon the report coming before us from the conference committee. That is the distinction between the two cases.

Mr. COLLAMER. Will the gentleman indulge me for a moment?

Mr. GREEN. Certainly.

Mr. COLLAMER. Suppose the House were to agree to this report of the committee to-day: they would then pass the bill in this form. Having agreed to the report, they send it here. Would the question then put to the Senate be, "will you concur in the report of the committee?" or, "will you concur with the House of Representatives in the amendment they have made?"

Mr. GREEN. I answered that question when

I answered the Senator from Connecticut. The question is, "do you concur in the report of the conference committee?" and that is the only question. It is never, whether you concur with the House, they having concurred in the report of their committee. It is, "do you concur in the report of the conference committee?" And hence, as I said in the beginning, the only question that can ever come before the Senate or House of Representatives on this subject, until this report is disposed of, is concurring or non-concurring in the report. It is not on the bill; it cannot be on the bill. Such being the case, I see no propriety whatever for deferring it. So far as the Senator from Kentucky, and others, desire time to look into it, it is a question that addresses itself to our sense of propriety, whether we shall grant the time. I am free to say that I think—

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Will the honorable Senator from Missouri allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GREEN. Let me finish my sentence; but I will hear the Senator.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. My question is, does the conference committee make one report or two reports?

Mr. GREEN. I answer that the conference committee is just as though the two Houses were in one body conferring together, to see if they could agree; and the two branches of the committee of conference, one representing the House of Representatives and the other the Senate, are just the same as the two Houses of Congress, and it requires the concurrence of each House to the action of that committee. Therefore, from the necessity of the case, as the two Houses are not, in fact, in one body, but in separate bodies, there have to be duplicate copies of the report; we have to sign these duplicate copies according to parliamentary law, both the one that comes to the Senate and that which goes to the House of Representatives; and unless they were identically the same, there would be no agreement, and hence the conference would fail. Being identically the same, they are but duplicate copies of the same instrument; but the report coming to you from your own committee, is the subject-matter on which you act; and the report going to the House of Representatives from their committee, is the subject-matter upon which they act; and the moment the two act and concur in what the conference committee have done, then the matter stands adjusted.

Mr. FOSTER. Which of the two bills is to be taken to the President for his approval?

Mr. GREEN. I am a little surprised at the Senator. I suppose he did that to try to throw the argument into ridicule, but he cannot embarrass me in the least.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not intend to embarrass the Senator at all. I put the question in order to get an answer.

Mr. GREEN. There is but one single agreement. The conference committee fix up the disagreement between the two Houses, and put their report here in lieu of the disagreement. The bill was passed before in all the forms of law, but the House of Representatives passed it in one shape and the Senate passed it in another. The two Houses, by joint action, concur by adjusting that point of difference; and the moment that point of adjustment is settled the bill stands passed, and it is enrolled in the form on which the conference committee have agreed, and it then goes to the President to receive his signature. There can be no question raised afterwards as to the binding efficacy of this law, as to whether the Senators from the State of Kansas shall be admitted. The Senator from Ohio anticipates a difficulty that cannot arise. It is a uniform practice, done every day. It is done in conformity to parliamentary law. It is done in conformity to the necessity of the case; it is done in conformity to the rule of common sense and right reason; and I should be astonished to see a new precedent established which must be so difficult of administration in the future as even to block the wheels of Government and stay all useful legislation.

Mr. SEWARD. Mr. President, it was my misfortune to be obliged to differ from the honorable Senator from Missouri, and the committee of conference, in its consultations and in its results. I sincerely hoped, however, that the misfortune might end there. Now I find that the further he attempts to lead me, the greater our divergence is. The question before the Senate is whether we shall take up the report at this time. This motion involves three questions; first, one of courtesy to the honorable Senator from Kentucky, who makes the motion to postpone; second, one of expediency, in regard to the due dispatch of the public business; and third, the question of parliamentary law, whether we can rightly take up the report.

I should be glad to concur with the chairman of the committee of conference, if I could have found him right in any two of these positions; but I am sorry to say that I find him wrong on all three. Why, Mr. President, consider who it is that asks the postponement of this matter as a point of courtesy. It is the honorable Senator from Kentucky, the author of the House amendment to the Senate's bill. It has been rejected by the Senate, although adopted by the House. It is he who, in a parliamentary view, is the author, the person to whom belongs the responsibility of a great measure, which he has introduced with a view to the settlement of a great controversy. Now, consider, if the Senate will, for a moment, the ground upon which he places his request. He distinctly states that it is not for delay. He distinctly states that it is with no factious purpose, but that it is simply and honestly, or, to use his own language—which is always so much more just and accurate than that of almost any other person in the world—it is because he is sincere in declaring that he is not able, not prepared, to discuss this subject to-day, while he trusts, health being spared, he will be the day after to-morrow.

Now, while every member of the Senate knows that it is a responsibility resting upon the Senator to discuss it, and to lead in the discussion, the Senate of the United States hesitates about according that act of courtesy to that Senator. Sir, it is more than twenty years since I first looked from the galleries down into this Chamber, never having indulged an ambition that I should occupy a seat on this floor, and I found that noble man and enlightened statesman a representative from a State then powerful here; I saw him giving direction to the action of the Senate of the United States, and of the country. He has continued either here or in some other department of the Government, to pursue a course of active and patriotic service, ever since, until he stands here the survivor of all his early compeers. I venture to say, you may look through the records of the Senate from the day when his career of service began until now, and you will not find a single instance in which, to friend or adversary, he denied such an act of courtesy as is asked by him now at the hands of those who were children or striplings when he was at the zenith of his political fame.

Now, in regard to expediency—the expediency of the transaction of the public business. Why, sir, we on this side of the Chamber, unable to demand a registry of the yeas and nays, are regarded as acting factiously in all that we do. On the contrary, we are a political force, a power in the Senate. We can be heard; we must be heard. We act under the same responsibilities with the majority; we have the same accountability to our country; and the difference is probably very little between the service rendered the country by a faithful and patriotic minority in the Senate of the United States, and the service of the most enlightened majority; the one may hold back the Government from wrongful or injudicious action too tenaciously, and the other may crowd injurious measures too fast, where both parties are equally honest.

Now, sir, it is my belief that this question will be settled just as soon—and I hope it may be settled all the more wisely—for allowing to the honorable Senator from Kentucky the privilege which he asks, of preparing himself for leading in this debate. Nor is it a trivial measure that he proposes to discuss; for this report presents a new measure altogether. It is not the one which was recommended by the President of the United States; it is not the one which was matured by the Senate of the United States, after such long debate; it is not the one which was proposed by the House of Representatives; but, in material and important features, it differs from them all. I say that it is unreasonable to require the honorable Senator from Kentucky to proceed in this debate without the preparation which he thinks necessary.

Sir, we are told that the question was up on Friday, and that it was up on Saturday, and that a Sunday has intervened, and that to-day is Monday, and another day will intervene before Wednesday. Who is there among us who can look into the condition, the circumstances, and the occupations of any other Senator, the state of his health, of his affairs, and say that he is not sincere when he avers that the time which has been allowed, and which has been enough for us, has proved insufficient for him? None of us.

Now, in regard to the question of right and parliamentary law, I think that the written law on this subject is perfectly plain. According to that law, this bill is in the House of Representatives; and this proposition, being nothing more than an amendment to a bill, which bill is not here, but is in the House of Representatives, presents just exactly the same question which would occur if an individual Senator were to rise in his place, and propose the same amendment, in the same words, to a bill now pending in the House of Representatives. The fact that this amendment has come from the committee of conference does not alter the nature or effect of the transaction in the least; for, as was so well said by the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PUGH,] it is either a new bill, and therefore must be read three times before it can pass, which is a reductio ad absurdum, or else it is an amendment; and if it is an amendment, and not an original or new bill, then it is an amendment to something, and it cannot be an amendment to anything that is here, and can only be an amendment to a bill which is somewhere, which bill is not here, but is in the House of Representatives. It is a practical as well as legal impossibility for the Senate to amend a bill which they have not the custody of, and which is not before them; for the effect of passing the amendment, or concurring in the report, is to stamp that amendment upon the identical parchment upon which the bill is written, and obliterate from the bill the matter for which the amendment is substituted.

Against this view of the subject, which is sustained by logic as well as by the written parliamentary law, what is offered? Why, that we are accustomed to depart from this practice. I believe that is so; but we have departed from it heretofore simply for the reason that the objection was never made, the question was never raised, and therefore all these cases of departure, though they were as frequent as the snow-flakes in winter, are of no value as precedents; and the question being now raised, and raised upon a very important bill, in one of the most important transactions which has ever come before Congress, it is an imperative duty to settle the practice according to parliamentary law, so that the precedents which have taken place heretofore shall not mislead us or our successors hereafter.

Mr. BELL. I should not say a word on this subject, but I think the motion to take up this report while the papers continue in the other House, is so irregular, so regardless of all safe forms of proceeding established by parliamentary law, that every Senator ought really to consider seriously whether, when that point and its consequences are fairly weighed, he ought to support this motion as a question of order; whether it is parliamentary; whether it is proper according to the rules and laws of proceeding in this body, that this question should be taken up now or at any time until the papers are returned to the Senate. I know that some honorable Senators have said it is done regularly and constantly; they say numerous instances may be found; but I venture to assert that there is not an instance on record where any such report as this has ever been acted upon by the Senate or House of Representatives, in the absence of the bill, or what are called, in parliamentary language, the papers. I am utterly astonished at the course taken by the honorable Senator from Virginia, [Mr. HORTER,] because he knows the value of adhering to parliamentary forms. These forms are matters of substance; they are of the greatest importance to the country in securing regularity, certainty, deliberation, in the enactment of laws and in preventing impositions. That no man in this body knows better than the honorable Senator from Virginia. I challenge him to produce a single instance where, upon a question of any importance, such a proceeding as this ever took place in this body where it was objected to. He can refer to the Journals to show that, in numerous instances at the close of the session, when, unless the Senate and House of Representatives proceeded somewhat in an irregular manner, there would be no appropriation bills passed, or some material one of them omitted, conference reports may have thus been acted upon without the original bill being in possession of the body; but no other instances can be shown; and in those cases it was allowed simply because objection was not made.

The honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. PUGH] has put this case in a perfectly clear form. The honorable Senator from Missouri, [Mr. GREEN,] however, tells us that there is no parliamentary law, or that, if there is, each gentleman must decide it for himself. He asks why, in reason, it should not be so, and he says the substance of the thing is all we need look to. I understood him to say that no gentleman could get up and declare that the law is this way, or that way; for each gentleman must decide for himself.

Mr. GREEN. That is exactly it; and we claim the same right to say what the law is as anybody else.

Mr. BELL. Now, I will ask the honorable Senator to tell me what parliamentary law he referred to when he spoke of the manner of making these reports by the managers of each House making a report to their own House. I say it is, at last, a joint report signed by all.

Mr. GREEN. I will answer.

Mr. BELL. I want to know the parliamentary law to which the Senator referred.

Mr. GREEN. I will answer. At the time I spoke, I had special reference to the parliamentary law that has grown up in the United States, in the Congress of the United States, and in the State Legislatures. I know that all parliamentary law originated in usage. Common sense, right, reason, is the foundation of the whole of it, and in the United States this has been the practice.

Mr. BELL. Is it so written anywhere?

Mr. GREEN. Yes; in many places. I have not the book and page; but I will promise to produce it, if that will satisfy the Senator.

Mr. BELL. If there is a parliamentary law of that kind, I ask the Senator to produce it if he pleases. I deny that there is any such parliamentary law binding on the Senate.

Mr. GREEN. I will produce it if the Senator will produce any law which prohibits either House from acting after a report from a joint committee of conference is made, until the other House has acted. No Senator can produce it, because there is no such law.

Mr. BELL. I know there is no such express law, though it is plainly deducible from what is written; and there are a hundred other cases on which you act every day without any express law. What law is there that regulates the congruity or incongruity of amendments? What law have you for the regulation of debate generally? The few rules that are put down, and numbered in the list of what are called the rules of the Senate, are but a small portion of the law by which we are governed. There are other, and very important and essential parliamentary rules, by which we are governed every day, unless we transgress them—rules founded in common sense and long-established usage, the wisdom of many of which has been proved, as the Senator from Ohio has said, for two hundred years.

When I challenge the honorable Senator from Virginia to show any case like the present, I am in earnest about it. The honorable Senator from Missouri said that this is not a new bill. I say it is a new bill. I have never seen such a report as this from a committee of conference. I beg pardon of the honorable Senator from Missouri when I say that I do not consider that this report is made in a parliamentary form; and when I speak of a parliamentary form, I mean a lawful form; for the laws of Parliament are a part of the laws of the land, and of great importance to be observed. In a question of very great and pressing exigency, I should not be a stickler for forms in a particular case; but in every departure from them, I would protest against that departure being taken for a precedent, because I consider them of the greatest importance to be generally observed.

I have said that I never before saw such a report as the present, and I do not think there is any such on record in either House of Congress, whatever may be found in the rules for the regulation of State Legislatures. What is it?

"The committee of conference appointed to consider the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment to the Senate bill No. 161, entitled 'A bill for the admission of the State of Kansas,' report that they have had the subject under consideration." * * * "and have agreed upon an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the House amendment to the Senate bill."

Now, there is no such thing known in our parliamentary law governing the proceedings of the two Houses of Congress as a substitute. The meaning of that is a new bill; it is not an amendment. According to parliamentary law, a committee of conference cannot strictly report an entirely new bill, though they can propose amendments which alter the nature of the original bill in its substance and meaning to such a degree that the mover of it would not know it as his bill, and would not vote for it. All that is in the power of the committee of conference to do, if they agree among themselves; and, in fact, it is in the power of the Senate or the House of Representatives to do the same thing by agreeing to amendments moved by the enemies of the bill. That is not what I complain of; but I find fault with this report in a parliamentary sense. Committees of conference cannot report any amendment or agreement that is not parliamentary in its nature. Let me give a single illustration. The committee of conference that we have had on this subject could not report an alteration of any part of the original bill to which both Houses had agreed. If both Houses had agreed to a part of the bill, it would be a violation of the law for the committee of conference to propose to change that part of it. The Manual says:

"At free conferences, the managers discuss viva voce and freely, and interchange propositions for such modifications as may be made in a parliamentary way."

That is, subject to parliamentary rules—that which I have just mentioned, for one, and others. Again:

"Amendments may be made so as to totally alter the nature of the proposition; and it is a way of getting rid of a proposition by making it have a sense different from what it was intended by the movers, so that they vote against it themselves. (2 Hats. 79-8, 82, 84.) A new bill may be ingrafted by way of amendment on the words 'be it enacted,' &c. (1 Grey 190, 192.)"

The committee of conference, by their report, have not even left the words "be it enacted," of the original bill. They report what is literally a substitute, and they themselves speak of it as "in the nature of a substitute." They do not even leave the few words "be it enacted" upon which to ingraft a new bill; and yet they do actually report a new bill. I say this is unparliamentary. The Senator from Ohio was perfectly right when he said that this proposition was a new bill, and it will no more have passed constitutionally when the Senate agrees to the report, than will any other paper lying on your table, totally unacted upon by Congress. There is not a shred of the original bill left. The substitute relates to the same subject-matter, and that is the only connection between them. You cannot alter or amend this report; you must take it just as it is. That is another parliamentary rule.

These objections may be considered technical; but they are taken according to the parliamentary law, and under the parliamentary law, and I think they are good objections. The committee do not leave the title or the enacting clause of the original bill; and the proposition which they report is just as much a new bill as if we had never acted on the subject. There are provisions in this substitute which require some consideration. There are some new features in it. It relates to the same old subject to be sure; and as the Senator from Georgia has said, we have heard a great deal about it, and we are likely to hear more about it; but the whole question is now presented in a new aspect—one that requires some consideration. The honorable Senator from Kentucky has informed us that he really wishes to compare it with the amendment which he proposed in the Senate, and which, with some slight alteration, was agreed to by the House of Representatives. Many of us desire to look into it, and see how far it affects the ground on which some of us supported the original bill, and on which some of us voted against the original bill.

I do not ask any great length of time for myself. As for my single self, perhaps I should be willing to go into the discussion now, but I think some consideration of a few days might be important. The great objection to this proposition now is, that it is totally unparliamentary and out of order to proceed to the consideration of this report now, and I think it is a matter of substance, a matter of principle—public principle—to take a stand against its consideration.

I profess, I trust sincerely, not to have any factious views. I have no reason for wishing that the question should be staved off for two or three days, if the measure is to pass. It is possible that I may support it myself, though I do not think it very probable; but I am only putting the case, and I stand here upon what I consider a matter of substance and principle in opposing the taking up and consideration of this subject now.

If we were to agree to this report to-night, what should we do? Should we order it to be engrossed, and direct the Secretary to inform the House of Representatives that we had agreed to it? Which House is to order the engrossment of this new bill? The honorable Senator from Ohio is perfectly right in saying that if the two Houses agree to this report in this form, it will be a bill that will not have passed according to the constitutional requirement—that will not have passed three readings in the Senate. Taking it for granted, however, that that question is out of the way, I ask which House orders the engrossment of the new bill? Do we order the engrossment of this amendment in the nature of a substitute, as the committee call it, and send it to the other House, or do we merely inform that House that we agree to the report? We originated this bill. The House that acts finally upon it may order it to be engrossed. Then we need not do it. I suggest these questions to show the difficulty in which we are involving ourselves. These are questions which you have no fixed forms of practice to regulate. I am sure there is no precedent for such a proceeding as this, and the main objection to it is, that if it be pursued, the bill will not have passed according to the constitutional forms of the Senate and House of Representatives.

The practice to which the Senator from Virginia has alluded, has been at the close of the session, in acting upon reports of committees of conference on the appropriation bills, when a few minutes' delay might be fatal to some important measure. Here I would recall the minds of honorable Senators who have had seats here for any length of time, to the fact that we sometimes make great mistakes in acting on these reports. In regard to the general appropriation bills, there is hardly ever a case in which the Senate act understandingly upon the reports of the committees of conference. Sometimes there are upwards of one hundred amendments, and the reports merely recite their numbers, and no persons but the members of the committee know anything about them. They propose that we recede from some fifty amendments, and insist upon fifty other amendments, and agree to other amendments with amendments. We do not know what they all are, and we run great hazard, and sometimes actually get into difficulty by agreeing to such reports. Generally they have been allowed to pass without any serious opposition, because we had not time to consider them. I have had considerable experience in both Houses, and I can safely say that I have never known any instance where I supposed action would not be deferred or postponed until the bill was here, unless in such cases as I have mentioned in regard to the appropriation bills at the close of the session, when we are in danger of losing very important measures, and no person thinks of objecting; but even then if the point was made, it seems to me, it would always have been the duty of the Chair to rule that we could not proceed to act unless the papers were before us. The papers must be before us because there is nothing to which to attach the amendment of the conference committee unless we have the original bill.

Mr. BRIGHT. I desire to make one remark simply on the point of order. If it is proposed to postpone the consideration of this subject with the view of giving my friend, the honorable Senator from Kentucky, an opportunity of speaking, of course I shall not object. That Senator knows that I would yield this courtesy to him as willingly and as readily as to any other gentleman of the body; but I cannot consent to a postponement at this time, on the ground that it would be unparliamentary to proceed with the question in the shape in which it is now presented to us. I dissent entirely from the positions taken by the honorable Senator from Ohio. When Senators inquire for the law that authorizes us to proceed to vote upon this report in its present shape, I ask for the law that prevents a majority (those in favor of the report of the committee) from doing so.

The honorable Senator from Virginia was correct when he said that this body is governed more by usage than by parliamentary law, and that what is proposed to be done in this instance has been an every-day practice of this body for the last twelve years. For instance, legislation has been exhausted upon a measure that is before the Senate and House of Representatives without a concurrence of sentiment or opinion. What is the next step? A committee of conference, empowered by the parliamentary law that governs our action, to consult and agree upon such change or modification as, in their opinion, will be most likely to secure the concurrent agreement of the respective Houses they represent; and when (as in the case before us) they have agreed, they report to the respective bodies to which they belong. And, sir, it is entirely immaterial whether they report one or more amendments to the original bill referred to them, or whether they report that they have agreed upon a substitute for the original bill. Their report is an entirety; it cannot be amended, or agreed to with an amendment. The single question, and the only question that can be submitted to the Senate, is: "Will the Senate agree to the report of the committee of conference?" If a majority vote to agree to that which the committee have thus reported, it is the law, so far as the Senate is concerned; and if a majority of the House give a like vote, it is followed by a like result, and no further action is required by either body to make it a law; but if either the Senate or House disagree to the report of the committee, the measure falls (as parliamentarians term it) between the two Houses, unless it should be the pleasure of each House to agree to a second committee of conference.

Now, sir, a few words as to the objection urged here with such pertinacity that we must suspend all action until the original bill is before us. Allow me to say there is nothing in this point; it is the first time I have ever known it made in a like case, and such cases as this are of common occurrence. I can find you precedent after precedent sustaining the principle contended for by the honorable Senator from Missouri, having charge of this bill. Only last Congress the Army appropriation bill was lost on a disagreeing vote of the two Houses, and in consequence an extra session was called. The conferees of the two Houses failing to agree, reported that disagreement to their respective Houses simultaneously; no point of order was raised that the Senate was not in possession of the bill, or that the House was not in possession of the bill; no denial of the parliamentary right of the Senate to vote on the usual motions, or of the House to do the same thing; and so in case after case that I have witnessed here. I repeat sir, there is nothing in this point of order. It is wholly immaterial where the original bill is. It ought in my opinion to be on our files. It originated in the Senate, and properly belongs to the Senate files, and for aught I know or have heard, it is accidental that the Senate's committee did not return it. But, Mr. President, the original bill, for all legislative and practical purposes, is here. It is on or under the desk of every Senator. I have it here; it was placed on my files the day after it was ordered to be printed weeks ago. We are as fully informed on this subject as though every Senator had the original bill in his drawer. Turn this subject over as you may, apply all the parliamentary objections you can, it is narrowed down at last to the simple question, "Will the Senate agree to the report of the committee?" and that question can as well be taken without the bill as with it, as well to-day as to-morrow, and if my vote can aid to produce that result, it will be thus given.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not purpose to detain the Senate long, as I am not very well skilled in parliamentary law. I think forms ought always to be adhered to for the purposes for which they exist—in a legislative body for the purpose of the orderly conduct of business; but when they are pressed beyond that extent, you make the form pervert the object of the form. The honorable Senator from New York has placed the point which we have to decide on three grounds. One I shall not notice—the question of expediency; because that is a matter for the will of a majority of the Senate, and each Senator will decide it for himself. The questions of courtesy and parliamentary law I propose briefly to notice; and first as to the parliamentary law.

Parliamentary law must necessarily consist, either of the written and express rules of the particular body, or of usage—usage adopted by that body in the same sense in which you speak of the common law in this country. It takes its origin in England; but it has its modifications in each State. So, too, of the parliamentary law. There are a vast number of instances of parliamentary decisions in England which never have been and never would be adopted here. Then, if you take the first basis of parliamentary law, to wit, the written rules of the body, is there any written rule of the Senate which prohibits the majority of the body from acting on the report of a committee of conference without having before them the bill to which it relates? None, I believe; and I presume it will not be so contended. There is no written rule, no express rule, which inhibits the Senate from acting on the report of the committee of conference without the bill to which that report relates, or out of which it arises, being before them.

If there be no such express rule, the next point is, what is the usage? The question of usage must necessarily refer to your own body; and I would ask whether, in the history of this Government, it has not been an every-day practice to act upon the reports of committees of conference without reference to whether the bill was in the one House or the other, either technically or in fact? It has been so for a very plain reason. The subject is before you, on which you are to vote as an entirety, in the report of the committee; you cannot amend it: The only question you can take is, whether you will assent to, or dissent from, that report. If you dissent from the report, without having the original papers, you may proceed no further; but, until the report is adopted or rejected, you have nothing before you but that report for action. You may refer to collateral matters; you may compare it with the original bill; but is there any usage of the Senate which requires that, for the purpose of acting on the report of the committee, (on which you are confined, by your vote, simply to assent or dissent,) you should have the original bill before you? Is there any usage which requires it so imperatively that, if a solitary member of the Senate pleases to demand it, he may obstruct the will of the majority, and refuse to allow them to assent or dissent, until that paper comes here? According to my recollection, the usage has been exactly the contrary. We have acted upon reports the moment committees of conference have reported; and it has always been considered a privileged question that the committee of conference can report at any time, interrupting other business; and we can proceed at once to the consideration of that report, and say whether we assent or dissent. What the effect of that is, is another matter. Whether it passes the bill, or does not pass the bill, is another question.

In the next place, without regard to the practice, is it more rational, is it a wiser usage, is it more calculated to promote the orderly conduct of business to allow a single member of the Senate to require that an original bill shall be read before you can proceed to act upon the report of a committee of conference, which you have been in the habit of acting upon, no matter whether the original bill was in one House or the other? or is it better that the question of the propriety of having the original bill before you when you decide upon the report of the committee, should be left to the judgment of the majority of the Senate? Which would be the wiser rule? Is there danger of abuse? If it was not a mere technical matter; if it was necessary for the purpose of understanding and comparing the original bill with a proposed amendment, or with a report of a committee of conference, is there any danger that a majority of the Senate would refuse to send for that bill if it was not here, or allow it to be read? Ought not the power to be with the majority of the Senate, or is it wiser to allow a single member to say, "technically this bill is in the other House, in fact it is in the other House; it is true we have only to vote on the report of the committee of conference; we have had the subject before the Senate for months, and discussed it; we have had the amendments printed, and we know exactly what they are; the report embodies what by way of amendment is a substitute for either; we have all the information in fact before us; but I choose, on a technical ground, to obstruct the business of the country to require that we shall have technically before us the bill, before you shall act on this report, though the vote must be taken solely on the report of the committee of conference?" Such a rule as that is not founded on reason; it is not calculated to promote the objects of all parliamentary law, and all parliamentary rules—the orderly conduct of public business.

It is not safe, it is not necessary to intrust such a power to any single member of the Senate, because if it is requisite, for the proper understanding of the report, that the original bill or any amendment shall be before you, the presumption must necessarily be that the majority will be willing to have before them all matter which is necessary to enable them to decide upon the subject on which they are called to vote. Whenever that point comes, it will be time enough to decide it. The question now is as to proceeding to the consideration of the report. I can find no written rule of the Senate which prohibits a majority from considering the report of a conference committee, whether the original bill to which it relates is in one House or the other; I can find no parliamentary usage of that kind; but, on the contrary, the usage is directly the other way; and when I come to reason upon the propriety of the matter, it seems to me far safer to leave the majority of the body to determine whether, under the particular circumstances when the report has been read, they think for their information it is necessary that the original bill shall be before them; or whether they are prepared to vote on that report, which is unamendable, and on which the sole question for action is, will you or will you not agree to it?

As to the question of courtesy, there is no man in this body who would yield greater deference to the honorable Senator from Kentucky than I would, but there is a limit to all questions of courtesy. You cannot on the ground of courtesy agree that a dangerously distracting subject, which has occupied the time of the Senate far more than any question during the session, which has obstructed public business, shall be further delayed, (especially when you have already fixed a definite period for the duration of the session,) in order to accommodate any individual Senator, however distinguished he may be, for mere purposes of discussion, when you know the fact which cannot be denied, that the original bill was under discussion for a period of two months, and, therefore, every Senator must be presumed to know what it contained: that the amendment made in the House of Representatives came to us, and was acted upon by us, and, in the language of the Senator from New York, the honorable Senator from Kentucky was the author of that amendment, and, if so, of course he understands all its provisions, and its scope and object. Then the only remaining thing to be considered, if you choose to look into this matter, is the substitute by way of amendment reported by the conference committee, and that is before you in their report. There is, therefore, no element of knowledge that will not be fully before every Senator in the discussion of this question if you take up the report now. I would yield, as a matter of courtesy, to the honorable Senator from Kentucky, but that I think it is time this question should be disposed of, not only because it is a harassing and agitating one, but because the public time and public business require it. The termination of the session has been fixed, and this question has already absorbed a very undue portion of our time. I have one further reason. Although the desire of the honorable Senator from Kentucky may be very frankly and fully stated, though he only wishes to look into this matter for further information, there cannot be a doubt that on the part of those who are opposed to a settlement of this question, prolongation of time for the purpose of agitation is desired; and to that, apart from any consideration of courtesy, I am utterly opposed.

Mr. CAMERON. I am exceedingly anxious to have this question disposed of. I was desirous of having it disposed of on Friday; for I was anxious to go home and attend to some matters of great importance to myself. When it could not be disposed of on Friday, I was desirous to have it postponed from that day until to-morrow. The postponement from Friday until to-morrow would have been a matter of more consequence to me than my pay during the session. I have remained here with the hope that it would be disposed of, but I now see that there is no probability of having it disposed of for some time longer. It is nearly five o'clock; I do not wish to be here all night; I have some unpleasant recollections connected with night sessions. I have never seen them do any good; and in the hope that to-morrow we shall come here and dispose of this subject in a proper manner, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. SLIDELL called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and, being taken, resulted—yeas 22, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Douglas, Durkee, Foster, Hamlin, Harlan, Kennedy, King, Pugh, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bright, Brown, Clay, Evans, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Sebastian, Slidell, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Wright, and Yulee—29.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I wish to make a few remarks on this question of order; and it is almost the first point of order on which I have ever spoken, for I am not well versed in the parliamentary code. It seems to me there are some principles and reasons of great importance which apply to the question now under discussion, and I therefore desire to express my opinions upon it. The question is whether we can proceed to act upon the report of the committee of conference, the bill being properly and actually in the possession of the other House? I think we cannot; and it is very important to us that the rules regulating our proceedings, particularly those which regulate the communication between the two Houses, should be faithfully observed. It must be obvious to all that it is necessary to the certainty of our proceedings, for the relations that ought to exist between the two Houses, that we must have some rules on this subject; that without them the two Houses would be running into constant conflict the one with the other, and our whole proceedings would degenerate into disorder and confusion. Some law is necessary; and if no other reason could be given for it than that it was necessary to preserve the regularity of our proceedings, that would be reason enough for the rule.

Now, what is the rule in relation to this matter? That is the question at issue. By all analogy it would seem to be that we cannot act on the subject while the bill which contains it is legitimately and properly in the possession of the other House. It is there because they have a right to primary action on the subject; and if they have a right, in a parliamentary sense, to primary action on the subject, we can have no right to displace their prior action by ours. Is not that very plain and reasonable? In the state of this business, one House must act before the other; one House has a right to act before the other. The House in possession of the subject, as we express it, must be the House which has the right; and a feather may turn the scales where they are equally poised. The possession of the paper gives the right to the House having that possession; the subject is in their hands, and in a parliamentary sense those papers which contain the subject are to pass from that to the coordinate House.

Then, in this case, where ought the action to begin? Shall we reverse it, and begin where the papers are not? or shall we, yielding the precedence to them, wait for their action? That is the question; and it is a question of some substance. Suppose that we undertake to act now on the subject, before the other House, who are in possession of the bill, in possession of everything that we are, and also in possession of the bill which we are not in possession of; and suppose, upon receiving a communication from you that you had acted on the subject and sent them the result of your labors, they were to reject it, and send it back: if the parliamentary law is that they have the right of precedent action, they would, as a consequence, have a right to refuse to receive your communication, and to send it back, with the inquiry whether you intended, by thus usurping the subject, to influence the other House, by substituting your decision for theirs, or making it before theirs? Would there not be danger of producing collision or strife between the two Houses? Would not the possibility or apprehension of such cases have been sufficient to require that a rule should be made by which such questions should be governed, and all such possible collisions obviated? It seems to me to be so.

What is the question now presented? Let us stick to the letter, as gentlemen seem disposed to do in their arguments. They say the Senate is to act upon nothing but the report. Well, sir, what is that report? Is it anything more than a proposition agreed upon by two committees to amend the bill? I do not know whether that is the proper term; my friend from Tennessee thinks it is not. I understand from him that a substitute is a distinct thing from an amendment; and yet, in one sense, it is an amendment. You undertake, then, to amend a bill, or to adopt a substitute for a bill, (for that will be the result of your vote confirming this report,) which bill is in the other House. Could you, by any possibility, without violating the plainest rules, undertake, when a bill was in possession of the other House, through a committee of this body to offer an amendment to it? Or must you have the bill in your possession before you can proceed to any process of alteration or amendment? I say, then, this is a case that departs from all analogy; for you can by no process amend, change, or alter a bill which has passed out of your hands into the hands of the other branch. Can you do so through the intervention of a committee of conference? Where is the necessity for it? If there was any overruling necessity for it, that necessity might be argument enough against the application of an analogous rule here; but where is the necessity for it? If the other House never choose to act, your labor here is altogether superfluous. If they do choose to act or are prepared to act, that action will be made known to you in due time for your action, and we shall go on orderly and in a parliamentary train: otherwise, all is inverted. Some gentlemen scoff at the idea of rules as technicalities; but these technicalities, if gentlemen are so pleased to call them, are absolutely necessary to the transaction of business in either House, and absolutely necessary to the communications to be made between the two Houses.

Gentlemen talk about usage. Have any of them been able, though they talk about usage, to point us to a solitary instance where this has been done, unless it passed in a hurry and sub silentio? Where is the case? But one solitary case has been presented, though they have been spoken of as common cases, particularly by my honorable friend from Delaware. I say it is extraordinary. I say that no such case that I know of, or ever heard of, has existed. Where has there been a bill which, passing through the hands of a committee of conference who have agreed upon a report, has gone into the possession of one House, and the other House has attempted to act first upon the report? Where is the case? If it is a familiar usage, the cases will be recollected. The only case which has been cited, I will show you in half a dozen words, has no application to this question. The Senator from Virginia cited a case in the House of Representatives, where, upon the report of a conference committee proposing an alteration, an amendment in one section of a bill, and a member calling to have the bill read, the Speaker decided that he had no such right, and refused permission to have the bill read. Now observe the reason. It was not said "the bill is not here;" there was no question made whether in the absence of the bill the House could act; the bill was there for all I know and for all the case as read states; but the House did not think it necessary that the whole bill should be read. The report of the committee of conference stated distinctly the question—strike out A and insert B in such a section of the bill. Where was the necessity of having the other sections of the bill read, when this proposition referred merely to the amount of an appropriation made in a particular section? We may suppose there that the report of the committee of conference stated distinctly what was to be stricken out and what was to be inserted in a particular section of a bill having many sections. There the whole question is presented: shall the appropriation stand (to illustrate it) at $100,000, or shall it be $200,000? The committee have said it shall be $200,000.

Now, sir, what analogy is there between that case and this? In the first place, that case does not present the present question at all. That case does not state that that bill was in the possession of the Senate. That case does not deny that it was in the possession of the House, and there upon the table; and the report was of an amendment in a particular not affected by the general context of the bill, for aught we know, and which I suppose to be the case; and the Speaker very properly decided that the other portions of the bill were not pertinent to, or affected by, the particular amendment, and therefore there was no occasion to read the whole bill. That is not the case here.

It is impossible, sir, but that you and every Senator can see the entire difference between the two cases. A member had the right to have the report read, and the amendment—the words to be stricken out, and the words to be inserted, which constituted the amendment. That was admitted. Now what is asked here? To read the part proposed to be stricken out. There it was granted that it might be read. A Senator has now asked for the reading of the part proposed to be stricken out here, that he may understand it. It is not here, and cannot be read. Now, is that case any argument whatever against the rule which is here insisted upon? Upon your judgment, Mr. President, as the custodian of our rights here, so far as they depend on the rules of the Senate, we rely in the first instance, and have to rely for the proper order of the Senate being preserved. To me it seems a clear case. To me it seems clear that to deny this request is the exercise of an unlimited majority power—to carry into effect their wishes without regard to what the parliamentary law has prescribed.

I say then, sir, there is no case which, when considered for a moment, has the least application, or relevancy, or analogy, to the present question. If you are now to decide it for the first time, if it be a new question, really it is only such in its specific form. The reasons which govern all analogous cases, all amendments, all changes and alterations of bills, require that you should have the possession of the bill upon which you propose to act; and it is not material whether the amendment to it be proposed by one of our own committees or by a committee of conference. That does not make the slightest degree of difference. Let gentlemen satisfy the Senate if they can that there is a difference in that respect. If a committee of the Senate were to propose an amendment to a bill which had passed to the other House, would you receive it? would you act upon it? Certainly not. A committee of conference is but a committee; and though they act jointly with another, yet when you act on the amendment which they propose to you as the result of their conference, you can only act upon it when you have the bill to which it is an amendment.

Gentlemen say that we are well acquainted with this subject, because we have had it under consideration for a long time. Why, Mr. President, the judge, before he goes into court, may be perfectly satisfied how a case ought to be decided; he may have heard in common parlance all about the case; but can he judicially decide it until he judicially hears the legal evidence upon which it is to depend? Now, sir, I doubt exceedingly whether there is a gentleman here who can tell me the number of sections that are contained in the bill proposed to be stricken out by this substitute. It is said we are all perfectly acquainted with it. When we pass laws we are supposed to be exceedingly accurate. Like the judge who must have the record before him when he decides the case, and who can go by nothing else, we must have the bill before us when we act upon it. That is the parliamentary source of knowledge, and none other; and he would be an exceedingly incautious legislator who would vote otherwise than upon that source of knowledge.

Mr. President, I am supposed above all others, having proposed an amendment to the Lecompton bill in this House, to know all about it. If I were to be sworn at this moment, I could not undertake to tell you all the substance there is in that amendment. I could tell you the substance of that which I prepared myself, but it underwent many alterations and amendments in the House of Representatives. There were some additions to it. I do not know whether they were material or not; I think I did not so consider them at the time. The substitute adopted by the House of Representatives in place of the Senate's bill, did not come back to us in the words, and limited to the purposes of my amendment. Details were added; there were alterations of several sections. I do not wish to profess ignorance on this question; I understand the general purpose; but I am now talking about a parliamentary law which intends that everything shall be certain, and that everything shall be accurately and understandingly done. If, instead of proposing to strike out the whole bill, the committee of conference, as an amendment, had proposed to strike out five lines in one of its sections, might not the reading of the section of the bill containing the words to be stricken out have been demanded in order that I might see what they were? I may understand the bill very well, but I may not understand the coherence of the proposed addition or amendment with the other matter of the bill. I may not apprehend its effect and bearing on the whole section, unless that section is before me, and I can have the bill read to verify it all.

This is the view I take of the subject, and I do not propose to enlarge upon it. It seems to me in my poor limited judgment—for such I really admit my judgment to be on all questions of mere order—a plain question. The fact that I say so is no great evidence that what I say is right. I express only the confidence of a man who knows little on the subject of which he speaks. I think, however, that I see that there is a line of proceeding here from which we are departing.

It is of very little consequence to me what is the decision of this question of order. I to be sure have a purpose which I avowed sincerely and honestly to the Senate; I did desire a postponement of this question until the day after tomorrow. The Senate, for reasons proper to itself and of which I do not complain at all, for reasons competent and sufficient in its judgment, refused to accede to my request. I ask no particular indulgence here. The kindness of some of my friends has induced them to declare, and they seem to think that I have a particular claim to indulgence of this kind, from length of service, possibly I might say from length of years; but above all things, I dislike to base any claim on that. I ask nothing which I do not suppose may be granted to any other Senator of this body. I have no other claim, no other pretensions. I asked for the postponement, I can only repeat, in all sincerity, and for the very reasons I assigned. This amendment contains matter fit for much serious deliberation. Gentlemen say we understand it, but upon what do they predicate this understanding? I wish to God it were true we all did understand it with the perfect light of reason that might guide us surely to the proper issue. But on what ground is it that gentlemen assume that, and assume therefore that there can be no cause for further consideration in any mind that has been engaged on this subject? The Senate passed a bill after discussion. The Senate rejected an amendment which was offered by a Senator, and that was discussed. Gentlemen say, "that being the case, do we not all understand the subject?" Well, sir, what did we discuss? We discussed the bill; there was but little discussion on the amendment. These are the forms in which we discuss questions. Now, what has the committee done? Has it presented the same measure that we discussed, either in the original bill or upon the amendment that I offered? No, sir. Out of these materials they have made a distinct measure, not conforming to the matters debated upon the former bills, at all. It is a new measure; I require time to understand it. I do not know how I ought to vote. I do not know how far it has yielded to the objections which were made to the original bill, or how far it has interposed new obstacles and new grounds of objection.

Notwithstanding all these personal appeals which I have been obliged to make—and I always regret to make them—if the true order of proceeding, as I conceive it to be, were adopted, I should be furnished with the amplest time, and should not be under the necessity of imposing myself on the Senate with any such appeal for personal indulgence. I wanted to pass by the point of order; we have already consumed hours upon it. One of the two days for which I asked has already been consumed in debating questions of order. If my request had been acceded to, in all probability this would have been waived, or would not have occurred.

But, apart from all that, certainly I hope no one will suppose that I am disposed to complain at all—I say it in all sincerity—of whatever the Senate may choose to decide on any matter of personal reference to myself. I am perfectly satisfied with their decision, whatever it may be, and do not complain of it; but I think I am entitled, as a matter of right, with every Senator here, to insist that I cannot be called upon to vote on a bill which is not before the body. Is not the bill a part of this report? I ask you, sir, as the interpreter of our laws, the interpreter of our parliamentary law and the rules which govern us, if a report saying that the committee have agreed to strike out so and so, and insert so and so, does not make the matter proposed to be stricken out, as well as the matter proposed to be inserted, a part of the report? I do not see how a distinction can be made.

I perfectly agree with my honorable friend from Ohio on this subject, and thank him for the extremely judicious and sound remarks which, it seems to me, he has made. I trust, sir, that we shall not be required to proceed until we can have the benefit of the original bill here. Gentlemen may say it is of no benefit and no advantage; but if the law requires it to be here, it is not for us to debate the reasons of the law. We must have some rule on the subject; it would be strange if there were none. There seems to be a rule on the subject. The parliamentary books are careful to tell you who are entitled to the papers, whether the committee of the one House or the other. Why is all that, if it is perfectly indifferent in its consequences, if it is a mere technicality, a mere matter of moonshine whether the papers be carried to one House or the other? If there is to be no consequence attending it, if it is fruitless and indifferent whether the papers be carried to one House or the other, why this particularity in the books? When it is considered a matter of consequence, and is expressly prescribed by rule, that fact shows that the possession of the papers is to have its influence on the subsequent proceedings of the legislative power. It appears to me very plain that we have no right to act on this report now, and I hope that will be the judgment of the Chair.

Mr. BIGLER. Mr. President, I certainly shall not—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania indulge the Chair for a moment, to state, in reply to the gentleman from Kentucky, that the Chair does not understand this to be a question of order for him to decide, but a question for the Senate to decide, whether they will proceed to the consideration of the report.

Mr. BIGLER. I shall not at this time say a single word in reference to the main question. I intend to vote to proceed to the consideration of the report of the committee of conference; but I feel unwilling to do so in view of what has been said as to the force and effect of the parliamentary law on this question, without stating, as I shall do very briefly, one or two points which, to my mind, are conclusive, which warrant me in concluding that this body has, at this time, a perfect authority, consistent with parliamentary law, and certainly consistent with the usages of the Senate, to act on the report of the committee of conference.

The rules which govern the two Houses jointly and the rules which govern each House ought to be in harmony. If the proposition to consider this report of the committee of conference conflicted with the rights of this body, or the opportunities of this body, or the rights of a single member, that would be a very strong reason against proceeding to the consideration of the report of the committee. But now what is the most striking right, and most important right, which every individual member possesses? It is the right to have read the matter upon which he is required to vote. Now, the only matter which this body can consider is before it; but it is reasoned that that ought not to be considered because of the absence of matter upon which this body never can act. I take it, without ever having attempted to read the history, if there be any history connected with these parliamentary laws which would show fully the purpose in view in adopting the machinery of a committee of conference, that the fact or circumstance that committees of conference uniformly report to both bodies, is conclusive in favor of the right of the Senate to consider this report at this time. If it be necessary to have the original bill and papers before the body which is to act, I ask you, sir, what is the necessity for two reports? Why report precisely the same to both Houses? Why not make a single report, send that report to the House entitled to the bill and papers, and if adopted, then send that bill and report to the other body? But, sir, the rule is otherwise, and the practice has been not only here, but, I think, in every legislative body in this country, that reports of committees of conference have been made simultaneously in both branches, and adopted by both at the same moment. Such I know to have been the practice in the Legislature of Pennsylvania, in the Senate of which I had most of my experience in deliberative bodies.

Now, sir, what is essential is, that the text, and the entire text, shall be before the body which is about to act. If a portion of the absent bill was to constitute a part of the law which we are about to make, then there would be force in the reasoning of the Senator from Michigan; but I can hear read at the Secretary's desk word for word what the law will be if this report shall become the law. I enjoy, therefore, my right, given to me by the rules of this body, of having the matter read upon which I am required to vote; and it is in perfect harmony with the joint rule.

I take it that this is the common sense of the whole subject; it certainly is the vitality of the whole of it. It matters not, in fact, where the bill may be which we originally passed. That does not fairly enter into the consideration of the question before us. It has been entirely superseded; and, as was said the other day by the Senator from Virginia, if that bill had been destroyed by fire, or surreptitiously carried away, who would say that this body had not a right to pass upon the report of the committee of conference. That report, and the matter which it presents here, it is proposed to make the law; and when it shall be adopted by the two Houses, and signed by the Executive, it will be the law. No part of the absent bill becomes the law. But I agree that, where a bill is amended at different points, where a committee of conference recommends to one House to recede here, and to the other to recede there; at this point to insert, and at another to strike out a matter of difference; I might claim the right to have the whole text upon which I had to pass read before I voted; and it would be necessary, in that case, to have it present. But here is a report, perfect in itself, containing all that it is proposed to make the law.

Now, sir, as to the binding effect of parliamentary law: how far does it go? Just to the extent that it answers our practice. It is a general rule; but it only goes to the extent of the power of the body. It controls no act; it vitiates no act. Why, sir, I can find you palpable rules here, plain and distinct rules, to which we pay no kind of respect. For instance, the parliamentary law says distinctly that, when a bill is rejected, no proposition similar in substance can again be introduced at that session. Do we practice that parliamentary law? No, sir.

This, to my mind, is a perfectly clear case. Whatever force there might be in this point in reference to cases where we proposed to concur in part in the original bill, and where part of it was to become the law, and part of the proposed law consisted of new matter, in the present case the original Senate bill and the House bill are superseded by this report, which is to be the law if the two bodies adopt the report. I think the case a clear one.

What will be the message between the two Houses? Will it be that the Senate has agreed to a certain portion of the House bill or the Senate bill? No, sir; not a word of that kind will appear in the message between the two Houses; but the message to the House of Representatives will be, that the Senate have agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the original bill—giving its number and title. A similar message will be sent from the other House to us. It does not matter which House acts first. It does not matter that the Clerks pass each other in the rotunda with the messages. It does not affect, in any possible way, the vitality, the binding effect of the report; nor will it in any way affect the legality of the law if the President signs it.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. GREEN called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to say that my colleague [Mr. DURKEE] has paired off with the honorable Senator from Missouri, [Mr. POLK.]

Mr. HAMMOND. I have agreed to pair off with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FESSENDEN.]

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I was requested to announce that the honorable Senator from Illinois [Mr. TRUMBULL] and the honorable Senator from California [Mr. GWIN] have paired off until seven o'clock.

The question being taken by yeas and nays; resulted—yeas 19, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Douglas, Foot, Foster, King, Pugh, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Wade, and Wilson—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Brown, Clay, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Green, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Sebastian, Sidel, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Wright, and Yulee—25.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON. I move now to take up this question with the understanding that the moment it comes up we shall adjourn. I am satisfied that no good can come from a night session. I suggest that we go home and eat our dinners quietly and honestly, as Christians ought to do, sleep to-night, and come back to-morrow morning, when I hope we shall settle the question.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is a compromise, I suppose.

Mr. CAMERON. Yes, sir. I propose it as a compromise, that we take up this question, and then adjourn and go home.

Mr. GREEN. The motion is already pending to take up the report. This, therefore, comes as a suggestion of compromise from the Senator from Pennsylvania; and, so far as I am concerned, if it meets the concurrence of my friends, for I never separate from them, if the agreement is that we shall take the vote at a certain hour to-morrow, I will yield.

Several SENATORS. No, no.

Other SENATORS. Vote now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on proceeding to the consideration of the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. WADE. I move to lay the whole subject on the table; and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 17, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Broderick, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Douglas, Foot, Foster, King, Pugh, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Wade, and Wilson—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Brown, Clay, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Green, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Sebastian, Sidel, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Wright, and Yulee—25.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. MALLORY. The Senator from Pennsylvania made a proposition, as he alleges, for a compromise; but he did not state at what hour to-morrow he would agree that the vote should be taken. I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania to include that in his proposition. I desire to know whether he is willing to name any hour to-morrow when the vote shall be taken.

Mr. COLLAMER. The suggestion about a compromise may as well be disposed of first as last. There is no man on this side of the House who has any authority to make such a proposition, and for this plain reason: you have never given us an opportunity to consult about it.

Mr. CAMERON. I was not in my seat when the Senator from Florida spoke, or I should have said to him that I have no authority to act in this matter except for myself. I have had no opportunity to consult with my friends. I want to consult with them. My judgment is, that we are wasting time. We have wasted this day, and we shall waste longer by continuing this matter in its present shape. I think if we go home now, and get our dinners, and sleep quietly, we shall come back to-morrow with our nerves in good condition, prepared to do what is right. I presume all of us wish to do what is right. We can gain nothing by sitting all night. No Senator has ever seen good come from a night session. My experience is considerable, and I never saw any good come from a night session. I take it for granted that every gentleman here, like myself, desires to do that which he thinks is right.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I ask the gentleman if he is authorized to make any agreement now for the other side, those who are absent as well as those who are here?

Mr. CAMERON. Not at all. I have no agreement to make for anybody. Nobody has authorized me to do so. Besides, our friends have had no opportunity to come together and consult. I take it for granted that if time be allowed we shall consult, and then some one will be authorized to speak for us. I can speak now only for myself.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. There will be just the same objections to-morrow as to-day against voting on this measure. It will be said that we are taking it up first in the Senate instead of first in the House of Representatives. The circumstances of the case will not be changed a particle. We have already exhausted an entire day on this question, and now I think I perceive pretty plainly that nearly the only Senators disposed to quit, at least on the Democratic side, are those who have consumed the day in speeches. I do not want to hear them any more, and I do not think there are any on the Democratic side of the House who have listened to them to-day, that desire to hear them any more. This is my impression, and I trust that those gentlemen who have consumed the day in making speeches, and have brought us to this hour, will not force us to come to this hour again to-morrow. I hope the Senate will not adjourn, and I assure gentlemen on the other side of the House that if this agreement be made for to-morrow, they will then be forced to a vote, if those of us here who desire to get the vote are a majority of the whole body. Certainly we shall sit here and insist on it to-morrow, the same as we do to-day. Why go through the same exhaustion and the reiteration of the same arguments to-morrow? Those gentlemen who wish to give way now, and back out from forcing a vote at once, which we can have, I think are in the wrong; and I hope the Democratic side of the House, those in favor of action, will stay here until we have acted. It has become wearisome, and it is idling and trifling with those who are sitting here to propose these agreements now and delay the question. If we postpone it, we shall have the same discussion over again. I think it is time we should express some of our real feelings.

Mr. CAMERON. I gave way to my friend from Arkansas, and I desire to say only a word more.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I really supposed the Senator had got through.

Mr. CAMERON. No, sir; I gave way to my friend that he might say what he desired to say. I wish to say, in reply, that I have no disposition to shirk this question, or to get rid of it. If the gentlemen on the other side think proper to sit here all night, I shall try to do so. I have pretty strong nerves, and I can sit here perhaps as long as anybody. It seems to me, however, that gentlemen on both sides would find it better to go home to-night, and come to-morrow morning prepared to act. I have no feeling about this matter at all. I am willing to meet the question now, or to-morrow, or any other day; and therefore, if gentlemen on the other side say they will sit up to-night, I, for one, am ready.

Mr. COLLAMER. I wish to say, since the inquiry has been made, that if the object were now simply to decide the question which I understand to be the pending one—that is, whether we shall proceed to consider this report—I should not be disposed to make any delay or interpose any obstacle in the way of that, though I do not think we ought to consider it until we have the bill here. I am perfectly willing that the Senate shall decide that point; but if it is understood that, when the report is taken up, we shall at once consider and decide it to-day or to-morrow, that is an entirely different matter. I understood the Senator from Missouri to say that he expected that gentlemen who were disposed to debate it would, in reasonable time, and in the manner they thought due to themselves and to the country, debate it; but it will make considerable difference with me whether the object is merely to take up the question for consideration, or whether it is to come to a final determination.

Mr. MALLORY. When the Senator from Pennsylvania made the remark he did as to the postponement of this question until to-morrow, I heard the Senator from Illinois suggest that that proposition was made by way of compromise. It was with that understanding that I put the interrogatory whether there was to be any hour fixed to-morrow for taking the vote, because a postponement indefinitely certainly would not be concurred in. I supposed he really designed to take the question at some time to-morrow.

Mr. COLLAMER. What question?

Mr. MALLORY. The final question.

Mr. CAMERON. The proposition was made entirely by myself as a single member of the Senate, and I took it for granted that every gentleman supposed so, for I have had no opportunity to consult my friends. Whilst I am always glad to consult my political friends, I sometimes act for myself. I say now that I think it is better for both sides that we should adjourn; but if the majority are not disposed to adjourn, I will sit here as long as anybody else.

Mr. FOSTER. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. BRODERICK called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 17, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Broderick, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Crittendon, Dixon, Doolittle, Douglas, Fessenden, Foster, King, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Wade, and Wilson—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Brown, Chy, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Green, Hammond, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Sebastian, Sidel, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Wright, and Yulee—26.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. When the Kansas bill was under discussion here before it passed the Senate, it was my misfortune to lead off in what proved to be a night session. I am willing to take that responsibility now. Though I am no filibuster, yet I am so determined to maintain that course of conduct, that line of argument, and that speech, which I think proper to the occasion, that I intend now to discuss the question that is before the body. I propose to discuss it as it arises incidentally; I propose to discuss it on its merits, and to show, if I can, to the Senate (though I may not be listened to by Senators) the reasons why this measure should not be taken up now.

I understand the question, Mr. President, to be distinctly this: will the Senate now proceed to the consideration of this report? Am I right, sir? Is that the question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLARK. I propose to discuss that question, and I shall want a cup of tea, perhaps, by and by. [Laughter.] Now, Mr. President, I object to the Senate's proceeding, at this time, to the consideration of this question, because it is an unreasonable hour to begin a discussion of this kind, and I am satisfied we shall accomplish nothing by it. It is now six o'clock. There are some Senators in discussion here, and other Senators in discussion there; some Senators are engaged in discussion on the other side of the Chamber, and there are other Senators out there in discussion. This is a very important measure; every Senator ought to give attention to it; they will give attention to it, no doubt, before it passes; but to the reason why it should or should not pass nobody will attend. You cannot expect the attention of the Senate, at this time, to a grave matter like this. It is not sufficient for gentlemen to say, we have made up our minds about this matter, and are ready to vote.

Mr. President, Senators and legislative bodies are never so likely to go wrong as when they go hastily and say they are ready to act upon a subject. In a grave question like this, we all should take time to consider. We should have every paper before us which would give us light on the subject; we should act upon it when our minds are calm. It should not be said on that side, that this is a contest to see which shall pass it first, the Senate or the House; we want the Senate to pass it first, and you want the House to pass it first; and we are going to have a test to see which shall pass it first or which shall hold out the longest. This is not giving to the measure such a consideration as it deserves. We should take time, and come here and deliberately and calmly discuss and consider this matter, and then proceed to pass it if we consider it best.

You see around me, Mr. President, the very best evidence that this is not the time to consider this subject. I do not wish to interfere with gentlemen, or to complain. We cannot command the attention of everybody. Any consideration that I may have to suggest will not find access to everybody's ear. I do not complain of that; I only use it as an argument to show that this is not the time to consider this subject. My honorable friend, the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. SIMMONS,] says he can hear it. I have no doubt he can, because he pays close attention to everything. My honorable friends from Connecticut, now that I have called attention to it, have got their ears open to it; and my honorable friend, the Secretary of the Senate, always listens to everything going on. But when I look around the Senate, I see another Senator has got his hat ready to leave; I know that I must fail to command the attention of everybody. This only shows that this is no time to consider the question; and therefore I object, and strongly object, to taking up the most important question of this session, and forcing a vote on it to-night.

Now, to be serious on one point. I want the attention of Senators a little while on this matter. I should like, if any members of the committee of conference are present, that they would give me their attention, but I do not see any of them in the Chamber. They have made a report, and, according to parliamentary law, they are discharged, and are gone.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator from New Hampshire give way?

Mr. CLARK. For what?

Mr. CHANDLER. For a motion to adjourn.

Mr. CLARK. I would rather go on now. At the suggestion of a friend, however, that I had better give way, I yield the floor.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER put the question, and declared that the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. TOOMBS, and others. It is too late.

Mr. CLARK. Now, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the position in which we are, and I want to address myself to the calm and deliberate judgment of members about me. There was a bill which passed the Senate some two or three weeks since, known as the Kansas bill. It passed this body after a long discussion. It then went down to the other House, and there an amendment was made to it. The bill came back to this body, and the Senate refused to concur in that amendment. It then went back to the House. The House voted to adhere. Then it came here, and we at last had proceedings which resulted in a committee of conference. Now, it is well known, and it is a well-established position of parliamentary law—and I think, Mr. President, you will sustain me in this—when either House adheres, and when both Houses agree to any matter in the bill, it is not in the power of a committee of conference to strike out what they have both agreed upon. I think I am right in that. I think all parliamentary authorities will show, whenever the two Houses agree to anything, a committee of conference cannot move to strike it out. After your bill went from the Senate it had a preamble and an enacting clause. It went down to the House, and the House amended it, not by striking out the preamble, not by striking out the enacting clause, but by striking out all after the enacting clause. That was the amendment of the House—striking out all after the enacting clause, and inserting something after the enacting clause. Then it came back and went in that shape to the committee of conference; and then it was not competent for that committee to strike out that preamble. It was here, and went down to the House and came back without controversy. That was agreed to; but what does your committee state? Here is a point, a clear point. Your committee of conference meet and confer, and vote to substitute an amendment for the House amendment—not for the bill as passed by the House—that is not it; but they recommend, in their report, a substitute for the amendment of the House—that is the language. It is not for the House bill, as amended; but they have agreed upon an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the House amendment to the Senate bill; that is, they recommend to the Senate to strike out the amendment put in by the House, and to put in this. Well, sir, suppose you do that: you strike out the amendment recommended by the House; you adopt this; and then you have a bill with two preambles and two enacting clauses. That is the exact position in which the matter will stand if you adopt the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. WADE. Will the Senator give way for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. CLARK. I yield.

Mr. WADE. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. BRODERICK. I call for the yeas and nays.

Several SENATORS. Withdraw the call.

Mr. BRODERICK. I withdraw the call.

Mr. TOOMBS. I renew it. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 13, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Doolittle, Douglas, Fessenden, Foot, King, Simmons, Wade, and Wilson—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Clay, Fitzpatrick, Green, Hammond, Houston, Hunter, Iversen, Johnson of Arkansas, Jones, Sebastian, Silldell, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Wright, and Yulee—20.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President—

Mr. CHANDLER. If the gentleman will give way for a moment, I wish to say one word. I understand gentlemen on the other side to say that no adjournment shall take place until this question shall be taken. If that is their determination, I can assure them that no adjournment will take place until the 7th day of June. When I say that no adjournment shall take place until that time, I mean what I say. I propose to take a recess until nine o'clock, and I advise gentlemen to bid farewell to their families for thirty days before they come back. I move, therefore, to take a recess, or rather to postpone the further consideration of this subject until nine o'clock.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WILSON. I ask the Senator to give way for a few moments.

Mr. CLARK. I yield.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the further consideration of this question be postponed until half past twelve o'clock on Wednesday, with the understanding—which I think we can all agree to—that we shall have two days' debate at least in regard to the matter. We shall have to-morrow to attend to our business here. We can then take up this subject at half-past twelve o'clock on Wednesday, and I think on Wednesday or Thursday we may determine this question. It is understood that the Senator from Kentucky desires to be heard; the Senator from Vermont, who is on the Committee on Territories, [Mr. COLLAMER,] also wishes to be heard; and there are several other Senators who probably will desire to make brief speeches upon the subject. I think that if the question can be postponed to Wednesday next, giving us a few hours for reflection, and then be taken up, we can settle it before the adjournment of the Senate on Thursday. I have no doubt that it can be done within that time.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am willing to agree to that.

Mr. WILSON. We shall then be able to take the question, and this matter will be settled peaceably. It is a troublesome question in itself; it is one that excites intense interest in the country, and a great deal of feeling here, and it is not worth while to borrow trouble respecting it. I think this is a fair proposition.

The Senator from Michigan has said, and said truly, that, if an attempt is made to force the question, it cannot be taken. You know, gentlemen, that you cannot force this question. There is not a man among you that does not know we can sit you out here. We can sit here longer than you can. Every man of you knows it. We have tried it one night, and you had to give in then. If you should try it now, you would have to give in again. I do not say this in any spirit of unkindness. It is what every man in this Senate knows. Ten men can hold this Senate here for thirty days. There is no doubt about that on either side. Therefore, it is not worth while to enter into a contest of that kind. It would do no sort of good, but would create unkind feelings, and make an exhibition not creditable to any of us. We have consumed this whole day on the point of order in regard to taking this matter up. Let us have this question taken up at half past twelve o'clock on Wednesday next. I think we can settle it on Wednesday and Thursday; and all gentlemen who desire to be heard on the question can say what they please, and we can then take the vote. Everybody knows practically what the result of that vote in this body will be; and we shall thus spend precisely two days upon this question. If we go on to-night, no vote will be taken. There will be no voting or speaking on this question until half past twelve o'clock to-morrow. Then why should we continue in session here, and occupy more time than we should in having the matter amicably adjusted, by which we can have the question fairly understood, so that Senators can express their views; and it can be done to the satisfaction of both sides of the Chamber?

Mr. GREEN. I beg leave to make a remark.

Mr. CLARK. I yield the floor.

Mr. GREEN. I understood, from two or three members on that side of the Chamber, that they had no right, no authority to make any proposition on any terms; and if the Senator from Massachusetts proposes Wednesday, if he has no authority, what will come of it? It will amount to just nothing.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. GREEN. I will allow anybody.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I suppose, when a Senator rises here, and makes a proposition, he makes it for himself, and he waits to see if the two sides agree to it. If they do not agree, there is an end of it. If they do agree, then it becomes binding on the two sides. I would feel at liberty to rise and make a suggestion in regard to the arrangement of matters. If it should not be accepted, there is no harm done. This proposition, I suppose, is made in that spirit.

Mr. GREEN. There is no difficulty about that. I made a proposition, and Senators on the other side said, "We cannot say anything about that, because we have had no time to consult; we have had no opportunity to confer together." Now the Senator from Massachusetts makes a proposition. Has he had time to consult? Is it made by authority? We want a specific understanding. The understanding that the question shall be disposed of on Wednesday is not acceptable to this side of the Chamber. I do not really think, personally, (though, as I said before, I will not separate from my friends,) that it would be policy to protract this session to-night if we can come to an agreement that we shall take the vote to-morrow, leaving a fair opportunity for discussion, if discussion is desired. I make that suggestion. I make no offer.

Mr. WILSON. We have had no meeting or consultation, but I have spoken with several of those with whom I act; and I think they will assent to the proposition I made with great readiness. The Senator knows that we had a controversy on this question when it was up before. There was a great hurry to press the matter. We made an arrangement that was satisfactory all around, and both sides labored with all zeal to carry out that understanding.

Mr. GREEN. It was carried out in good faith.

Mr. WILSON. Why can we not have the same thing now? It will be remembered by the Senate that after we made that arrangement, for some days after it was settled, we adjourned at three or half past three o'clock. There was no particular hurry then. Now we are crowded with business; we have an abundance of it. Let us go to work to-morrow on our business, and Wednesday and Thursday can be devoted to the consideration of this subject. We can thus have it settled to the satisfaction of Senators all around. There are Senators who desire to make brief speeches on it. I know some who intend to speak on it. I hope the Senator from Missouri will consent to have the matter settled in this way. It can do him no good to sit out this matter to-night.

Mr. CAMERON. I will add to what has been said by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, that, if this question is postponed until Wednesday, I, and other gentlemen with whom I act, will go into it in good faith. There will be no unnecessary speaking. Of course, gentlemen will desire to speak on a question of so much importance, and they cannot be controlled; but I think there is a disposition to get it through as soon as possible.

Mr. IVERSON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CAMERON. Certainly.

Mr. IVERSON. Why is there such a special desire to postpone it until Wednesday? Why not take it to-morrow?

Mr. CAMERON. I will answer that, if the Senator from Georgia will permit me. To-morrow we want to reflect on this subject. All of us have some matters which we think of importance, that we may desire to present. I am here without any authority from anybody else, but I think I can speak for them. The desire is not to get any unnecessary time. I ask the Senator from Georgia, in answer to his question, why there is such a great desire to dispose of it to-night? Has he got any sinister or improper motive? I take it he has not. I do not think he would desire to impugn my motives, as I would not his. I desired this question to be brought up for three days last week, as I was desirous to have it disposed of; but Senators on that side said, put it off until next week. This week has come, and it is now proposed to continue its consideration through this whole night. I am opposed to night sessions, and I prefer sitting in the daytime. In corroboration of what has been said by the Senator from Massachusetts, in support of his motion to postpone until Wednesday next, I will say that the honored and venerated Senator from Kentucky, whom we all so much respect, has not made up his mind on this subject. On Wednesday we could come together, and, like gentlemen having one common object in view—the good of our country—begin and get through with it as soon as we can. You cannot expect it sooner.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I desire to say that there is no reason within my knowledge for any unnecessary delay in taking a vote on this question. All that I desire is, simply to have time to make comparison of bills, and prepare to make, perhaps, half an hour's speech, and then I am ready, individually, to discharge all further connection that I have with this subject. I would rather it would go over until the day after to-morrow, and then I want half an hour—it may possibly run a little beyond that—to make a few remarks. I have no desire beyond that for delay. I do not believe there is any advantage, pro or con, in delay. I do not believe that delay is sought for any such purpose. The Senator from Kentucky expressed the same wish so far as he was concerned. He is now absent to get his dinner, and he will return here again. The question is, whether we shall be thrown into a discussion upon a new bill when we are exhausted and worn out, and are not prepared to do justice to ourselves on the subject? I do not think we should be. I am not willing to be thus forced. I may have been under a misapprehension, but on Saturday I did understand—I suppose from what he said to me afterwards I understood him erroneously—the Senator from Virginia, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, for whose opinions I have the highest respect, to say that it was in order then to go on and make the report, and that if the objection were made without the bill being here, it would be valid.

Mr. HUNTER. I said no such thing. The Senator is entirely mistaken. On the contrary, I said we planted ourselves on the custom of the Houses, which was to go on and report without the bill.

Mr. DOUGLAS. So the Senator informed me in private conversation afterwards, and consequently I stated that I misapprehended him, although several Senators understood him in the same way. I understood his colleague to express similar opinions. I understood the argument of the Senator from Pennsylvania to express the same opinion, and I therefore came here without the slightest expectation that any vote would be reached on this question to-day. I never dreamed that it would be taken. I thought the law so clear, and was admitted to be so clear, that the bill was in the other House, and that we should have to wait until it was acted on there, that when I came here I was taken totally by surprise by seeing this question under consideration. I know that other gentlemen, quite a number, with whom I have spoken, thought so too. Then it was natural, when the motion was taken up, believing, as I do, and as others do, and as men on both sides do, that it is a violation of law to act without the bill, of course we made that point. If the Senate overrule that, we want time, reasonable time—one day—to look into the question, and then to be allowed a reasonable discussion of the question. I have not the slightest idea that this discussion will last beyond two days, as intimated by the Senator from Massachusetts. But, sir, I cannot admit that it is consistent with duty to ourselves to be forced suddenly into a discussion of this question on a totally new bill, involving new matter, and propositions and principles not embraced in either of the other bills, to-night, when we are all exhausted, and have been without time for preparation. I think it is unfair; and I shall feel bound, with all due respect, to resist that coercion, if it is forced upon us. If we should postpone this subject until Wednesday, it would give us time for reflection, and two days for debate; and I would be willing, for one, to say that I would sit it straight out until the vote be taken upon it. I want no unnecessary delay.

Mr. TOOMBS. This debate is all out of order, but I do not wish to seem to be discourteous; but I give notice that I shall oppose all these treaties. The reason why we are worn out to-night is because gentlemen on the other side will not let us take the vote. I have been sitting here from twelve o'clock to-day until now, almost seven o'clock, and I will sit here as long as my vote will keep the Senate here, until the discussion of this question shall have ended and we shall have the vote. I presume everybody understands this subject.

As for the argument of physical exhaustion, do Senators suppose they can sit here and do as they please without opposition? I will sit here and make it a question to-night, and put a rule in operation by which the majority shall govern itself; but I apprehend that the courtesy or weakness of political friends would fail to do that. As far as I am concerned, I shall vote here until the question is taken on the motion. I do not see anything in these reasons. There is no peculiar novelty in this bill. The report came in on Friday. Everybody understands it very well; and I have no idea, if you were to discuss it from now until the last trump sounds, that you would change a vote on this floor.

Mr. DOUGLAS. It may be that votes would be or would not be changed, but I have heard speeches made here by Senators when they did not expect to change a single vote. I have known Senators to make speeches when they thought it due to themselves, to their constituents, and to the position they occupied before the country, to explain the reasons for their vote. Hence I have known speeches to be made that were not expected to change a vote. I believe I have seen the Senator from Georgia make speeches when he had not the slightest idea of changing a vote by them. If he expects to change votes every time he speaks, he has more hope in the changeability of the Senate than I have. But I think that reasonable time should be given for debate where there is no wish or disposition to abuse the time; where there is no factious delay intended; where every assurance to that effect has been given.

I do not understand why we are to be forced to a decision to-night. I have nothing to say about physical endurance; I have no threats to make. I never saw it resorted to where both parties did not think they had performed a very foolish act before they got through with it. I predict, now, that if we shall continue this session, and sit here until to-morrow morning, to-morrow morning we shall find that we have accomplished nothing, but are worn out and exhausted, and have been guilty of childish play, instead of yielding at the regular hour to an adjournment. We shall save time by doing it; all of us will occupy a better position before the country; we shall feel better ourselves, and we shall expedite the public business; we shall feel that we have performed our duty to ourselves and to our country better by doing so. I think it unwise in us to suffer our passions to be aroused to the determination to sit it out on this side, or sit it out on that side. I confess I do not feel that it would be right to force me to give a vote on a question of this kind, without an opportunity of explaining my views and my reasons for the vote—not to go back to old questions which have been discussed, but to confine myself to this one proposition. I would not deem it right, at this hour of the night, to be forced into a discussion on an entirely new bill, involving new principles. It will not do to say that this is the same old question. There is a variation, and it is an important variation. Senators should have an opportunity to state the reasons for the vote they are going to give, with a view to the variation of this from the other propositions. It is due to them; several Senators will deem it so—I do not know how many; but I think we shall expedite the public business if we will give a reasonable time, and adjust it in that way. I do not wish to occupy time upon it.

Mr. HOUSTON. I cannot say, as a general thing, that I am much in favor of night sessions. We have had one this session, and I do not believe we gained anything by it. I rather think we lost. Members felt deranged for two or three days afterward; business was very lax; members were indifferent, and did not feel very well after sitting up all night. I recollect that I was very much incommoded myself about three o'clock in the morning. Then, I had to render an excuse for acting like a decent man, and taking my natural repose. [Laughter.] Well, sir, I am inclined to think we made nothing by it. If we sit up to-night, I am satisfied that to-morrow we shall be in rather bad condition for business. I can see no urgent necessity for it. I do not believe that by sitting here to-night we shall expedite business in the least. We may occupy so much more time, but whether that would be an advantage would be questionable. This subject will be the unfinished business for to-morrow if we now adjourn, and it can then be taken up regularly. That is, perhaps, the best thing that can be done; at least I think so.

If business cannot be transacted in the ordinary course of legislation without resorting to extreme measures for the purpose of enforcing the action of a majority upon a minority, I think it very inauspicious, and particularly connected with this subject. The honorable Senator from Illinois said he never knew it to be done but that both parties thought they had acted very foolishly. I recollect, sir, that we did it in 1854 at the passage of the Nebraska bill and the repeal of the Missouri compromise. Whether the parties thought they had acted very foolishly or not, I do not know; but I think some of them have thought so since. I think that the business on which we are now engaged has perhaps resulted from that. I have no desire of making this a sequence to that night's transactions. I was a participant in them. I know all about them. I am not going to dwell on them. I am reserving that for a precious morceau before leaving these Halls, if I live.

But I can see no advantage to result to us from continuing this night session. I am opposed to it. I may stay and vote, or I may pair off with a respectable gentleman; and if the vote shall be taken to-night two respectable votes will thus be lost to the Senate. [Laughter.] I would rather the Senate would take into consideration what benefits could result from it, or the prejudices that might arise from it. We are all in good humor now; we can go home and get our dinners or suppers, meet in a better humor to-morrow, spend the time of the Senate profitably then, and adjourn. Therefore, with the understanding that this bill will be the unfinished business for to-morrow, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. HUNTER. Let us take up the bill first. Mr. HOUSTON. Well, I move to take up the bill with a view then to move to adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. BIGGS.) The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts to postpone the further consideration of this subject until Wednesday next, at half past two o'clock.

Mr. IVERSON. I have no disposition to be obstinate or contrary about the matter, if Senators on the other side of the Hall desire this postponement with an honorable intention. We do not desire to gag them in any way; but I do not understand the reason why they are so very anxious to postpone this discussion until Wednesday, instead of letting the question come up to-morrow.

Mr. FESSENDEN. All the reason I have or know is, in order to enable the Senator from Kentucky to have the time he desires; which we think he ought to have.

Mr. IVERSON. I will say in reply, that I think, of all the farces I have ever heard in my life, that which requires the postponement of this question for two days in order to allow time for the Senator from Kentucky to make up his opinion, is the greatest one. This report was brought in last Friday; the bill was read at the Clerk's desk, published in all the papers in this city, printed and laid on the desks of the Senators; the Senator from Kentucky has had three days to consider the proposition, and yet its postponement is now asked for two more days, in order to allow him time to make up his mind on the subject. I presume, if this question was postponed until Wednesday, or Wednesday week, or Wednesday month, or twenty-one months, he would no more make up his opinion than he has already. I apprehend that every Senator has made up his opinion, and every man knows and distinctly understands how he is going to vote. I have not a doubt that every man understands how he is going to vote. I do not suppose that any speech which can be made, or any consideration that can be urged, is going to change a vote. It may be so, that some have not made up their minds; but I cannot come to the conclusion that there is any man here who does not know how he is going to vote upon this question.

I do not understand this very great desire to postpone this question until Wednesday. If I was uncharitable, I might suppose that there might be some political and party advantage in the matter, as the House of Representatives is to have this question under consideration on Wednesday, and that if the House is forced to a vote upon the question before the Senate votes on it, there might be some advantage in that. If the Senate should pass the bill beforehand it might possibly have a moral influence upon some members of the House, or upon public sentiment, and that public sentiment might react upon the House. There may be an advantage of that kind. The pertinacity with which gentlemen on the other side demand that this question shall be postponed until Wednesday, savors very much of something of that sort. It seems to me, sir, there is a cat under the meal-tub. I do not understand it. I am very willing to adjourn now if, to-morrow, the subject can be taken up and debated decently and in order. ["Let us adjourn."] I am perfectly willing to do that with the understanding that it shall be settled to-morrow. If Senators on the other side say that it shall not be settled to-morrow I am willing to go on with it now. I think I have just exactly hit the nail on the head. These gentlemen do not intend that the Senate shall have an opportunity to vote on this subject until the House of Representatives have decided the question. For that reason I am willing to sit here until it is decided.

Mr. CAMERON. I desire to say a word in reply to the Senator from Georgia. I do not believe in the insinuation about the cat in the meal-tub. I never pretend to do anything that I do not mean. When I made the proposition to adjourn a little while ago, I thought it would be agreeable to gentlemen on the other side. I have no feeling on this subject. I would just as soon decide it now as to-morrow, or any other day; but I was exceedingly anxious that the Senator from Kentucky, who is endeared to all of us by his long service, by his high reputation, by his intellect and by his great and generous heart, should be permitted to fix his own time for discussing this question. Every Senator knows that last week I wanted this question brought up in order to have it decided then. I am anxious to have it decided now; and I desire to say to the Senator from Georgia, that I will remain here as long as he will remain.

I have no desire, no disposition to separate from my friends, but I want to postpone this subject until to-morrow, so that gentlemen may come here then with generous and kindly feelings, and settle it as gentlemen and Senators representing the great States of this great Confederacy ought to do. If, however, the Senator from Georgia and other gentlemen are disposed to go on with it, I say go on; I will stay here just as long as they please; but it seems to me that gentlemen endued with the kindly feelings that ought to characterize Senators, should not act in this way. We cannot force them, and they cannot force us, to a vote to-night. It must take its regular course, do as you will. Senators must discuss this subject; and when it has exhausted itself the vote will be taken. Let us separate now and meet to-morrow; let us not quarrel with each other, and occupy the whole night, and find ourselves to-morrow morning, as six or eight weeks ago we found ourselves—contending with each other for the whole night, and in the morning finding ourselves where we started. I have a distinct recollection of the unpleasant incidents of that night. I propose that we meet to-morrow in our places, discuss the subject as Senators should discuss it, and let it terminate as the question will terminate itself. They cannot force us, and we have no desire to force them. I know that the majority is against the side with which I act, but they cannot prevent us from expressing our views, if they would, and I do not think they would. For that reason, I desire delay.

Mr. BROWN. I must say that I have no idea of going into this night session—not the least. Other Senators may sit here and punish themselves if they will; I will not, because I know perfectly well that it is to end in nothing but the simple punishment of ourselves. We may sit until six or seven o'clock in the morning, then to-morrow we shall do nothing, and the next day we shall come back to the consideration of the question. I am not very well prepared to measure intellectual strength with anybody. I feel still less prepared, or still less willing, to compare mere brute strength with anybody. Since I have been in Congress, I have seen night sessions tried over and over again in the House and in the Senate, and I have seldom ever seen them amount to anything but a dead failure. You may do this: you may have this trial of strength until you have a fair proposition from one side or the other, and when you get it, it is always sensible to accept it; and the earliest moment you extract such a proposition, the better it is for both sides. Now I am disposed to close with any proposition by which we shall postpone the consideration of this bill until to-morrow, come here and debate it then decently and in order until the usual hour of adjournment, or even a later hour, and then adjourn. If we do not get the vote until Wednesday, well; if we do not get it until Thursday, well. I hope at least we shall have it this week.

I have heard of the private reasons, or many of them, assigned why there may be some possible motive for postponing this subject until Wednesday. There may be some vague idea of that sort affecting the minds of gentlemen; but men of sense ought to consider how much there is in it by possibility. What can there be in it? Is there a member of the House so stupid as not to know that, so soon as the Senate comes to a vote, they will pass the bill or pass this substitute? Does not all the country know that?

Then it has been said that there is to be some returning sentiment from the country. Where is it to come from? How soon is it expected back? You would have to postpone this question two or three weeks in order to get the sentiment of the country to influence anybody's action here, either one way or the other. I have not, from the beginning, been in favor of forcing the question now. I would rather have it; I desire to have it now. I want no time to think about it. I dare say others may not have made up their minds. I do not want to make a speech; I am willing to stand before the country on my naked vote. Other Senators may want to make speeches. Suppose we vote not to allow them to do so: if we tried, we could not do it. That is the point: if we tried to do it, we should fail.

I am willing to see the question postponed until to-morrow; then to take it up, and let anybody debate it who chooses to talk until a reasonable hour, and then adjourn. I shall vote for such a proposition. If the Senate overrule me, very well. If Senators choose to punish themselves by staying all night, I do not mean to do it; I shall go home and go to sleep, and I do not intend that the Senate shall drag me out of my bed at midnight to come and sit here. When I was sent here it was to legislate at proper hours. I do not intend to risk my life; I think it is worth something to me, if not to the country; I mean to preserve it. I cannot appreciate this thing. I cannot see the meaning of it. If there were a determination on the other side of the Chamber to resist the passage of the bill to an indefinite period, or even an unreasonable period, then I would be for sitting it out, making a trial of physical strength before the country, so that the judgment of the country may rest upon those who may be disposed to delay and defeat action upon a great public measure; but they show no such disposition.

Now, sir, I have been kept in leading strings all day. I have felt that this whole proceeding was not right from the early part of the morning, and I have been all along thinking that we were wasting time unnecessarily. I will now say a word which I have felt it due to my conscience from the beginning to say. Sometimes I have voted with my friends, and at others I have not voted at all. To act upon a bill when it is in the other House I have thought is not right. I have not been able to see how you are to amend or adopt a substitute for a bill that is not in your possession. I have not seen how the thing can be done. You might as well undertake to stick a pin in the air. The moment you let go of it it falls to the ground, because there is nothing to sustain it. To adopt a substitute for a bill is in the nature of an amendment. You strike out all but the enacting clause, which remains, and insert other words. If the bill is not here, how are you to do it? I do not believe that it can be done; but I have deferred to the judgment of friends. We have had an Indian chief here lately called Hole-in-the-day. I have always thought that he had an absurd name; but I do not think it is any more absurd than this idea of proceeding with the consideration of a bill which is in the other House of Congress. When the bill is here, then you can legislate on it.

Now, sir, I want to illustrate this. Suppose that the absent Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BATES,] who has not been here at all, had come in this morning for the first time, been sworn in, and had said, as he might properly have said, not having heard the debates or read or studied the bills, the first thing presented to him being a substitute for another bill, "I ask to have the bill read, so that I may know what I am voting upon;" then you would either have to refuse to allow a new Senator, who was not present when the Senate acted on it, to hear the bill read, or admit that it was in the other House, and you could not do it.

I take it that the law which governs this case must be the same as is applied to every other case; that you have not a parliamentary law for one bill and another parliamentary law for another bill; that the law must be uniform, and it is your business to apply it to all cases. Suppose the Senator from Virginia brings in a report from a committee of conference on one of your appropriation bills, with fifty or sixty or one hundred amendments, and reports to you that the committee of conference agree to accept amendments number one, five, fifteen, thirty, and so on, and to reject amendments number three, fourteen, and eighteen, and as to certain others, agree to take them, with certain amendments which they propose, and report them all together: I want to know if I am to be forced to vote on them without knowing what amendment number one, five, or fifteen, means? If I demand the reading of them, am I to be told that I have no right to do it? Must I vote in the dark—vote absolutely on an amendment which I have not heard? If I have a right to hear them, then must not the bill also be here so that it may be read? If it is in the other House, have I not a right to delay the proceeding until the bill shall be brought here? I know that sometimes the practice has been different, but I have yet to learn where there has been an objection raised that this has not been ruled? It has always been the parliamentary law. We do a great many things here by common consent; nobody objects; but where the objection is raised, and any Senator insists on having them read, he has a right to have them read, to know whether the substitute is in order or not, or whether it is proper or not. That is my opinion about it.

But, sir, on the point at issue, I thought it was right to receive the report. I think now, if Senators give notice that they want to debate it, it is right to take it up and debate it; but I still have my doubts whether you should take the vote upon it before you have the bill before you. I do not say those doubts may not be removed, but I have listened to six or seven hours' discussion here, and they are not removed thus far. For that reason I want to see the bill taken up, its consideration appointed for to-morrow, and then let the debate go on. If the House never sends the bill here, I never want to vote on it. If they send it here, I want to take the vote on it the instant it appears in the Senate. Suppose you take the vote and pass the bill: what will you do with it? Will that facilitate the vote of the House? They have got the report of their own committee and will act upon that, and not upon what you do here. Your action will be an unsubstantial nullity. As I said before, it is like an attempt to stick a pin in the air, and does not amount to anything. For these reasons I hope the bill will be taken up and postponed until to-morrow; that we shall then adjourn, meet here to-morrow, take up this subject at the hour appointed, and go on with the debate.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator from Georgia seems to be under the impression that we are afraid to have the vote taken here, for fear that it would influence the members of the House. It never occurred to me that members of the House were in danger of being controlled or influenced by the votes of the Senate. It never occurred to me that anybody could suppose that the members of the House were going to be controlled by the votes of Senators. It never occurred to me to impute such a motive for trying to force the vote before Wednesday, that it was to coerce and control and intimidate members of the House. It never occurred to me that that was the motive on the one side or the other. I never supposed that the members of the House were to be influenced in their votes and controlled in them by the terror of the great names that come down from the Senate. Never having had an apprehension of that kind, it never entered into my mind to procure a postponement of the vote in order to have the great influence of these overshadowing names upon members of the House. I cannot believe now that that is a motive for pressing the postponement. The Senator from Georgia says it is not on that side. If it is not, then certainly it does not enter into the question at all; for if he does not oppose the postponement for the purpose of having the names of Senators go down to the House of Representatives, then he has no right to suppose that we are influenced by that motive in asking for the postponement. Hence I think that the intimation that that was the motive for postponement is obviated by the declaration that he does not suppose it would influence them.

Mr. GREEN. I am as anxious as anybody to get a vote to-night; but I really do not wish to prejudice anybody's rights by pressing it. But I think rights are mutual. All on this side of the Chamber desired to take the vote on Saturday; on the other side it is now desired not to take the vote until next Wednesday.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Thursday.

Mr. GREEN. Wednesday was the proposition.

Mr. DOUGLAS. No, no; Thursday.

Mr. GREEN. Well, say Thursday. What is a fair compromise? Surely the majority of the Senate, on whom the responsibility rests, ought not to go more than half way. We have given way from Friday up to to-day. This whole day has been exhausted by parliamentary motions and questions not affecting the real matter to be decided by the Senate. It is now seven o'clock at night, and the same matter remains for us yet to consider. Shall we decide this to-morrow or on Wednesday? The majority of the Senate desire early action on the subject; and it is to them that the country looks for action; for while the majority and the minority have equal rights, the majority have the whole responsibility, and I really think the minority ought to respect that responsibility a little. If they go wrong, they are condemned by public sentiment; if they go right, they are sustained. Now, having yielded that far, can they not yield enough to come back and say, "we will take this subject up; we will make it the special order for to-morrow at twelve or half past twelve o'clock; we will discuss it as long as anybody desires to discuss it, with this qualification: that we will take the vote to-morrow at, say five o'clock, seven o'clock, six o'clock, or three o'clock?" I cannot consent to postpone it later.

Mr. KING. Say Thursday.

Mr. GREEN. I cannot say Thursday. Perhaps Friday would suit gentlemen on the other side best, because that is hangman's day.

Mr. HALE. I have sat all day and listened to this war of the leaders, and if any scheme like that suggested by the Senator from Georgia has existed here, it has not been disclosed to me, and I am entirely innocent and ignorant of it. I know of nothing to be gained by it. I have no desire in this matter, except honestly and faithfully to do the business of the Senate as well as I may. If the leaders have any schemes in regard to this subject, they have not been divulged to me; but I suppose I am at liberty, as a private, to suggest what I think the proper course of the Senate would be; and it is, in the first place, to adjourn. I think that is our first duty which we owe to ourselves and to the country. We can then come here to-morrow and take this bill up, and if anybody wants to talk, so long as they talk reasonably and sensibly, (which requirements they do not always observe,) let them do it; and if we come to five or six o'clock, and we are ready to vote, let us vote; but if at that time there are some gentlemen who still want to express themselves, and there is no manifestation of a factious disposition to prolong the consideration of the subject, I think it is due to them to adjourn again. But I think it is the understanding (and, so far as I speak, I am certainly willing to be bound by it, and I think my friends around me are) that although we may not agree certainly and inevitably to vote to-morrow, yet if, in the progress of a fair exercise of a constitutional prerogative of discussion, they can vote to-morrow at five o'clock, they will do it; and if they cannot, they will vote the next day. With that understanding—if anybody dissents, I hope they will do it now—I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope we shall take up the bill first, and then adjourn on it.

Mr. HALE. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I have witnessed with some regret, Mr. President, the renewal of the scenes we had here some time ago, and I would desire very much to avert it if possible. I do not believe that any vote can be taken by remaining here to-night; and I must confess, in the absence of any consultation that I have been able to have with friends on the subject, looking at it with the lights that I have been able to gather, I do not see a sufficient motive for endeavoring to force us into a night session. If the gentlemen who are opposed to this measure, and who are now urging an adjournment, (I believe an adjournment is not urged by anybody who is in favor of this measure,) want to satisfy the country why they vote against this particular amendment—they can expect no change of votes in the Senate undoubtedly—they can put their views before the country in an hour apiece; and that will take a couple of days, perhaps three. That will leave the rest of us to attend to other business; and they can go on and make their speeches. They can get through what they want to say, and we can get the vote on Wednesday or Thursday, or perhaps to-morrow. We shall be certain to get the vote during the week, in accordance with the wishes of gentlemen all around us.

Now, sir, it is said they have an object to gain by allowing the House to vote before the Senate votes on Wednesday. I do not see how we are to prevent them attaining that object, if there is one to be gained. They have a right to discuss the question presented by the committee of conference, and forty-eight hours might be consumed in a discussion on its merits. If gentlemen choose to discuss its merits in the same style in which the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CLARK] discussed them some time ago, by giving way to every motion that may be made, it would take rather more than forty-eight hours.

Mr. CLARK. I do not think the gentleman from Louisiana should complain of that, as he now holds the floor by my indulgence.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I am not complaining of it. On the contrary, I am expressing my admiration of this new parliamentary maneuver. It is one practiced for the first time, and is refreshing from its novelty. Now, sir, if we are going to gain nothing, why not let these gentlemen indulge in speeches to the country? Everybody admits that they have had no chance to speak yet. [Laughter.] None of them have had the least opportunity of giving their views upon the subject, and really it would be too bad to deprive them of an opportunity of setting themselves right before the country. Here is the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FESSENDEN,] who absolutely had only twenty-eight columns of the Globe. If that gentleman desires a reasonable margin, something like the short speech he made on a former occasion, why not let him have it?

Mr. WADE. The only apology is that we have not had much to answer.

Mr. BENJAMIN. There it is again. The gentleman says they have not had much to answer. Now, here is a fresh proposition, a fresh subject, and the gentlemen start afresh. I am sure the country is looking with great interest to the debates here. I shall read them with great pleasure, though I shall not promise to listen to them; but if you will inform me when you get through and are ready to vote, we shall be here to take it.

What is the objection to the postponement? What do we gain by voting before the House? The House will take the vote on Wednesday. If they reject it, gentlemen will be relieved from any necessity of defining their positions before their constituents. On the contrary, if the House pass the bill, then gentlemen will have the opportunity of determining whether they will join in passing it. They can then see whether they will gain a triumph because the majority of the Senate yield, or whether they will continue in opposition to it, and let the country determine which is right in the discussion.

As regards the right to take up the report of the committee of conference, I must confess I entertain no doubt. I am no parliamentarian, but looking into the question in the simple light of reason, I find that a bill has passed the Senate, that the House has made an amendment to it in the nature of a substitute, which is unpalatable to the Senate. The committee of conference reports to each House another bill as a substitute for that passed by each branch. Whatever may be the result of our vote, whether our vote passes the bill or not, is, in my judgment, one question; whether we have a right to say that we approve of what our committee of conference have done, is another and different question, in my judgment. I consider that committee of conference, in my uninstructed view of the subject, as simply composed of two or three agents of each House, instructed by each House to meet together, see if they can agree, and each House then examines what its agents have done, and express approval or disapproval. I can see no earthly object preventing us passing on what our agents have done. Whether the bill is thereby passed, is another question; but on the question whether we have a right to say that we concur in the recommendation of our committee of conference, I cannot see a doubt existing.

I agree with my friend from Mississippi that we can no more amend it, the bill not being here, than we could stick a pin in the air—a very good illustration, indeed. The moment you take away your hand, it falls. You cannot make an amendment if there is no bill to put it upon; but I understand that this is not to amend the bill. I understand the committee of conference recommend that the Senate now take a certain course; and the proposition now is, shall we take a certain course?

Mr. BROWN. What is the course? To substitute one bill for another?

Mr. BENJAMIN. It is that we agree to adopt this substitute in the place of the bill with the amendment.

Mr. DOUGLAS. But I understand the Senator to say that, although we take the vote, it will have no effect.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Unless it passes both Houses, unquestionably.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes.

Mr. BENJAMIN. It cannot be reversed, but it will be of no force or effect unless it passes both Houses. I mean, Mr. President, that I can see no objection to the Senate assenting to what the committee of conference have done, and informing the House of that fact. If the House, which now has possession of the bill, should be of the same view with the Senate, the House, having received the message of the Senate, would concur in the report of the committee of conference, and send back the bill to the Senate, to be here enrolled and sent to the President. I believe it is precisely within the power of the Senate to do that. I only want to bring the subject to a close, and allow Senators a proper time for discussion. I therefore move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HUNTER. I am willing to adjourn, but before we do that I hope we shall take up the report.

Mr. GREEN. And make it the special order for half past twelve o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, that the further consideration of this subject be postponed until half past twelve o'clock on Wednesday next.

Mr. HUNTER. I thought that was withdrawn.

Mr. WILSON. I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on taking up the report for consideration, and on that question the Senator from New Hampshire is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PUGH. I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will yield his right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is, whether they will proceed to the consideration of the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. CAMERON. I believe that is the motion I made an hour ago, to take this subject up, and then to adjourn.

Mr. GREEN. The Senator from Pennsylvania is mistaken. This is my original motion. It was I who made it.

Mr. CAMERON. Then I give way to the Senator from Missouri, as he says it is his motion.

Mr. CLARK. I have but a word to say—

Mr. CAMERON. Say it to-morrow.

Mr. CLARK. I am going to say it to-night, with the consent of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, for this reason: it will be recollected, when the Kansas bill was under discussion, I was entitled to the floor; I was proceeding with my speech; I was interrupted in the same way that I am now, and various propositions were made that when I got through with my speech they would adjourn. I drew my speech as hastily to a close as I could; but when I got through they would not adjourn. Now, sir, I do not want to be caught in the same way again, and I am not going to yield unless the Senate agrees to adjourn. I am not going to ask for an agreement. I do not find fault; but I will yield the floor only with the distinct understanding that the bill shall be taken up, and that we shall then adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the report of the committee of conference; and upon that question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Several Senators. We do not want the yeas and nays. Let them be withdrawn by common consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will require unanimous consent to withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. TOOMBS. I object to this whole arrangement.

Mr. MALLORY. I wish to state that I have paired off with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN.]

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 32, nays 9; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Bright, Brown, Cameron, Clark, Clay, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Green, Hale, Hammond, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, Polk, Sebastian, Simmons, Sidel, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Trumbull, Wilson, Wright, and Yulee—32.

NAYS—Messrs. Broderick, Collamer, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Hamlin, Harlan, and King—9.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. No. 161) for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union.

Mr. GREEN. I move to postpone the further consideration of this report until to-morrow at half past twelve o'clock.

Several Senators. Say one o'clock.

Mr. GREEN. Half an hour is enough for the morning business.

Mr. TOOMBS. I ask for the yeas and nays upon that question.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I suggest that it be taken up at one o'clock, leaving an hour for morning business.

Mr. GREEN. Half an hour will be enough for that.

Mr. HUNTER. Will this report come up as the unfinished business, if the Senate should adjourn?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will, if the Senate should now adjourn.

Mr. CLARK. I move that the Senate adjourn, with the understanding that it will come up as unfinished business.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. IVERSON. I rise to a point of order. Is it competent for the Senator to make that motion when there is a question pending before the Senate?

Mr. CLARK. Allow me to say that I do not wish to press the motion if the Senate desire to make the subject the special order. I withdraw the motion, and let Senators have it their own way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On the pending question the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to know how many make a sufficient number to call for the yeas and nays? There were but three or four up.

Mr. TOOMBS. It is too late to raise that point. The question has been decided.

Mr. COLLAMER. Allow me to ask what is the question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to postpone the further consideration of this report until to-morrow at half past twelve o'clock.

Mr. MALLORY. I only desire to say, as the yeas and nays have been ordered, that I should vote against the postponement, but for the fact that I have paired off with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN.]

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GREEN. I would ask leave to make one remark.

Mr. TOOMBS. I object.

Mr. GREEN. I wish merely to say that this subject was taken up with the understanding that it would be postponed. I made the motion accordingly, and shall vote "yea," and maintain my honor.

The result was then announced—yeas 22, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benjamin, Broderick, Brown, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Green, Hamlin, Harlan, Houston, Jones, Kennedy, Simmons, Wade, Wilson, and Yulee—32.

NAYS—Messrs. Biggs, Bigler, Bright, Clay, Fitch, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Polk, Sebastian, Sidel, Toombs, Trumbull, and Wright—14.

So the motion to postpone the further consideration of the subject until half past twelve o'clock to-morrow was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. PUGH, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, April 26, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. J. E. GRAMMER.

The Journal of Saturday was read and approved.

PRIVATE BILLS PASSED.

By unanimous consent, the House proceeded to the consideration of the private bills which were reported from the Committee of the Whole House on Friday last, with a recommendation that they do pass without amendment, when the following bills were taken up and ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time; and, being engrossed, they were subsequently severally read a third time and passed:

A bill (H. R. No. 209) for the relief of the representatives of William Smith, deceased, late of Louisiana;

A bill (H. R. No. 211) for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Pierre Broussard, deceased;

A bill (H. R. No. 100) to revive an act entitled "An act for the relief of the heirs, or their legal representatives, of William Conway, deceased;" and

A bill (H. R. No. 214) for the relief of Regis Loisel, or his legal representatives.

Mr. DAVIDSON moved to reconsider the votes by which the several bills were passed, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. CHAFFEE. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take up the several private bills upon the Speaker's table, and refer them to the appropriate committees.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I hope we shall take up all the bills, both private and public, and dispose of them.

Mr. HOUSTON. Let us take them all as they come.

JOHN CASSIDY.

Mr. GOOCH, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution, which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, requested to communicate to this House copies of all communications and documents on file in his office having reference to the claim or application of John Cassidy for services rendered at the Charlestown navy-yard.

OCEAN MAIL ROUTES.

Mr. FLORENCE asked unanimous consent to introduce the following bill, of which previous notice had been given, for the purpose of reference:

A bill to establish certain post routes between the United States and Europe and South America, and to regulate the transportation of the mails thereon, and to reduce the expenses thereof.

Objection was made.

Mr. FLORENCE. I move to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. The motion is not in order.

TITLE TO LAND WARRANTS.

Mr. KELSEY. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to allow the Committee on Public Lands to report a bill which I introduced some time ago, and had referred to that committee. It is a bill declaring the title to land warrants in certain cases; it is a bill in which almost every gentleman on this floor, and their constituents, are interested. I presume it will pass without objection.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope the committees will be called for reports, and we will then reach that bill soon.

Mr. KELSEY. I am anxious that that bill may be reported and disposed of.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I object.

ADMISSION OF NEW STATES.

Mr. QUITMAN. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution concerning the admission of new States into the Union.

Mr. ENGLISH. I feel constrained to object to the introduction of that resolution.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask that it may be read for information.

Mr. QUITMAN. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of introducing the resolution.

Mr. ENGLISH. I rise to a question of order. It is not in order this day to suspend the rules, for the reason that there is a privileged question before the House.

Mr. KEITT. Let it be read for information. Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. We have a right to know what it is.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order raised by the gentleman from Indiana, that it is not in order to receive or entertain a motion to suspend the rules in consequence of the House having before it for its consideration a privileged question, which any gentleman has the right to call up.

Mr. QUITMAN. I appeal to the gentleman from Indiana to permit it to be read. I believe it will meet the approbation of a large majority of the House. It is not intended to affect any measure that has passed, or is now pending. It is intended for the future alone.

Mr. KEITT. Let it be read.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I object.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. What is the regular order of business?

The SPEAKER. The report of the committee of conference on the Kansas bill.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. SEWARD. I would inquire how that matter comes up?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana calls it up by raising the question of order.

Mr. SEWARD. I did not so understand it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana objected to the Chair entertaining a motion to suspend the rules, because there is a privileged question pending. The gentleman will remember that on Friday and Saturday the Chair held that it was not in order to move to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, or into a Committee of the Whole House, pending the consideration of a privileged question. This matter is before the House upon two grounds: first, as the unfinished business of the preceding day, and then as a privileged question.

Mr. SEWARD. There is no conflict between the Chair and myself. I did not understand that the gentleman from Indiana sought to bring up this privileged question at this time. If he did, the decision of the Chair is correct.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would inquire of the Chair whether this question is not before the House as a privileged question under the rules, and whether a motion to suspend the rules would not also suspend the rule which makes this a privileged question?

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair, a motion to suspend the rules cannot be entertained. The very fact that this business has precedence before the House, precludes a motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. It is just like a second motion to suspend, pending a first motion to suspend.

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. CLAY. I ask leave to introduce a resolution for inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] calls for the regular order of business.

SAN FRANCISCO MARINE HOSPITAL.

Mr. SEWARD. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take from the Speaker's table and put upon its passage Senate resolution No. 2, to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to audit and settle the accounts of the contractor for the erection of the United States marine hospital, at San Francisco, California. The gentleman for whose benefit it is intended has become insane, and his wife is now here, awaiting the action of the House upon this matter. I hope there will be no objection.

Mr. EDIE. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is called for by several gentlemen.

Mr. SEWARD. I hope the gentleman from Kentucky will withdraw his call.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I will withdraw my call.

Mr. POTTLE. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. SEWARD. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] who made the objection has withdrawn it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTLE] in front of the chair calls for the regular order of business.

Mr. SEWARD. That is in reference to another matter. I do not understand that any one objects to the particular matter that I desire to call up.

Mr. CLAY. I now ask that my resolution may be read. It will take but a moment.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the regular order of business is demanded.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate by Mr. HICKER, its Chief Clerk, informing the House that the Senate had passed, without amendment, the bill of the House for the relief of Duncan Robertson; also, that the Senate had passed bill of the House to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1858, with amendments, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House; also, that the Senate had passed a joint resolution to extend for a further term the provisions of the joint resolution approved March 10, 1858, in relation to certain dropped and retired officers of the Navy, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

Mr. LETCHER. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to have the deficiency bill with the amendments of the Senate thereto, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. OLIN and Mr. REAGAN objected.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I want to say to the gentlemen who object, that if they wish to adjourn on the first Monday in June they had better withdraw their objections.

ADMISSION OF KANSAS.

The SPEAKER stated that the pending question was upon agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. ENGLISH,] as amended, postponing the further consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the bill for the admission of Kansas into the Union, until this day two weeks.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I do not know, Mr. Speaker, what is the best way to reach the point which I desire; but the unanimous consent of the House, if I can obtain it, will do it. So far as I am concerned in this matter, I am willing to consent that the vote upon this question shall be taken on Wednesday next, without any delay—that it shall be postponed till that day.

Mr. ENGLISH. If the gentleman will allow me, I wish to state that his proposition will meet with my consent; and, I believe, that of the friends of the bill generally.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I understand the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois to be, that the vote shall be taken at one o'clock on Wednesday next; and I assent to that.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I do not assent to it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Do I understand my colleague to propose that the vote shall be taken on Wednesday at one o'clock, or that the bill shall be postponed till that time?

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I propose that it shall be postponed until that time, to come up then under the rules of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois proposes that the House shall, by unanimous consent, postpone the further consideration of the report of the committee of conference until Wednesday next at one o'clock, at which time the vote shall be taken.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. No, sir, that is not the understanding. My colleague merely moves to postpone the report until that time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to be informed what the specific motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARRIS] is?

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. My object is to have the further consideration of the report postponed until Wednesday next at one o'clock, when its consideration shall be resumed, and the question disposed of under the rules.

Mr. SHORTER. I object.

Mr. BOCKOCK. If we vote down the proposition to postpone now before the House, the gentleman from Illinois can then submit his motion.

Mr. ENGLISH. If I have the power, I propose to withdraw my motion to postpone.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that, in the present state of the question, the gentleman from Indiana cannot withdraw his proposition, inasmuch as it has been amended.

Mr. ENGLISH. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to withdraw my motion.

Mr. SHORTER. I object.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If the House vote down the pending proposition, which is to postpone till this day two weeks, it will then be in order to make a motion to postpone until Wednesday at one o'clock. The object may be attained in that way as well as any other.

Mr. QUITMAN. I would inquire what has become of the call for the previous question?

The SPEAKER. It was voted down on Saturday.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I rise to inquire for information whether, if the motion to postpone until the second Monday in May is voted down, it will not be in order again to move the previous question?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it will.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Or to move to lay the report upon the table?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Well, I move to lay the report of the committee of conference on the table now.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Upon that proposition I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I do not know that the House is full. I therefore move that there be a call of the House. On that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BONHAM. If it is in order I would make an inquiry of the Chair before the call of the roll commences. It is much the same inquiry as I propounded to the Chair on Saturday. Will the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL,] if it prevails, carry with it the Senate bill and the House bill?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. In connection with the inquiry first made, I would inquire if the Senate bill, in any possible state of circumstances, is within the reach of the House for action?

The SPEAKER. The original bill?

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. The Senate bill.

The SPEAKER. For independent action by the House?

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. COX. I would like to inquire if the House bill is not in the same condition?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. STANTON. If the House lays the report of the committee of conference on the table, will not the Senate bill still remain in the Senate, and will not the Senate have power to recede from its disagreement to the House amendment?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. The bill is here.

Mr. STANTON. I understand differently.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. As gentlemen are propounding inquiries to the Chair, I want to ask the Chair whether, if the motion to lay on the table the report of the committee of conference prevails, it does not terminate all legislation upon this subject, and leave Kansas where she was before there was any application made for her admission into the Union?

The SPEAKER. The Chair, with a view of trying to facilitate business, has intimated, in response to inquiries propounded by gentlemen on all sides, his opinion upon questions of order that are not before the Chair; and the Chair, pursuing the same policy, will throw out an intimation to the gentleman from Kentucky, although it is, perhaps, irregular for the Chair to be deciding questions before they properly arise. The Chair is of opinion that if the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky prevails, it will end the whole matter.

Mr. MILLSON. I would like to ask a question of the Chair. I have no doubt the Chair is correct in the statement that if the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky should prevail, it would end the whole matter. But, if this report of the committee of conference is not agreed to, might there not be another committee of conference upon the request of either the House or the Senate?

The SPEAKER. There certainly could be another committee of conference, if the Senate asked for one. But the Chair will not undertake to say whether, if this report should be voted down, another committee of conference could be asked, at this stage of the proceedings, by the House.

Mr. HOUSTON. I object to any more questions, and call for a vote on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS.]

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. My object in making the motion for a call of the House is to see that the House is full. I do not wish to carry out the call. There are certain gentlemen in the city who are not now here. I hope the House will agree to have a call; but as soon as members come in we can suspend the call.

Mr. CAMPBELL. We are willing to have a call. Withdraw the demand for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HOUSTON. I demand a vote upon the question.

The SPEAKER. The motion is not debatable; and the gentleman from Alabama objects to further discussion.

The question was taken on Mr. STEPHENS's motion; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 123, nays 70; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Ahl, Anderson, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bockock, Bonham, Boyce, Branch, Bryan, Burnett, Burns, Campbell, Caruthers, Case, Caskey, Chapman, Horace F. Clark, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Corning, Covode, Cox, Burton Craig, Crawford, Curry, Curtis, Davidson, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Edie, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Eustis, Florence, Foley, Foster, Gartrell, Gillis, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, J. Morrison Harris, Thomas L. Harris, Hatch, Hawkins, Hopkins, Houston, Howard, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Lamar, Lawrence, Leidy, Letcher, Maclay, McQueen, Maynard, Miles, Miller, Milson, Moore, Isaac N. Morris, Niblack, Palmer, Pendleton, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Purviance, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Reilly, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Savage, Scales, Scott, Searing, Seward, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Sickles, Singleton, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, William Stewart, Talbot, Trippe, Ward, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Wilson, Winslow, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, John V. Wright, and Zollcoffer—123.

NAYS—Messrs. Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brynton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Colfax, Comins, Cragin, Darnell, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Deau, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Farnsworth, Fenton, Giddings, Gilman, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Harlan, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Morgan, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Nichols, Olin, Parker, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Ritchie, Robbins, Royce, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Spinner, Stanton, Tappan, Thayer, Tompkins, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Elihu B. Washburn, and Israel Washburn—70.

So it was ordered that there be a call of the House.

Pending the call of the roll, Mr. BURROUGHS stated that he had paired off with Mr. BOWIE.

Mr. FLORENCE stated that Mr. LANDY was detained at home in consequence of sickness in his family, and had paired off until Wednesday next, upon all questions, with Mr. RICAUD.

Mr. WARREN stated that he had paired off with Mr. MONTGOMERY.

Mr. WALTON stated that Mr. MORRILL was necessarily absent, and had paired off for two weeks upon the Kansas question with Mr. FAULKNER.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. At the instance of gentlemen around me I will withdraw the motion to lay the report of the committee of conference on the table.

The House then proceeded to execute its order. The roll was called; and the following members failed to answer to their names:

Messrs. Arnold, Bowie, James Craig, Reuben Davis, Dimmick, Faulkner, Garnett, Gilmer, Goode, Hickman, Hill, Horton, Jacob M. Kunkel, John C. Kunkel, Landy, Matteson, Montgomery, Morrill, Powell, Ricaud, George Taylor, Thompson, Cadwalader C. Washburn, and Wood—24.

The absentees were called; and under the direction of the Speaker the doors were closed.

The absentees were then again called; and announcements were made that the following gentlemen had paired off: Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin, with Mr. ARNOLD; Mr. BOWIE with Mr. BURROUGHS; Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, with Mr. MATTESON; Mr. McKIBBIN with Mr. DIMMICK;

Mr. FAULKNER with Mr. MORRILL; Mr. GARNETT with Mr. HICKMAN; Mr. HORTON with Mr. KUNKEL, of Maryland; Mr. LANDY with Mr. RICAUD; Mr. MONTGOMERY with Mr. WARREN; Mr. POWELL with Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois; Mr. WOOD with Mr. TAYLOR, of New York; Mr. THOMPSON with Mr. STEWART, of Maryland.

The SPEAKER announced that two hundred and eight members had answered to their names.

Mr. UNDERWOOD moved that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

The question then recurred on the motion to postpone as amended.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, asked the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STANTON. The motion to postpone is debatable—is it not?

The SPEAKER. To a limited extent.

Mr. STANTON. I desire to discuss that motion. For some reason that I do not very well comprehend it seems that, whether this question is taken or not, no other business can be done, because we have spent two days in taking about two votes upon this question. It seems to me, therefore, that, if nothing else is to be done, if the time is to be spent, it might as well be spent in giving reasons for and against the postponement as in idling away our time in this way. If there be common consent that this subject shall go over until Wednesday next, I have no disposition to take up the time of the House.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I understood that, by common consent, the subject was to be postponed until Wednesday next.

The SPEAKER. That proposition was objected to.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. If it is the common consent of the House that the vote shall be taken on Wednesday next, that disposition of the question may be made without further delay; if not, there is no other mode of obtaining that result except by vote of the House.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. There is not unanimous consent. I objected distinctly.

Mr. STANTON. If there be no objection to the postponement of the question until Wednesday next, I will not detain the House. Otherwise, I wish to be heard very briefly upon the question of postponement.

Mr. GROW. The proposition cannot be agreed to by unanimous consent.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Who objects?

Mr. GROW. Several members object.

Mr. STANTON. I will therefore go on. The motion to postpone the further consideration of this question until two weeks from to-day, was, as I understand, made by a gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. HILL,] who is now absent, and who does not expect to return until a short time previous to the day named in his motion of postponement. I take it for granted that the motion was made in good faith, to enable him to make up his mind as to the vote he was to give upon the report of the committee of conference. I take it for granted, inasmuch as this report presents him, and all who vote either for or against it, in a new attitude before the country, that he, as the representative of the people who sent him here, desires an opportunity of consulting with them, to ascertain their opinions in relation to it. If I understand the position which the gentleman from Georgia has occupied, as well as that of the gentlemen with whom he has heretofore acted, they assume the ground that there shall be no resubmission of this Lecompton constitution to the people of Kansas.

Mr. BURNETT. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio, in discussing the question of postponement, cannot go into the merits of the original bill, or the pending bill.

Mr. STANTON. I am perfectly aware of that, and do not propose to do it. I am only alluding to the merits of the question so far as to show the propriety and necessity that a gentleman is under of taking time for deliberation and consultation with his constituents.

The SPEAKER. It would be equally competent for the gentleman to go into the entire merits of the bill for the same purpose.

Mr. STANTON. I do not propose to go into the entire merits of the proposition. I do not present any reasons why the report of the committee of conference should or should not be adopted. I take it for granted that there is a great difference between the reasons that may be given fairly for the postponement of a proposition of no sort of magnitude, and those which may be given for the postponement of one of great magnitude—between a very complicated proposition, and a simple proposition—between one which requires no time to consider and understand, and one which requires much time to consider and understand, and which may require a Representative to ask for time to consult his constituents in respect to it. I submit that no gentleman can truly present his reasons on the question of the postponement of any proposition without a reference to the nature and character of the proposition upon which he is called to act. That is all; and these are certainly proper subjects to be alluded to. It is certainly proper to urge the important character of the question before us, to show why we desire that it shall be postponed, in order to give gentlemen who may desire it an opportunity to consult their constituents, who have sent them here.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is very well aware of the ingenuity of the gentleman from Ohio; he has had occasion to observe it oftentimes; but the Chair cannot permit the rule of the House, which restricts debate to the simple question of postponement, to be evaded by indirection.

Mr. STANTON. I submit to the Chair that I have no desire to evade anything. I was submitting in good faith reasons why, in my judgment, this question should be postponed.

The SPEAKER. Within the rules of the House?

Mr. STANTON. Certainly, within the rules of the House. I am doing it in good faith, and not seeking to evade the rules. Now, sir, I believe that if this question should be postponed until the day named by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. HILL,] much light might be reflected upon this question from the various sections of this Confederacy. I believe it to be exceedingly proper that it should be done, and that it is exceedingly appropriate that gentlemen should have time and opportunity to consult those who sent them here, and to cast their votes in accordance with the opinions of their constituents upon this question.

I was about to remark, and strictly within the rule, that this question is now presented in a different form. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HILL] has heretofore been found uniformly voting against any submission of this question. It is now proposed to submit it.

The SPEAKER. It is not competent for the gentleman from Ohio, in his remarks, to discuss the merits of either proposition.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I think that the objection to the postponement will be withdrawn. Let the subject, therefore, by common consent, go over informally until Wednesday next, at one o'clock.

Mr. GROW. I thought the understanding was, before the call of the House, made at the instance of the gentleman from Virginia, that the motion for two weeks' postponement be voted down, and the motion for a postponement to Wednesday next agreed to.

The SPEAKER. That was the understanding of the Chair.

Mr. GROW. The gentleman from Ohio stated that, by common consent, it was to go over to Wednesday, and I stated in reply, from my seat, that it was not by general consent, but by the vote of the House. I understood that to be the way in which this thing was to be managed. I have no objection to that course.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. My understanding is this: on Wednesday next the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ENGLISH] will call up this as a privileged question, and it will come up then as a privileged question under the operation of the rules of the House.

Mr. CLEMENS. Let us agree to that.

Mr. GROW. Then the understanding of my friend from Ohio is, that the motion to postpone for two weeks may be voted down, in the usual course of business, and that then the motion for a postponement to Wednesday may be made, with the understanding that it be carried, and that on that day the question will come up under the rules like any other question; and I presume that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOWARD] will be heard before the question is taken, as it was the understanding that he should be heard when the committee of conference made its report.

Mr. STANTON. If it be the disposition of the House to pass over this question informally, to be called up again on Wednesday next, then I will not occupy the time of the House a moment longer. I have never yet occupied the time of the House for an hour, or a moment, in discussing questions not immediately before it. I believe that there is legitimate business which ought to be done, and I will not occupy the floor longer, and keep the House from proceeding to the execution of that legitimate business. With a view to bring it to a consideration of that business, and that this question may be passed over informally, I will say nothing further on this subject, but will propose a resolution.

Mr. SEWARD. I wish to understand this proposition before I am bound by it.

Mr. GROW. If the gentleman will allow me a moment: I have no objection to this question going over until Wednesday next, and then to come up under the rules. I made no objection to that, and I make none now.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. My understanding is this: the question is to pass over informally, under notice that it will be called up in its present shape on Wednesday next, not that we are to vote down—

Mr. BOCOCK. I shall object to that.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. And not that we are to yield any of the ground that we have already won.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. That is not the understanding.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Then the other understanding is not the understanding either.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. It is to ask the unanimous consent of the House to substitute Wednesday next for the second Monday in May.

Mr. TRIPPE obtained the floor.

Mr. SEWARD. I object to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STANTON] occupying the floor and farming it out.

Mr. STANTON. I yielded it simply for an inquiry.

Mr. SEWARD. I want to say a word, and I have some rights here. Before I am called upon to vote on this proposition, I want to know specifically what it is.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope the gentleman will hear his colleague.

Mr. TRIPPE. I did not hear the statement of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. STANTON,] but I understand that he construed the remarks made by my colleague, [Mr. HILL,] the other day, as basing his reasons for the postponement on the ground that it was his desire to go home and consult his political friends and constituents.

Mr. STANTON. I did not say that the gentleman from Georgia had made that statement; but I said that I thought it would be exceedingly proper he should do so, and that that was one of the reasons controlling his action.

Mr. TRIPPE. Allow me. I recollect what it was that my colleague stated. He based his motion for postponement on reasons controlling his absence; and in regard to the other fact, what he stated was incidental, and I suppose no gentleman objected to it at the time.

Mr. SEWARD. Unless we are to come to a vote on Wednesday next, I shall object to amending the proposition at all. The country is sick of this whole controversy. There is no necessity for any delay; and I will consent to no amendment of the proposition, except with the understanding that on Wednesday next we shall reach some distinct vote on the question. We are now no nearer its decision than we were at the commencement of the session. I am willing to let Wednesday next be fixed upon, if we can get a vote then, and either defeat this conference bill, or carry it through. I want an end of this controversy.

Mr. STANTON. I ask the adoption of a resolution, with the understanding that this question shall go over until Wednesday next—

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I am not a party to that understanding.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to see whether I understand this question. I do not want to occupy the floor, however, with the permission of the gentleman from Ohio; but when he gets through I want to see whether I understand the question before the House.

Mr. STANTON. I yield up the floor.

Mr. HOUSTON. I understand that there has been an agreement of some sort; I do not say that my colleague was a party to any; on the contrary the records show that he was not. There was an agreement that the pending question should be voted down, and that then the proposition of the conference committee should be postponed until Wednesday next at one o'clock. If that be true, and the question be submitted to the House, I think it will be carried almost unanimously. I discover no opposition to that agreement; or, if there be an opposition, it is very small. Why, then, should we hesitate and consume the time of the House fruitlessly, when gentlemen say that time is important, and when all of us who desire to get home on the 7th of June must know it to be important? Why not at once dispose of the matter? Why consume time when it is apparent that four fifths of the House favor the agreement?

Mr. STANTON. The difference between gentlemen here is whether this shall go over informally until Wednesday next, or whether the proposition for the two weeks' postponement shall be voted down. I understand that the agreement is that the whole matter shall go over until Wednesday next without any vote.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. There is no agreement of that kind.

Mr. HOUSTON. That was not the understanding, that the question should go over until Wednesday next, and then to come up for the House to decide on the postponement to the second Monday of May.

Mr. CLAY. I rise to a question of order. I believe that there is some proposition before the House. Is this debate in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the discussion is not very relevant to the pending question, which is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. ENGLISH,] as amended on motion of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. HILL.]

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I move to amend that by inserting next Wednesday in place of the time fixed by that amendment.

Mr. SEWARD. That is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the House having inserted one day in the motion, it is not in order to strike it out and to insert another.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to insert Wednesday next.

Mr. SEWARD. I shall object, unless we shall have some definite arrangement to take then the final vote on the matter. If the floor be surrendered, I want to say something on the postponement. I am as well prepared to vote on this question to-day as I shall be six months hence; and in giving my vote, sir, I shall do it with the best lights I have on this subject, right or wrong; and, like a full-grown man, I will go home and meet the responsibility I have taken. It is an easy matter to trump up objections to acting upon this matter at once. These secret motives which linger in the breasts of gentlemen, in view of some political movement in the future, furnish, in my opinion, the great controlling object to postpone. It is to mature and manufacture political capital.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I rise to a point of order. The gentleman from Georgia is indirectly, if not directly, impugning the motives of the members of this House.

Mr. SEWARD. The gentleman is mistaken.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the question of order. The Chair would say that he understood the remarks of the gentleman exactly as did the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SEWARD. And I say to the Speaker and the gentleman that I impugn the motives of no man. In speaking of the motives which control the actions of gentlemen upon this floor, I did not say that they were bad motives. That is for gentlemen themselves to consider.

The SPEAKER. It is hardly competent for the gentleman to assign motives, good or bad.

Mr. SEWARD. I have a right to pronounce a eulogy upon the character of any gentleman in this House. [Laughter.] But I shall endeavor to keep myself within the rules in discussing this question of postponing. I do not intend to travel out of it. I ask the members of this House what object, which looks to the good of this country, can be accomplished by the postponement of this question? Can anything new be presented? The whole one hundred and twenty speeches on Kansas delivered upon this floor, have contained substantially the same ideas and opinions, revamped and rehashed, until the country is thoroughly disgusted and sick with this whole controversy; and I want it terminated. The interest of the country demands it; the condition of the country demands action; the expense of every day's legislation demands that an end should be put to this controversy; the character and reputation of the House of Representatives demand it. We have trifled with this question too long, and it is time an end should be put to this matter.

If gentlemen upon this side of the House have the power to reject the admission of Kansas, let them do it by their votes. If, on the contrary, gentlemen upon the other side of the House have the power, let them vote her admission. Let us meet the responsibility now. I am willing to vote to-day; and I think that is a candid way to meet the whole question. I do not want to go home to ask my constituents what I shall do. I am here to think for them, and I shall do it honestly and fairly; and if I commit a mistake in the honest exercise of my judgment, they can change their Representative if they desire it. I shall wait for no newspapers or letters from home by which to shape my course; for when my opinions have to be molded in that way, I forfeit my own self-respect, surrender my own judgment, resolve myself into a state of political nonentity, and fit myself to become somebody's slave, who perhaps is not entitled to be my master, to say the least. I know this question to some extent partakes of the nature of a sectional controversy.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia cannot enter into a discussion of the merits of either proposition.

Mr. SEWARD. I do not understand that the bill itself contains any principle of sectionality. I am talking outside of the bill. I wish I could talk of what it contains.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hopes the gentleman will confine himself to the subject-matter before the House, strictly in order.

Mr. SEWARD. Having said what I desire to say in order, and not being inclined to go outside of the rules, I will say no more.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to know what effect it would have upon the entire proposition before the House, if the House should now lay upon the table the resolution as amended?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman mean the proposition to postpone?

Mr. HOUSTON. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that it cannot be separated from the original proposition.

Mr. HOUSTON. From the bill itself?

The SPEAKER. From the bill itself; and, therefore, a motion to lay upon the table the pending proposition would carry the whole subject with it.

Mr. HOUSTON. I understand that, on the last day we were engaged in legislation, the Speaker entertained a proposition to amend what I understood then was called a resolution to postpone. If it is in that condition, it seems to me that it can be detached, and that we can arrest debate by laying that question on the table, and then we could adopt next Wednesday as the day to take the vote, by a separate and distinct motion.

My purpose is this: I was no party to any understanding which was had by the two sides of the House as to the time of voting, yet I understand it has been agreed to, and I propose now to carry it out in good faith. I want to save the time of the House; and I desire that when we meet on Wednesday next we shall come forward and vote upon the bill agreed upon by the committee of conference. If I should call the previous question, and it should be sustained, it would bring the House to a direct vote upon the bill as reported by the committee of conference. But I do not want to do that, though I am ready to vote now. I am prepared to vote to-day; and if my wish were consulted, I would have a vote now, and let the bill take its course as a majority of the House should decide.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Will the gentleman permit me to make a single suggestion? I think there is really no misunderstanding upon this matter. There is a proposition to postpone this matter until Wednesday. Some gentlemen say they are ready to postpone it until that time, provided the whole matter goes over, and they can then avail themselves of the pending motion. Other gentlemen say they are willing to postpone if there is to be a vote then. What does that mean? Upon that day gentlemen may move to postpone for one week, two weeks, or a year, or they may move to lay the matter upon the table. The whole effect would therefore be to throw the matter over until Wednesday next, and it makes no difference whether—

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman is slightly mistaken in my view of the case.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope the gentleman will allow me to complete my sentence.

Mr. HOUSTON. I understood this to be the case: that it was agreed between gentlemen who had the management of this matter that the present motion should be withdrawn, if general consent could be obtained, and then the understanding upon all sides of the House would be, that, on Wednesday next, we would come forward and vote upon the bill of the conference committee.

[Cries of "No!" "No!"]

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope the gentleman will allow me to complete my proposition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must arrest this course of remark. There is no understanding of that sort which can be recognized by the Chair. The Chair can only recognize motions that are made according to parliamentary rules.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am aware of that, and I am not attempting to enforce an agreement before the Chair as a court proceeding to enforce contracts. I am arguing to the House as well as to the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Alabama, in making his remarks, must confine them to the question of the propriety or non-propriety of the postponement.

Mr. HOUSTON. Very well, sir. I desire to get at what seemed to be the understanding, and to aid in carrying it out. I am willing to vote to-day, if the House shall see fit, to call the previous question. I am willing to meet this question, and vote upon it now. If, however, gentlemen prefer to postpone it until Wednesday, then let us vote down the pending proposition without further debate or consumption of time, and agree, in good faith, that upon Wednesday next we will come forward and vote upon the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I presume there will be no objection to the pending motion to postpone being withdrawn, and the other submitted, when gentlemen remember that on Wednesday next they can renew this identical motion to postpone.

Mr. HOUSTON. But that would be a violation of the understanding, if we should agree to Wednesday.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I do not understand the gentleman from Alabama to object to any parliamentary motion being made on that day, if the report is postponed.

Mr. HOUSTON. Not at all; but the gentleman from Alabama means this: that if the House agrees by common consent to take the vote on that day, this motion could not, in good faith, be renewed.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Of course, they might move to postpone it indefinitely, or to a day certain.

Mr. BURNETT. Who has the floor?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. BURNETT. Then I insist that he shall be allowed to occupy it without these constant interruptions.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Is there any objection to the postponement of this subject until Wednesday next, with the understanding that it shall come up then under the rules, and that all parliamentary motions may be made?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. None on this side.

Mr. CLINGMAN. The majority can then second the previous question and pass the bill, or vote it down, or postpone it indefinitely, or to a day certain. I hope there will be no objection to that.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I desire to say a few words upon this subject. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUNTON] insisted constantly in his remarks that there is an understanding about this thing, and that he only wants to carry it out. His radical error is this: that there has been no understanding at all about it. When the report of the committee of conference came in, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] moved to postpone its consideration until to-day. His colleague, [Mr. HILL], who is now absent, proposed to postpone it for two weeks. Gentlemen upon the other side of the House struggled against the prevalence of that motion, but, notwithstanding, it did prevail. The gentlemen then struggled till they procured an adjournment rather than permit the question on the motion, as amended, to be taken. Next day we came and passed through another ineffectual effort to get a vote taken upon the pending question.

The same question is now pending here that was pending last Friday. And gentlemen propose that we shall give up all that we have struggled two days to attain, and, by way of a general understanding, let them off from the position which we have striven to maintain.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I would—

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I have very little to say, and I will do it now. I prefer not to be interrupted.

Gentlemen now propose that we shall abandon the present status, in which there will be a direct vote upon the motion to postpone until the second Monday in May—that is for two weeks—and agree that a motion to postpone till Wednesday, the day after to-morrow, shall prevail; and that then, when the report comes up on the day after to-morrow, it may be subject to any parliamentary motions. Permit me to suggest to the gentleman that if it passes over informally in its present status, to wit: with the question pending on the motion to postpone for two weeks, until Wednesday, and comes up then in that shape, if there is strength enough on the part of gentlemen on the other side of the House to vote it down, the question will immediately recur upon the report of the committee of conference. What do gentlemen upon that side of the House propose to gain? And what do gentlemen upon this side of the House propose to concede by abandoning the ground that we now occupy, and agreeing that the question shall come up on Wednesday upon a proposition that the vote shall then be taken? If there be a desire upon this side of the House that the subject shall be postponed for two weeks, and we have not upon Wednesday strength to maintain that postponement, then the gentlemen upon the other side will have an opportunity to take a direct vote on Wednesday upon their bill.

If, on the contrary, we have strength to maintain the postponement, and desire to maintain it, why not leave to ourselves the power upon Wednesday of carrying out our own will? Why yield? Why put the matter in a different position now from that in which it would be on Wednesday? If gentlemen upon the other side can vote down the motion to postpone on Wednesday, then they can have a vote upon their bill. If there be a desire upon this side of the House to postpone for two weeks, why shall we concede the present status of the proposition, in which, as gentlemen are well aware, it is not amendable? The proposition is now for a postponement for two weeks, and gentlemen on the other side cannot substitute Wednesday or any intervening day. The gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. HILL], at whose instance the motion to postpone for two weeks was adopted, is absent. I do not know how he will vote upon the main proposition. He is not here to-day to speak for himself; but from the sign he manifested the other day, I should be inclined to let him be here to vote. There are gentlemen upon this side of the House whose votes I do understand, who are absent now, and are not paired off. I do not know that those gentlemen will be here on Wednesday. So far as I am myself concerned, I am in the attitude of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. SEWARD], ready to record my vote against the report of the committee of conference now or at any time.

Mr. SEWARD. There is this difference between us: I am ready to vote for it, and the gentleman against it.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, the proposition before the House at this time is not that gentlemen on the opposite side of the House shall concede anything, if they do not want to do so. We, on this side of the House, have not asked the other side of the House to concede any status, as the gentleman from Kentucky says, unless they want to do it. I merely desired, by consent, to save a vote. Gentlemen upon this side of the House stand upon their rights.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. So do we.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The pending question is, will the House agree to the original proposition as amended, to postpone this matter for two weeks, or will they vote it down and then entertain the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois, to fix an earlier day. That is the question. My suggestion was made in order to save time in taking votes. I asked gentlemen to concede nothing. The question was submitted to the good sense of the House whether the day fixed in the amendment of my colleague [Mr. HILL] was not too distant. My colleague who made the motion to postpone, distinctly stated that he was influenced by motives personal to himself alone. He stated it then and reiterated it afterwards. He is absent. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STANTON] has made a speech in defense of him which I think my colleague would repudiate if he were here. I have no hesitancy in saying that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must confine himself to the proposition to postpone.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I am confining myself to replying to the gentleman from Ohio.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Ohio was inadvertently permitted to get out of order, it will not justify the gentleman from Georgia in proceeding out of order.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I do not think it addresses itself to the good reason of this House to postpone a matter of this importance barely to accommodate one individual. That was the proposition of my colleague, [Mr. HILL], made distinctly and definitely, that he had to leave, and could not be present on Wednesday next. Now, sir, there are perhaps thirty of the members of this House who would like to leave. I want to leave myself; and, while I am therefore disposed to accommodate my colleague, there are others who will not be accommodated by a postponement for two weeks.

Now, sir, I do not want to detain the House. I want the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL], and those who are acting with him, to concede nothing. All I ask is, that, if a majority of the House are in favor of taking the vote upon an earlier day than two weeks hence, the pending motion may be voted down, and that the House will fix on Wednesday next, which I think will give ample time to consider the question.

Mr. QUITMAN. I see no reason in discussing the propriety of taking the vote upon this question upon one day or another. I am in favor of the longest day or the furthest day that has been proposed, and which has been accepted by the deliberate vote of the House, and upon the faith of which several gentlemen have made their arrangements to act. If, however, the opinion of the House has changed upon that proposition, I submit. Like the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL], my mind has been made up on this question. But I submit the propriety of some delay before proceeding to the final determination of a question which has been discussed here for nearly the whole session. What is the pressing necessity, after so much delay, for coming to a final vote this week or the next week? And, sir, although some gentlemen may speak rather contemptuously of the idea of waiting to hear the opinions of our constituents, in my opinion, the proudest jewel in the character of a Representative is in a due deference to the opinions and wishes of his constituents upon a great public measure which has agitated the country, when it comes to be finally settled. If good could be accomplished by the immediate disposal of this question, I should be content. But, sir, the House has deliberately, by a considerable majority, decided to postpone the further consideration of this question for two weeks from to-day. Gentlemen have made their arrangements upon the faith of that vote. I myself have made some arrangements based upon that vote, and I see no reason for changing that determination upon the part of the House.

I do not think the time of the House should be consumed in discussing this matter. I hope the vote will be taken on the proper question before the House, whether this shall be postponed for two weeks, according to the amendment, or until Wednesday next. For myself, I prefer to leave the question as it has been determined by the House. What do we gain by leaving the question of further postponement open until Wednesday? Why not determine at once the time when the vote shall be taken, and give gentlemen due notice of the time? I stand in a position different from that of many of my friends with whom I concur in almost every political measure.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. When I made the suggestion that by general consent this question should be postponed until Wednesday next, I supposed it would meet the universal concurrence of the House; that we should proceed with other business to-day and to-morrow, and that on Wednesday this report should be taken up and continued under consideration until it was disposed of. I find, however, that there is a very great diversity of opinion as to the propriety of fixing that day; and in consideration thereof I withdraw the proposition made by me, and leave the proposition standing as it did before.

Mr. MILLSON. I have a single suggestion to make to the House. I have listened with some attention to the progress of this debate; and it seems to me that the House are very generally agreed in their wishes as to the result, but that there is a very prevalent misapprehension upon both sides of the House as to what they respectively intend or mean. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARRIS] proposed that, by general consent, this question should be postponed until Wednesday next, and that the House should then proceed to the consideration of the question.

I believe that gentlemen on the other side of the House desire that this shall be done; but they apprehend—and that seems the only difficulty in the way—that if the question be postponed until Wednesday next the vote will be taken upon the report of the committee of conference without discussion.

Now, to relieve their apprehensions so far as one individual can relieve them, I say that I regard that report as a fair and proper subject of debate, and, for one, I would not be willing to concur in a demand for the previous question until there shall have been a proper discussion upon it. And I would suggest to them that, by postponing this question until the second Monday in May, they defeat their own object, because it is bringing it so near the termination of the session as to preclude so much debate upon it as could take place if postponed till Wednesday next.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. The question has been discussed a long time.

Mr. MILLSON. No, sir. The particular question before us has not been discussed at all. I, for one, though I am ready to vote upon it, think it a proper subject for reasonable debate, and I shall not object to such debate. I voted against the demand for the previous question on Saturday, because I was not willing to stifle discussion upon it; I believe we shall gain by discussion, and I am willing that the discussion upon it shall proceed to a reasonable length. Now all that is proposed is, that by the general acquiescence of the House we shall reject the motion to postpone as amended, ["No, no,"] and that we shall then reject the original proposition fixing a day for the consideration of the report, and that an independent motion be made, which I presume could be done, postponing this question until Wednesday next. If this is done, at that time we commence the consideration of the question. It does not follow, of course, that we terminate it on that day. Believing that to be the general desire of the majority of the House, I hope that we will proceed to take a vote on the question in its present form, reject the resolution as amended, reject the original proposition, and then adopt a new and independent resolution, postponing the further consideration of the question until Wednesday next, when we shall commence the discussion which I think it proper should take place. For one, sir, I say that I shall not vote for the previous question until a reasonable time has elapsed to discuss that question.

The question recurred on Mr. ENGLISH's motion as amended on motion of Mr. HILL.

The question was taken, and it was decided in the negative—yeas 100, nays 104; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Bonham, Brayton, Bryant, Buffinton, Burlingame, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Horace F. Clark, Clawson, Clark B. So the motion, as amended, was disagreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table. The latter motion was agreed to.

PAY OF DECEASED MEMBERS.

Mr. NIBLACK. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of this House, to the widows of the Hon. Samuel Brenton, of the Hon. John G. Montgomery, and of the Hon. James Lockhart, elected members of this House for the present Congress, and now deceased, the compensation of said Representatives at the rate of $3,000 per annum, to wit: to each of the first two, for three months; and to the last, for six months.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. This resolution is in direct violation of the law.

Mr. NIBLACK. If there be objection, I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of introducing that resolution.

Mr. KEITT. I wish simply to make this inquiry: have the successors of those named in the resolution drawn pay for the whole term, or is it expected that both shall draw pay?

Mr. NIBLACK. I understand that they have, under the law.

Mr. KEITT. Then it is paying double.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I do not object to the introduction of the resolution. I am willing that the resolution shall be introduced; but I wish to say to the gentleman from Indiana, that the resolution is in direct violation of the members' compensation law, unless the proposition be to pay this out of the contingent fund of the House; then the resolution would not deprive the sitting members of their full pay, or otherwise the payment to the persons named in the resolution. The compensation bill does not take any notice of the election of a member until he comes here on the first day, or some other day of the session, to be sworn in. If a member dies before he is sworn in he is entitled to nothing; his administrators are entitled to nothing; and when his successor comes here and is sworn in, he draws pay from the commencement of the term.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I object to debate.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object to the resolution.

Mr. NIBLACK. Then I move that the rules be suspended, in order that the resolution may be introduced.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HUGHES. I wish to give notice of an amendment which I will offer, if the rules be suspended.

Mr. BURNETT. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will withdraw the call for the yeas and nays, and take the question first by tellers.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. This is the first time an attempt has been made to violate the members' compensation law, and I want to make a record on it.

Mr. NIBLACK. If debate be in order, I want to say a word.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. I object to debate.

Mr. NIBLACK. I would like to have read a resolution similar to this which was lately passed by the Senate.

Mr. LETCHER. I hope the amendment which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HUGHES] proposes to offer, if the rules be suspended, as well as the resolution referred to by his colleague, [Mr. NIBLACK], will be read.

Mr. NIBLACK's resolution was again read:

The amendment which Mr. HUGHES gave notice that he would offer was read, as follows:

And to DANIEL W. GOOCH, a member of this House from the State of Massachusetts, so much money as will make the compensation of said Gooch equal to that of other members of this House, less the compensation from the time of the meeting of the House, (to wit, the 7th day of December, 1857), to the time when said Gooch was sworn as a member of this House, (to wit, the — day of December, 18—) said payments to be made at the times and in the sums payable to other members of this Congress.

Mr. WARREN. I suppose this is a question to suspend the rules. I propose to submit a simple remark before the vote is taken.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. I object.

The SPEAKER. It is objected to, and debate is not in order.

Mr. WARREN. I desire very much to call the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee to—

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 67, nays 103; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Anderson, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Burlingame, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, John B. Clark, Clawson, Cockerill, Colfax, Comins, Corning, Covode, Curtis, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Dawes, Dewart, Elliott, English, Florence, Foley, Foster, Gillis, Goodwin, Granger, Gregg, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Hatch, Hawkins, Hughes, Kellogg, Kilgore, Leach, Leidy, Mason, Niblack, Pettit, Peyton, Phillips, Pike, Pottle, Reilly, Royce, Russell, Savage, Scott, Aaron Shaw, Shorter, Sickles, Robert Smith, William Stewart, Walbridge, Walton, Ward, Warren, Elihu B. Washburne, Wilson, and Augustus R. Wright—67.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bocoock, Bonham, Branch, Bryant, Buffinton, Burnett, Caskie, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Horace F. Clark, Clay, Clingman, Cobb, John Cochrane, Cox, Cragin, Burton Craige, Crawford, Curry, Damrell, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Iowa, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Dowdell, Edmundson, Farnsworth, Fenton, Gartrell, Greenwood, Groesbeck, Harlan, J. Morrison Harris, Thomas L. Harris, Hopkins, Houston, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Kelsey, Knapp, Lamar, Leiter, Letcher, Lovejoy, Maclay, McQueen, Humphrey Marshall, Maynard, Miles, Millson, Moore, Morgan, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Mott, Nichols, Parker, Phelps, Potter, Purviance, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Ruffin, Sandidge, Seales, Searing, Seward, Henry M. Shaw, John Sherman, Singleton, William Smith, Spinner, Stanton, Stevenson, Tabbot, Tappan, Miles Taylor, Thayer, Tompkins, Underwood, Wade, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Wortendyke, and Zollcoffer—104.

So the House refused to suspend the rules.

Pending the call,

Mr. FOSTER said: I would inquire what has been the usual custom in regard to this matter?

The SPEAKER. There has been no usage, to the knowledge of the Chair. The compensation bill was only passed at the last Congress.

The call being temporarily suspended on account of confusion in the Hall,

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio, inquired if it would be in order to have the compensation bill read?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think anything would be in order.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I move that the House, by general consent, suspend conversation, and allow the roll to be called.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would be extremely gratified if the proposition of the gentleman from North Carolina would be assented to by the House. [Cries of "agreed," "agreed."]

The call of the roll was then concluded, and the result announced as above recorded.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. LETCHER. I desire to have the deficiency bill taken up from the Speaker's table.

Mr. STANTON. There is objection for a moment until I can offer—

Mr. LETCHER. Then I move to suspend the rules.

The motion was agreed to; and the deficiency bill was taken from the Speaker's table, and the Senate amendments thereto reported to the House.

Mr. LETCHER. I suppose the question will be upon concurring with the Senate in their amendments.

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. LETCHER. Every gentleman will have an opportunity to express his opinion by his vote on each one of these amendments. One I shall vote for, and the other two I shall vote against. I now move the previous question.

Mr. SEWARD. I move to postpone the consideration of the bill for two weeks.

The SPEAKER. The motion cannot be entertained.

Mr. SEWARD. Then I move to commit the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. That motion cannot be entertained pending the call for the previous question.

Mr. SEWARD. Then I move to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I desire to move an amendment to one of the Senate's amendments; and, therefore, I hope the House will not sustain the previous question.

Mr. SEWARD. I make my motion because I am not going to be compelled to vote upon a bill or amendments I know nothing about, and we may as well meet this question now.

Mr. BURNETT. I rise to a question of order. The previous question has been demanded, and debate is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken. Debate is not in order.

Mr. STANTON. I rise to a question of order. I understand that a bill to appropriate money shall not be considered except in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. LETCHER. There is no appropriation in either of these amendments.

Mr. STANTON. The rule is, that no proposition appropriating money shall be considered, except in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order raised by the gentleman from Ohio. The matters which are proposed by the Senate to be stricken out of this bill have been considered in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The additional section proposed by the Senate does not provide for the appropriation of money at all.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] appeals to the gentleman from Virginia to withdraw the call for the previous question.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I desire to offer an amendment to one of the amendments of the Senate. I do not wish to speak to it at all.

Mr. BURNETT. I object, as long as the call for the previous question is pending.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I hope my amendment may be read.

Mr. BURNETT. I object.

Mr. SEWARD. I withdraw the motion to lay the bill upon the table, and hope the House will vote down the previous question.

Tellers were demanded upon the call for the previous question.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HARLAN, and WRIGHT of Georgia, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 91, noes 75.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered to be put, being first upon the amendment of the Senate to strike out the following clause:

"To enable John C. Rives to pay to the reporters of the House, for reporting the debates of the present session of Congress, the usual additional compensation of $800 each—$4,000."

Mr. FLORENCE. If it be in order, I move to non-concur in the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. REAGAN demanded the yeas and nays, but subsequently withdrew the demand.

Mr. HOUSTON renewed it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 67, nays 119; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bocoche, Boyce, Branch, Bryan, Burnett, Caskie, Ezra Clark, Horace F. Clark, Clay, Cobb, Cox, Burton Craige, Crawford, Curry, Edmundson, Elliott, Foley, Garrett, Greenwood, Harlan, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Lamar, Lawrence, Letcher, MacLay, McQueen, Mason, Miles, Miller, Milson, Moore, Mott, Pendleton, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Reilly, Ruffin, Sandidge, Seales, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Singleton, William Smith, Stevenson, Talbot, Miles Taylor, Tompkins, Underwood, Ward, Winslow, Wortendyke, John V. Wright, and Zollicoffer—67.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Ahl, Andrews, Bennett, Billingham, Blair, Bliss, Bonham, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burns, Burroughs, Campbell, Caruthers, Case, Chapman, John B. Clark, Clawson, Clingman, Clark B. Cochrane, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Colfax, Comins, Corning, Covode, Cragin, James Craig, Curtis, Darnell, Davidson, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, English, Essist, Farnsworth, Fenton, Florence, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Goodwin, Granger, Gregg, Groesbeck, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, J. Morrison Harris, Thomas L. Harris, Hatch, Hawkins, Hoard, Howard, Jewett, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Leach, Leidy, Leiter, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Maynard, Morgan, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Murray, Niblack, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Russell, Seward, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Robert Smith, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Wade, Walbridge, Walton, Warren, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburne, White, Wilson, Woodson, and Augustus R. Wright—119.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

The question recurred upon the second amendment of the Senate, to strike out the third section of the bill, as follows:

"Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the accounting officer of the Treasury be authorized and directed to allow credit to the Clerk of the House of Representatives for such payments out of its contingent fund as have been, or may be, made, under allowances authorized by the House of Representatives during the last Congress: Provided, That said allowances shall have been duly approved by the Committee of Accounts: And be it further provided, That the said allowances be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

Mr. BURNETT demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 55, nays 126; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Avery, Barksdale, Bocoche, Bonham, Branch, Bryan, Burnett, Horace F. Clark, Clay, Clingman, Cobb, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Cox, Burton Craige, Crawford, Curry, Edmundson, Elliott, Greenwood, Gregg, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Houston, Huyler, George W. Jones, Lamar, Lawrence, MacLay, McQueen, Mason, Miller, Milson, Niblack, Pendleton, Peyton, Quitman, Reagan, Reilly, Ruffin, Seales, Henry M. Shaw, John Sherman, Singleton, William Smith, Stanton, Stevenson, Talbot, Miles Taylor, Tompkins, Underwood, Ward, Wortendyke, and John V. Wright—55.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Ahl, Andrews, Bennett, Billingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burns, Burroughs, Campbell, Caruthers, Case, Caskie, Chapman, John B. Clark, John B. Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Colfax, Comins, Corning, Covode, Cragin, James Craig, Darnell, Davidson, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Dawes, Dean, Dewart, Dick, Dodd, Dowdell, Durfee, English, Farnsworth, Fenton, Florence, Foley, Foster, Garrett, Giddings, Gilman, Goodwin, Granger, Groesbeck, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, J. Morrison Harris, Hawkins, Hoard, Howard, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Kelly, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Leach, Leidy, Leiter, Letcher, Lovejoy, Maynard, Miles, Morgan, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Murray, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Phelps, Phillips, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Ready, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Sandidge, Savage, Scott, Searing, Seward, Aaron Shaw, Judson W. Sherman, Robert Smith, Spinner, Stallworth, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Tupper, Wade, Walbridge, Walton, Warren, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburne, Watkins, White, Wilson, Woodson, Augustus R. Wright, and Zollicoffer—126.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. WHITELEY stated that he had paired off upon this vote with Mr. HUGHES.

Mr. MOORE stated that he was not within the bar when his name was called, or he should have voted "ay."

The question recurred upon the third amendment of the Senate to add the following as an additional section to the bill:

"And be it further enacted, That whenever, hereafter, contracts shall be made by the Secretary of War by virtue of the sixth section of the act of 1820, chapter 52, he shall, if Congress be in session at the time, promptly report to both Houses thereof the reasons for making such contract, stating fully all the facts and circumstances which, in his judgment, rendered such contract necessary. If Congress be not in session at the time of making such contract, he shall, at the commencement of the next session, make such report to both Houses. And no such contracts shall be made, hereafter, except in cases of pressing exigency."

Mr. QUITMAN. I desire to move to strike out the last clause of that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman cannot be entertained, as the previous question is operating upon the amendment.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, demanded the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. LAWRENCE called for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

The amendment was agreed to—ayes one hundred and thirty-one, noes not counted.

Mr. LETCHER. I move to reconsider the votes which have been taken on these several propositions, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. Let me appeal to the gentleman from Virginia to let this amendment also go to the committee of conference, if there is to be one, so that the suggestion of the gentleman from Mississippi may be carried out.

Mr. HOUSTON. The amendment of the Senate has been concurred in.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. You may call for a division upon reconsidering the several amendments.

Mr. LETCHER. The vote was taken upon the amendments separately, originally.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin has the right to call for separate votes upon reconsidering and laying on the table the motions to reconsider the votes upon the several amendments.

Mr. LETCHER. I call for the vote, then, upon the first two.

Mr. HOWARD. The gentleman from Virginia did not vote in the majority upon the first amendment, and cannot make the motion to reconsider.

Mr. PHELPS. Then I move that the vote non-concurring in the first amendment be reconsidered, and that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. LETCHER. I now ask for the vote upon the second.

The motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. LETCHER. I now move to reconsider the vote by which the last amendment was concurred in, and move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. I think the gentleman from Virginia should have no objection to allowing the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUITMAN] to offer his amendment.

Several MEMBERS objected to debate.

Mr. LETCHER. To hear what the gentleman from Wisconsin has to say, I withdraw the motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. In order to give the gentleman from Mississippi an opportunity to offer his amendment to the third amendment of the Senate, I hope the House will reconsider the vote concurring in it. Let the amendment be offered, and the whole matter go to the committee of conference.

Mr. LETCHER. Is the amendment in a position where it can be amended?

The SPEAKER. Not unless the House reconsider the vote concurring in the amendment.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. I understand that if the House disagrees with the Senate amendment, the whole subject will go to the committee of conference.

Mr. LETCHER. I renew the motion to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. I hope the House will vote down the motion.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I object to debate.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. I demand the yeas and nays upon the motion.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion to reconsider was then laid on the table.

RECESS IN COMMITTEE.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I ask the consent of the House to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That during the present week, it shall be in order each day after to-day, for the Committee of the Whole to take a recess until seven o'clock p. m., after which hour general debate may be indulged in: Provided, That no vote shall be taken at such evening session, except on motions that the committee rise, and that the House adjourn.

Mr. SICKLES. I object.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move that the rules be suspended.

The rules were suspended, two thirds having voted in favor thereof.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I now call the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. HOUSTON. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to withdraw the demand for the previous question for a moment, to allow me to offer an amendment. I propose to move that except during the evening sessions, the debate in committee shall be confined to the subject under consideration.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I insist on my demand for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded; and the main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. CLAY, (at fifteen minutes to four o'clock, p. m.) I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. FLORENCE. I demand the yeas and nays upon that motion.

Mr. SICKLES demanded tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered; and the yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. On Saturday last I consulted both sides of the House on this question, and I ascertained that the general feeling was in favor of these night sessions for general debate, with the understanding that during the day the debate in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union should be confined strictly to the question pending, being the appropriation bills, and so believing, I have presented the resolution before the House. As there seems to be considerable diversity of opinion on the subject this morning I will withdraw the resolution. My only object is that the regular and ordinary legislative business of the session may be promptly considered, and the House placed in condition for the final adjournment on the 7th of June next, which has been agreed to by concurrent vote of the two Houses.

Mr. CLINGMAN. The same thing can be accomplished by agreement of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to take a recess with the understanding that the evening sessions shall be devoted to general debate. Cannot the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, I would inquire of the Chair, take a recess, when that was the desire, from three or four o'clock until seven o'clock of the evening?

The SPEAKER. That depends entirely upon the chairman of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Some chairmen have decided one way and some another.

Mr. CLINGMAN. It has been frequently decided as I have indicated, and it will be so decided, I think, again.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Is it in order now to withdraw the resolution?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that the previous question having been ordered it is not competent for the gentleman from Pennsylvania to withdraw the resolution without the leave of the House.

Mr. SICKLES. I move that the resolution be laid upon the table.

Mr. BURNETT, (at five minutes to four o'clock, p. m.) I move that the House do now adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 65, noes 100.

So the House refused to adjourn

Mr. FLORENCE demanded the yeas and nays on the motion to lay the resolution on the table.

The House was divided; and there were—ayes twenty-six.

Mr. FLORENCE demanded tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. OLIN and HAWKINS were appointed.

The House was divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 28, noes 112.

So the yeas and nays were ordered; one fifth of those present having voted in the affirmative.

Mr. BARKSDALE moved (at four o'clock) that the House adjourn.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that motion until I can offer a resolution; and then I will renew it.

The SPEAKER. The House is already acting under a suspension of the rules.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I would inquire of the Chair whether, if the House adjourn now, this resolution will not be the first business in the morning?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it will; the previous question having been ordered.

The question was then taken on the motion to adjourn; and it was decided in the negative, there being, on a division—ayes 71, noes 92.

The question recurring on the motion to lay the resolution on the table, it was taken, and decided in the negative—ayes 49, nays 95; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bockock, Bryon, Burnett, Burns, Caskie, John B. Clark, Clay, Clingman, Cobb, Burton Craig, Curry, Davis of Indiana, Dowdell, Edmundson, Florence, Foley, Gregg, Hawkins, Houston, Hughes, Jackson, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Lamar, Millson, Niblack, Pendleton, Phillips, Reagan, Ruffin, Savage, Seales, Scott, Henry M. Shaw, Sickles, Singleton, William Smith, Stallworth, Stevenson, Miles Taylor, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Woodson, and Zollcoffer—49.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Biles, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Horace F. Clark, Clawson, John Cochrane, Colfax, Comins, Corning, Covode, Cragin, James Craig, Curtis, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Daves, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, J. Morrison Harris, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Honard, Howard, Kelly, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Leach, Lester, Lovejoy, Maclay, Humphrey Marshall, Morgan, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Peyton, Pike, Potter, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Sandidge, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Robert Smith, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Talbot, Tappan, Thayer, Tompkins, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Walton, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, and Wilson—95.

So the House refused to lay the resolution on the table.

Pending the call.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES said: Having proposed to withdraw my resolution, I vote in the affirmative.

Mr. FLORENCE. I rise to a privileged motion. I move to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered upon this resolution.

Mr. CAMPBELL. And I move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. FLORENCE. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SAVAGE moved (at four o'clock and twenty minutes) that the House adjourn.

Mr. FLORENCE. I demand the yeas and nays, and tellers upon the yeas and nays.

Tellers were refused; and the yeas and nays were refused.

Mr. CLAY. Is a motion for a call of the House in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. Why?

The SPEAKER. It is expressly provided by the rule that when the previous question has been seconded, no call of the House shall be in order.

The question was taken on the motion to adjourn, and it was decided in the negative.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The question recurring on the motion to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Is it in order to move that the House adjourn until seven o'clock this evening?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. BURNETT. Is it in order to move to lay the resolution on the table?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I desire to know whether the gentleman who moved to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was seconded, voted with the majority?

The SPEAKER. The practice is to allow any gentleman to move to reconsider, where no record is made of the vote.

Mr. FLORENCE. I suppose I did not; but that has nothing to do with this matter, according to the practice of the House. [Cries of "Order!"] Is it not debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The Chair will entertain the motion to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered; and will hold that, if the vote is reconsidered, it will supersede the second to the previous question, as the Chair understands that has been the practice of the House.

Mr. FLORENCE. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. SPINNER. I think this difficulty can be got along with, if the House will allow me to offer a resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to offer a resolution. Is there any objection? The Chair hears no objection.

A MEMBER. Let it be read for information.

The Clerk commenced the reading of the resolution, as follows:

Whereas, the Burlington Hawkeye, a newspaper published in the State of Iowa, has recently published the following article, written from Council Bluffs, in relation to the land office sales at that place:

"During the second week, after the office had opened, an order was received from Mr. Commissioner Hendricks, at Washington, to locate six thousand (6,000) acres in the name of the Hon. Jesse D. BRIGHT, of Indiana. Of course the order was complied with out of the regular office hours, and thus the honorable Senator got a slice of the public lands at a single haul, while the rest of us had to take our turn at the mill as the wheel rolled round. Wonder if the peculiar position which Senator BRIGHT occupies toward the Administration had anything to do with this piece of party favoritism? Was it any part of the price paid for his support of the Lecompton constitution?"

Mr. WINSLOW, (interrupting the reading.) Is that resolution in order?

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair it is not.

Mr. WINSLOW. Then I object to its being read further.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that any paper reflecting upon a member of another coordinate branch of the legislative department of the Government is not in order, if the question of order is raised.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Does the Chair hold that Mr. BRIGHT is a member of the Senate?

The SPEAKER. Unquestionably he is a Senator.

Mr. GROW. Does the Chair hold that no language can be used reflecting upon the Commissioner of the General Land Office, by whom this order was sent?

The SPEAKER. The Chair certainly decides that this House has no right to order an investigation into the conduct of a member of a coordinate branch of the legislative department of the Government.

Mr. GROW. This is a resolution to investigate the conduct of one of the executive officers of the Government—the Commissioner of the General Land Office, who sent this order. Does the Chair hold that such a resolution is not in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules that the resolution is not in order, inasmuch as it reflects upon a member of a coordinate branch of this department of the Government.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Is the resolution to be ruled out of order because it incidentally reflects upon a member of the other branch of the Legislature?

The SPEAKER. The Chair holds that the resolution is out of order.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Will the Chair suffer me to make this suggestion? As I understand it, what has been read here is not in the resolution, but is an extract from an Iowa paper. No proposition has yet been reported to the House. That reflection was what the Iowa paper contained; but what the proposition of the gentleman from New York is, I do not yet understand.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that it is such a reflection upon a member of the other House as would not be tolerated in debate, the Manual expressly providing that reflection shall not be made even in debate upon a member of the Senate.

Mr. POTTER. But this reflection is contained in the article which was read, and not in the resolution.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I rise to a question of order. The rule which makes it out of order was itself suspended.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is already entertaining one question of order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. GROW. Does the Speaker hold that a member in debate cannot read an article from a paper?

The SPEAKER. Not an article reflecting upon a member in the other end of the Capitol.

Mr. GROW. The charge is against an officer in the Land Office; and I would like to know how you would get at such an investigation unless the charge is read?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina raised the question of order that the paper could not be read in consequence of its reflecting upon a member of the Senate. The Chair sustains the point of order; and, if the gentleman had attempted to read it in a speech, the Chair would have ruled it out of order.

Mr. GROW. Does the Chair consider that a reflection upon an officer in the Land Office is out of order? I appeal from the decision of the Chair. Is that debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. GROW. Then I withdraw the appeal.

Mr. ADRAIN, (at half past four o'clock, p.m.) I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HUGHES. I rise to a question of order. I understand that when a member of the House uses language in debate, or in a resolution, if that language is excepted to, the proper time to take exception is when the language is used, and it is required to be taken down at the Clerk's desk. I desire to avail myself of that rule, as the language was aimed at a Senator from my own State. I ask that the offensive language be taken down at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. ADRAIN. Is there any question before the House?

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the motion to adjourn.

Mr. HUGHES. Have I the right to make this point now?

Mr. ADRAIN. I think the gentleman is out of order, and I call him to order.

Mr. HUGHES. The gentleman is always calling me to order, when he is out of order himself.

Mr. ADRAIN. Because the gentleman from Indiana is always out of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the question of order made by the gentleman from Indiana, because the matter has not come before the House in the way in which the rules contemplate that it shall be presented to the House when the exception is to be taken.

Mr. HUGHES. I hope the House will indulge me in saying—[shouts of "Order!"] Where is the disorder now?

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. HUGHES. I desire to say that the imputation—[Renewed shouts of "Order!"]

Mr. CLAY. I call the gentlemen upon the other side of the House to order.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order for the gentleman from Indiana to debate the pending question.

Mr. ADRAIN. I have moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. HUGHES. The gentleman cannot make that motion while I am upon the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot hold the floor to debate a proposition which is not debatable.

Mr. HUGHES. I rise to a privileged question.

The SPEAKER. The question presented by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ADRAIN] is a privileged question.

Mr. ADRAIN. I insist on my motion.

Mr. ENGLISH. I appeal to the gentleman from New Jersey to withdraw it for one moment.

Mr. ADRAIN. If there is anything personal which the gentleman wishes to explain, I have no objection.

Mr. ENGLISH. I merely wish to say that I am entirely familiar with the transaction referred to in the newspaper extract which the gentleman from New York [Mr. SPINNER] attempted to submit to the House, and know that there is nothing whatever in it in the least discreditable to the distinguished Senator alluded to, or to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, or anybody else. The insinuation proceeds from mere party malice, and as one of the friends of that Senator I am perfectly willing to have the matter investigated.—[Cries of "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. SICKLES demanded the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. FLORENCE demanded tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. OLIN, and CRAIG of North Carolina, were appointed.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 37, nays 79; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Anderson, Avery, Bocoek, Bryan, Burnett, Caslie, Cobb, John Cochrane, Cockerill, James Craig, Burton Craig, Davis of Indiana, Edmundson, English, Florence, Foley, Houston, Jackson, J. Glancy Jones, Kelly, Lamar, Macay, Moore, Niblack, Pendleton, Phillips, Reagan, Ruffin, Seales, Henry M. Shaw, Sickles, Singleton, Winslow, Wortendyke, John V. Wright, and Zollcoffer—37.

NAYS—Messrs. Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Horace F. Clark, John B. Clark, Clawson, Clay, Clark B. Cochrane, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cragin, Curtis, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dean, Doid, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Gooch, Goodwin, Grow, Harlan, J. Morrison Harris, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Howard, Hughes, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Leiter, Lovejoy, Millson, Morgan, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Peyton, Pike, Potter, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Robert Smith, Spinner, Stanton, Talbot, Tappan, Thayer, Tompkins, Underwood, Walbridge, Walton, Elihu B. Washburn, Israel Washburn, and Wilson—79.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The question recurred upon Mr. CAMPBELL's motion to lay on the table Mr. FLORENCE's motion to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered on the resolution proposed by Mr. J. GLANCY JONES.

Mr. JACKSON. No quorum voted on the last vote.

The SPEAKER. It is not necessary that a quorum should vote on a motion to adjourn.

Mr. CLAY. Is it in order to move that the House take a recess until seven o'clock this evening?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. HOUSTON. I object to the transaction of any business without there being a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The fact whether or not there is a quorum present will be ascertained by the vote on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, on which the yeas and nays have been demanded.

Mr. HOUSTON called for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BUFFINTON, and CRAIG of North Carolina, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 17, noes 70.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered, no quorum voting.

And then, on motion of Mr. MORSE, of Maine, (at four minutes to five o'clock, p. m.), the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, April 27, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. JULIUS C. GRAMMER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter of the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, returning, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, the petition and papers of Findley Patterson, heretofore referred by the Senate to that court; which, on motion of Mr. BIGLER, were ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, information in relation to the cost of the public printing and advertising during the last five years, other than that ordered by Congress, at each of the printing establishments in Washington, under what authority executed; and whether any change in existing laws is necessary to insure a proper economy in that branch of the public expenditure; which, on motion of Mr. HAMLIN, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills, received yesterday from the House of Representatives, were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims:

A bill (No. 100) to revive an act entitled "An act for the relief of the heirs, or their legal representatives, of William Conway, deceased."

A bill (No. 209) for the relief of the representatives of William Smith, deceased, late of Louisiana.

A bill (No. 211) for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Pierre Broussard, deceased.

A bill (No. 214) for the relief of Regis Loisel, or his legal representatives.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announcing that the House of Representatives disagrees to the first and second amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 306) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1858, and agrees to the third amendment of the Senate to the said bill; which, on motion of Mr. HUNTER, was referred to the Committee on Finance.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

SAN FRANCISCO POST OFFICE.

Mr. BRODERICK. I introduced a resolution of inquiry on Wednesday last in regard to the post office at San Francisco. I hope the Senate will take up that resolution and pass it.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be requested to furnish the Senate with a quarterly statement showing the aggregate amount collected at the post office at San Francisco, over and above the lawful postage, for box-rents from July 1, 1854, to December 31, 1857, and that he be requested to inform the Senate what law, or what regulation of the Department, authorizes the collection of the same; and also whether the postmaster has any legal authority to discriminate against one class of citizens, and in favor of another class, by withholding letters—as letters are withheld at the San Francisco post office—from those who will not submit the exaction for box-rents, until at least an hour after letters are delivered to those who do thus submit to the exaction.

Mr. GWIN. The chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads [Mr. YULEE] objected to the passage of this resolution for reasons which have not been stated to me, and I would prefer that it should be laid over until he is in his seat. I have no objection to it myself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour for the consideration of the special order has arrived.

Mr. BRODERICK. I have no objection to letting the resolution lie over if my colleague is not satisfied with it.

Mr. KING. It will come up to-morrow.

Mr. BRODERICK. If it comes up to-morrow I shall not object to the postponement.

KANSAS—LECOMPTON CONSTITUTION.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. No. 161) for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union.

Mr. GREEN. I ask for the yeas and nays upon the question of concurring in the report.

Mr. CLARK. I inquire what will be the effect of concurring in the report? Will it amend the bill of the House, in the opinion of the Chair?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. So far as the action of the Senate is concerned it will.

Mr. CLARK. Will it require any future action before the Senate when the bill comes back from the House, in the opinion of the Chair?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will depend entirely upon the action of the House of Representatives. The yeas and nays have been called for. The Chair will first determine whether that call is sustained.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ALLEN. What is the question now?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On concurring in the report of the committee of conference. Those Senators in favor of concurring will say "yea," as their names are called; those opposed to it will say "nay."

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Mr. President, I wish, with as little consumption of the time of the Senate as possible, to set forth the reasons which, upon the fullest consideration that I have had the opportunity of giving to this subject, constrain me to vote against this report. In some respects, undoubtedly, the amendment proposed by the committee of conference meets my cordial concurrence. I was opposed to the admission of Kansas upon the basis of the Lecompton constitution, because I thought that instrument not only did not express the will of the people of Kansas, but was against their known will and wishes; and moreover I thought it had been made by fraud and political trickery. I opposed, therefore, the enforcement of that constitution upon the people of Kansas. That was the main point of controversy then. Gentlemen on the other side regarded it as being presented in all the forms of law, and said that those forms of law through which this question had passed in the Territory of Kansas, precluded us from any examination beyond them. I supposed that forms were only intended to promote and ascertain the truth—not that they confined and crushed the truth and precluded all examination into it.

I was opposed to enforcing this instrument upon the people against their will and stained, as I supposed, with fraud. Other gentlemen took different views of the case, and insisted upon its prompt and immediate adoption and the absolute admission of the State into the Union upon it. The committee of conference, in their consideration of the subject, have changed the views which were entertained by the Senate at that time, and have now agreed to abandon the Lecompton constitution, so far at least as to submit it to the people of Kansas now for their affirmation. So far we are agreed.

But, sir, in making that submission to the people, certain consequences are attached to it which, I think, are an unjust, an improper incumbrance upon the free right of the people to choose their institutions for themselves. In the bill substituted by the House of Representatives in place of the Senate's bill, there was a fair submission of the Lecompton constitution provided for, and the people were told, "if you affirm this, very well; it is all at your discretion; a matter of choice with you, free, uninfluenced, fair; choose as you please; and if you choose to reject this constitution, as not satisfactory to you, a convention of the people of the Territory shall immediately be called, to make such constitution as is satisfactory; and upon that constitution's being made, and upon a reference of it to the people, if they shall affirm what the convention has done, the President of the United States being made acquainted with the fact, shall announce it by proclamation, and thereafter the State shall be considered as one of the Union.

That is the bill which the Senate has voted against. The committee of conference, abandoning, as I say, the enforcement of the Lecompton constitution as an absolute one, and the admission of the State as an absolute admission, come to our ground, so far as to agree that that instrument shall be submitted to the people. The committee of conference say it shall be submitted to the people; but how submitted? In the fair, open, unincumbered manner that it was to be by the bill of the House of Representatives? No, sir.

I have said that this new amendment proposes the submission of the constitution. I am substantially correct in that statement. Literally, however, it is but a submission of certain grants of land which have been habitually made by Congress upon the formation and admission of new States—grants for school purposes, grants for a university, grants for establishing a seat of Government. It submits these grants and the condition upon which they are made, to wit, that the State accepting them shall not be at liberty to interfere with the disposal of the public lands or to impose taxes upon them—it refers this formal part of the instrument of admission to the people. It submits to them the question, are you willing to take these grants of land or not? That is the only question to be submitted to the people, but by legislation a consequence is to flow from their action perfectly arbitrary in its nature, and altogether illogical in the conclusion. If they are willing to take the land, it is to be inferred that they are willing to take a constitution which is known to be obnoxious to them? And if they reject the grants of land for any reason, or without any reason, then they are to be considered as rejecting the constitution. Here is a side issue, or a collateral consequence, infinitely more important than the direct question propounded to the people.

Now, sir, why is this? It is in effect, I grant, for I do not wish to stand on mere formalities or technicalities, a submission of the constitution to the people. It is a sort of feigned issue out of Congress. That issue the people are to try. The world, looking at that issue, might say: "well, what of this; what do you say about the constitution; there is nothing here about it?" Oh, well, but we will annex, by law, a legal consequence, though no man would ever think of deriving it as a legitimate and logical consequence; and that consequence shall be, if you take the land, you take another thing entirely distinct from it—a certain constitution. You agree to waive all your objections to what you regard as its obnoxious character or obnoxious parts, if you take the land. If you do not want the land, or if you reject it because it is not as much as you desire or as much as you hoped for, then you shall be considered as rejecting the constitution, though you may, in fact, be satisfied with it. Is this a fair submission of it to the people? You say to them, in effect, "vote for this obnoxious constitution; agree to put this little yoke on your necks; and you shall be rewarded for it with lands without limit almost."

Sir, is not that offering a temptation? They are to have the land if they accept the constitution; if they do not, they are not to have it. Does it mean to hold out the idea that, by possibility, this is their last chance for obtaining that land, and that having once rejected it in due form of law, this form of law shall be set up against them as an estoppel—I think the word we have heard so often is estoppel—against their ever having any more land? Will the world consider it fair? Will the people of the United States consider it fair? If the people of Kansas are entitled to vote upon the Lecompton constitution, they are entitled to it in virtue of their right of self-government; they are entitled to it in virtue of that great sovereign popular right, by virtue of which every government that we represent here stands. We have no right to diminish, no right to control, no right to incumber it. It is their right, and you have no right to annex penalties or conditions to the exercise of it. Although I have no idea that it is the intention of Congress to withhold from them, at any time hereafter, these lands; yet read this bill, and see if that is not the impression it may make. At any rate, this is a great bonus offered to them for immediate admission. This is calculated to take away from the submission the complexion of fairness and equality; it is calculated to take away from it the race of justice.

More than that: not only is this reward to accompany one vote that they may give, but there is another consequence. This measure says to the people of Kansas: "if you choose to take this Lecompton constitution, with all its imperfections on its head; if you choose to silence all the complaints and all the denunciations which you have made against it; if you choose to humiliate yourselves as freemen by a confession of as much baseness as that would imply, then, no matter what your numbers are, we shall make no inquiry, but come into the Union at once, with all the dowry of land which we give our newly-admitted and infant States; you shall come in at once to the great family of sovereign States; you shall come into the Senate of the United States; you shall come into the House of Representatives; and you shall sit side by side with those great and mighty States which achieved the Revolution, and achieved the liberties which we here enjoy—come in and share with us the crown and the scepter: accept these grants with this constitution, and you shall do it instantly, and we will make no inquiry as to your numbers. Only accept this constitution, and all these things are yours; but reject it, and you shall not only not come in now as a sovereign State, but we will inquire into your numbers, and you shall not come in now under any form of constitution, nor shall you ever come in under any form of constitution, until your population shall amount to that number which is fixed by the general law as the ratio of representation throughout the country.

Here, sir, are the benefits, and here are the penalties that are to attend upon the vote to be given in Kansas. Is this a fair submission? Is it for us—guardians, if of nothing else, of the political morality of the country—to put such a temptation in the way of our people, those who are subject to our laws, and must follow our bidding? If these are unfair incumbrances upon the right of suffrage, is it not wrong in us to place this great free principle under such trammels and incumbrances as we are now doing? So it seems to me; and, in my opinion, those who consider it candidly will come to the same conclusion. If my friends, who have been in favor of the Lecompton constitution, and especially those who have been opposed to its submission to the people, shall look candidly at it, they will see, not only that the submission which they oppose has been granted, but see that that submission, and the vote which is to be given under it, are incumbered by conditions, by trammels, and by temptations which ought not to be presented by us to any portion of our people. Must not that be their conclusion?

Mr. President, anxious as I am to see this subject entirely settled, and this Kansas volcano extinguished, closed up, filled up forever, I would rather that these measures should all fail, and Kansas be left just where you found her, than where this bill would place her. To do nothing would place her where this bill would; but it would place her there without this injurious and unjust legislation on our part. This bill, if she refuses to accept the Lecompton constitution, reverts her to a territorial condition. She is now in a territorial condition. She will remain in it if no legislation be adopted by Congress. What good, then, is this to effect? Is not every gentleman here morally certain that all these temptations will fail, and that this constitution will be rejected? I am perfectly certain that it will be rejected; she will be a Territory then, under the force of this legislation. She is a Territory now; and she will continue to be a Territory if this bill passes, and she rejects the constitution. Then what have we gained by it? Nothing; not a straw; not the dust in the balance in which the peace of the country is weighed.

Another and further distinction between the House bill and this bill is, that the House bill provided, in case of the rejection of the Lecompton constitution, an immediate remedy for that, by calling another convention, which convention, before the next session of Congress, the bill supposed, would have formed a constitution, which would have been acted upon, and we should come here finding Kansas a State in the Union—at any rate, the question put out of our hands; for if they rejected this, we provided the means of their making another. This bill says, if they reject this, there is no means of their making another, and they shall not have another; it shall be postponed indefinitely; and we here authorize them, when they have obtained a certain amount of population, but not till then, to make a constitution, thus leaving this vexed and vexatious question open, to pour out further troubles on the land.

It abandons, then—and that is all it does in concurrence with my ideas of the proper course on this subject—the Lecompton constitution, by agreeing to submit it to the people. It does no more than the House bill did on that point. In all the rest it is faulty; in all the rest it is a poor, maimed imitation of the bill of the House, worse for every change that has been made, and by these very changes creating insuperable obstacles to prevent those who view it as I do from giving their concurrence to the report of this committee. I rejoice at it so far as they go to abandon the Lecompton constitution; but, sir, how strangely are the views changed upon this subject, which will be satisfied with this report of the committee here? The President, in his special message, after arguing the question and recommending and urging us to adopt the Lecompton constitution, among other reasons says it is the shortest and quickest way to close up this Kansas question and all the agitations that have grown out of it. That is one of the President's inducements. He tells us that will be the consequence. He tells us if we do not agree to it dangerous results will follow. This was the argument here. What now do the committee of conference propose? They abandon the President; they abandon all his reasons; they abandon his recommendation; his authority is set at naught; and what do they do? After having given the President much reason to believe that, to this extent at least, (that is, of shortening the method of settling the Kansas question,) they concurred with him in opinion, as the arguments of gentlemen did on the original bill, they now turn round and say it is far from their purpose to adopt the shortest and the quickest way for the admission of Kansas, to quell all these disturbances, and to quiet the land, by admitting her into the Union; that is not their purpose at all; now they say to her, if she does not take this thing she shall not come into the Union; she shall wait—how long I do not know; the President does not know. All the celerity of movement to a particular goal is laid aside; and now if the President concurs in it, as if it were in resentment on his part, which I would not attribute to him—but resentment itself could not have dictated a course more calculated to avenge the wrong of refusing the Lecompton constitution absolutely, than the one which is now proposed, that unless they take it they shall not come into the Union for an indefinite time—by the adoption of this amendment his friends say to the President, and by this report the committee of conference say to him, "we do not care whether that time is long or short; we do not agree with you, sir, on the question of the Lecompton constitution or a continuation of all difficulties and all the disturbances and all the perils which have grown out of it in the country." That is the action that is the legislation of Congress, if this report be adopted.

I do not wish unnecessarily to enlarge on this subject. I have stated the main reasons why I cannot vote for the report. It seems to me to be in perfect consonance with the prejudices and suspicions which have been excited in Kansas, that the committee of conference propose a change in the board to govern the election which the bill of the House prescribed and authorized. That authorized four commissioners, the Governor, and Secretary of the Territory, two officers of the President's appointment, and two individuals of the Territory who might be, the one the President of the Council, and the other the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Legislature. Any three of them were to constitute a board. Nothing, therefore, could be done in the board without one of the President's appointees being there, or one of the people's appointees being there. Here the board is increased to the number of five, and another officer of the President's appointment—the district attorney of the Territory—is added, making five, any three of whom may act; so that the judges appointed by the President to guard this election will constitute a majority, and can decide anything and everything, and have the election in their own hands. We know that this matter of regulating elections has been one of the great causes of jealousy and suspicion and complaint in Kansas; I need not say how justly, for that is not in question; but we have evidence enough unquestionably to show that the public mind there has been full of jealousy, full of suspicion, of those who regulated their elections. It has been charged that they controlled them by pretended votes, by false returns, or by one unfairness or another at the polls—polls which were governed entirely by party judges. The bill of the House proposed to take them out of the hands of party altogether, so that neither should have any right to complain. It proposed to have a power above party in this particular to govern and control this election. We chose men who, by their official stations, stood high, and whose integrity might be relied upon; but this committee propose to add a fifth, which destroys the character of impartiality—that character calculated to repel suspicion, and repel jealousy. This is comparatively a small affair, and I would give very little consequence to it; but the other is the main ground of objection, as it seems to me. It is not fair; it is not equal; it is not just.

I ask my friends of the South, if the case were reversed between the North and the South, what would the South say to such a mode of submission? What would the South say to the North if the North proposed to her, "we will submit this constitution; we will say that if you accept it we will give you land; we will give you immediate admission into the Union as a State; we will say to all the aspirants in the Territory, 'you who want to be Senators, you who hope to obtain that honored place, you who want to be Representatives from the new State, (and these are generally the first and influential citizens,) to you we offer immediate admission, and the immediate opportunity of obtaining these cherished and hoped for honors; but reject it, and you shall be indefinitely postponed.'" That is not fair. What would the South say if the case were reversed, and the North were to put this form of question to a proposed State that had a majority in favor of slavery and a slave State? Would they not think it very hard? I would. I would spurn it; I would resist it—resist it to the uttermost. I would demand for those of my section a fair election upon equal terms.

You have waited too long for the application in this case of a rule requiring a certain population before Kansas can be admitted. I believe, as far back as the last Congress, the bill of my friend from Georgia (Mr. Toombs) proposed to authorize them to come into the Union with the numbers they then had. I voted for it; and we made this exception in respect to Kansas, on the ground not merely of right on her part, but because she was the source of so much trouble, and so much agitation throughout the land, that we desired to suppress the evil, and her admission was thought to be the best mode of doing it. The proposition for her admission in that bill, I am certain, was founded upon and moved by these patriotic and just considerations, on the part of my friend from Georgia, even then. As long as there was a hope of establishing the Lecompton constitution arbitrarily on these people against their will, did anybody hear any serious objection made to it on the ground that they had not the requisite population? No, sir. It is now only announced; and coming in this way, it does come as a penalty upon the people. All our legislation has been based on the idea that in this exceptional case, to guard against the mischiefs that Kansas had created throughout the country, we would take her into the Union, bind her in the Federal chain, and leave her to herself, to drag that chain along as she could or might; to have upon her all its obligations, to govern herself, and to govern herself at her own hazard; and thus, to use a familiar expression, localize all the trouble she might create among her own people, and confine it to them. We have pursued that policy; we have proceeded upon that concession upon every side, and by every one; we have legislated upon it throughout up to this moment; and now, for the first time, after these long concessions, disfranchisement is threatened; the penalty of being remitted indefinitely to a territorial condition is held out if the people do not accept a constitution that we know is obnoxious to them.

I say, Mr. President, that it does not appear to me that this is fair; and although I belong, as every man must do, to some part or some section of the country, I want to see justice done. My experience teaches me that justice alone is a lasting foundation, in public or in private life, for everything dear and valuable. It is the only sure, unshakable, imperishable foundation, and upon that basis alone can the connections and relations between States and nations be calculated on as permanently settled. Nothing else will do. The affections of the human heart may aid, I trust, have aided, I hope will long continue to aid, in strengthening this permanent foundation which justice herself has made; but these are transitory and changeable. Circumstances may create a flow of kind feelings; circumstances may produce a fatal end to them. They will not do for a foundation. Like a foundation that is laid upon the sand or upon the water, it is unstable, changeable. Justice is eternal, everlasting. If you want to secure it, the attempt merely to get up a good feeling for the moment is not sufficient. It may be a remedy partially, for a day or for an hour; but that is not what we want. We want something that shall last. That is justice. Justice will quiet everybody.

Then is this justice? You want to quiet all these agitations. So do I; no man more than I. Anything and everything that was in my power would I do to accomplish the object. Let us try impartial justice: no crimination, no retaliation. Do justice. Upon that we can stand firm, and defy all the accidents and chances of time or circumstance. That is my mode of giving security to the North and to the South, to the East and to the West; and without it there will be no permanent peace, there will be no tranquility. Evil generates nothing but evil; injustice generates nothing but injustice; and her steps are constantly from bad to worse. Now, I ask, is this right? Is it just? That is the question the Senate ought to consider. Each gentleman can resolve it for himself. I have given the reasons which have guided me to the solution of that question at which I have arrived.

We hear, Mr. President, a great deal about this section and that section, and a man's allegiance to one section and another section. Within a certain limit and scope, this language is allowable enough; but, sir, take my case. What is the position of my State? I know, in the sort of political geography which has been made of our country, in spite of its natural geography, the extremes of North and South have swallowed up all the States; but what propriety is there in this? Is there not a great western section, geographically, as well as a northern and a southern section? In my country we call ourselves western men. Geographically we have that position in this Union. You have an extreme to the north, with its peculiar employments and its peculiar opinions. A different state of things exists at the extreme south. You are both upon the ocean; but, where are we? We are in the Great West—we are the Great West. Though not equal at this time, in point of population, to either the northern or the southern section, we are destined to be more in population than both of them put together—destined to have more of the surplus of the products of the earth in our hands than all the rest of the United States; occupying the most fertile region of the world in all that is necessary for the subsistence and comfort of mankind; and, in the language of that famous French writer, De Tocqueville, occupying a region the finest and the most glorious that the Almighty ever made for the habitation of man. That is our country in the West. We touch no ocean; we are interior. We lie in no connection with the North; we are far from the South.

What peculiar interest does this geographical position of ours give us? North and South may occasionally have their passions excited to think that one or the other would be better off in the case of a dissolution. We know that; we have seen some symptoms of it, unhappily for us all. We have heard the expression of such sentiments. These are the sentiments of extremes, far separated, with different institutions and to some extent different interests, leading occasionally to harshness of feeling on either side. When a tariff is refused, perhaps northern men think they would be better off without the Union. The South has occasionally thought, you know, that she would be better without you. All these opinions may be honest, but all these variances of sentiment lead to one deplorable effect—the breaking of our great Union, the destruction of the mightiest hopes of man, the destruction of the mightiest hopes that all mankind might derive from our example of public liberty and public prosperity. For the reasons I have mentioned, North or South may be occasionally of opinion that their interests would be benefited by a separation—opinions honestly, it may be patriotically, entertained; but what must everlastingly be the sentiment of that great western region of country to which I have alluded? Their interest, if I may call it so, their peculiar interest, is the Union. There never can be a time when any one of us in that section can think it is our interest that this Union should be destroyed. I ask gentlemen here, coming from the region of which I speak, how many men are there that you have found in that region who countenance for a moment the idea of disunion? They are all of one mind—instinctively of one mind. Instinctively they understand their interest; and that is the great pervading motive of mankind on which alone durable relations can be established. What is your interest, you of the West? I have painted your condition feebly, and your productions. What are you to do? Are your products to rot upon your hands and to be the cause of pestilence among you? No; but it must be so, unless you can find vent for them somewhere. Where are you to go? If a dismemberment of the Union takes place between the North and South, you are opposed to that, forever opposed to it, because it is to take away from you one of the means of access to the ocean and to the world, and to the markets of the world, for the sale of your productions. If there was a division between North and South, the West might be occluded entirely either from going to the markets of New York or going to New Orleans, without being subject to tolls and taxes; and could that be borne? It would be a mighty burden for them to bear. It is their interest to avoid that burden. It is their interest, their peculiar interest, and must ever remain so, to keep the Union together, in order that they may have that mighty scope of free trade which they now enjoy. They will always have more to sell than any other equal number of people on the face of the earth. They have more than would glut New Orleans, more than would glut New York, if it could all be poured there. We want all these accesses. In our very position there is a local, a natural, a destined patriotism so far as the Union is concerned. We must be found in it. Our prosperity, I may say, if not our existence as an agricultural people, depends on the preservation of the Union, and all the means for exportation and for commerce that both the northern and southern sections afford. We must go through both sections in order to find markets abroad for those products which are not to be consumed in our own country. We are enlisted and bound by an everlasting and perpetual bond of interest to stand by and protect the Union for the sake of the commerce, and for the sake of the freedom of trade which it, and it alone, secures to us. This is our peculiar interest. The North may have its; the South its; this is ours. You of this region ought to consider yourselves as bound by this interest, if possible, to superior care and vigilance over its preservation. We, having this interest always to guide us, an instructive as well as a judicious guide, standing between these two extremes, ought to take care that justice be done by one extremity to the other. We have no interest, gentlemen of the North and South, that is not yours so far as mere union goes; but we have an interest beyond that; we have a material, a peculiar interest in the preservation of the Union of these States for the sake of the trade and the market which it gives us. This ought to govern our actions. We should consider ourselves as the appointed guardians of this particular interest, having a deeper stake than others in the preservation of the Union, and bound to stand together in every fretful moment of discontent between the North and South to see that equal justice be done to both and to all.

This is the position which I feel for myself and my brother Senators who represent that section of country; and I wish it were so that these great political truths were known and recognized, even in half their value, by every man who lives in that region, much less every one who represents them. We should be then as a sentinel set up in the Constitution, to watch over the Union, for the sake of protecting that which we shall be sure never to forget—our local and material interests. That will keep us awake constantly. We can have no prejudices against North or South. Our prosperity, to a great degree, depends upon them. We hail and cherish them all as our fellow-citizens, all as parts of the grand whole which constitutes us a mighty nation, now talked of in all the courts of Europe as one of the great Powers of the earth; and but a few years shall sweep over us, when, instead of being one of the great Powers of the world, we shall be ranked as the greatest Power; when our word and our law, our words of justice and our laws of liberty, shall be heard of and known throughout the habitable globe. What a glorious mission and what a bright day of prosperity is thus presented to us! Are we, the destined heirs and inheritors of such a mighty land as this is, to lower our thoughts to the practice of little arts and little policies, about the terms and conditions on which a little feeble Territory is to be admitted into the Union? Are we to be distracted with this Lecompton question? Is it fit for the consideration of men, born as we are to such a mighty destiny—men from whose loins is to spring a generation who shall have a Government wider than imperial Rome possessed? Cannot we deal with these little things that disturb our peace, without allowing them to excite us into any acts that may even apparently be unjust or unequal—excite us to any unjust and fretful legislation on any subject?

The very thoughts that are natural to a citizen of these great United States should prevent it. If he will but raise his eyes from the ground on which he treads, if he will lift up that face which God has given him to look to heaven, and look forward, is there not enough to swell the heart of the nation, to give it a dignity and consequence in its own contemplations, to raise it above all the little mists and fretful policies of the day? We have only to think of ourselves, to appreciate ourselves, to act up to ourselves, and then tread in the paths of justice, disdaining to do anything but justice, equal justice—not only not to do injustice, and I am sure intentional injustice is not designed by any member—to do not only justice, but to avoid the suspicion or appearance of injustice in our conduct towards the different parts of this great and mighty family. This is the object I have endeavored to accomplish, with but little effect, I know. I have acted in a spirit of entire abandonment of every selfish purpose and every selfish feeling. I may be altogether wrong in these views. I have done what I thought best for my country and my whole country—best for every part of it. The best way of protecting the peculiar interest of every section is by doing equal justice; and that you may be sure I will always do, according to my conception, where the South is concerned. She shall have justice; the North shall have justice; every portion of my country shall have justice as I understand it. It is in that spirit, a spirit inoffensive in itself to any one, that I have endeavored to make good my opposition to this Lecompton proceeding.

Mr. President, with these remarks, and thankful for the attention with which they have been received by the Senate, I will not trespass longer on their patience.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. President, as I think the Senator from Kentucky has entirely misconceived the proposition presented by the committee of conference, I must beg the indulgence of the Senate for a few moments whilst I present it in what I deem to be its true shape.

The proposition of the committee of conference is the substitution of an entirely new bill in place of that which passed the Senate, and in place of the amendment which was proposed by the House of Representatives. This proposition affirms that the people of Kansas elected a convention of delegates who assembled at Lecompton, and that through that convention these people formed for themselves a government. It affirms that this constitution having been examined, is found to be republican in its character. It thus acknowledges not only the authority of the Lecompton convention, but it acknowledges the validity of their action; it receives the constitution presented by them as the constitution of the people of Kansas, and it admits that the application which they have made for admission into the Union, is the application of the people of Kansas speaking through their convention.

But this proposition, in its preamble, goes a little further. It refers to the fact that the people of Kansas, through their convention, have presented an ordinance in which they proposed to concede their right to tax the property of the United States, upon condition that certain grants of land should be made to them. It affirms that this ordinance is not acceptable to Congress, but that Congress is willing to make them the same grant that was made to Minnesota, which is the same that was proposed by the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky; and is willing to give them that much on condition that they will surrender or concede the taxing power over the property of the United States; and that, if they are willing to do so, they are to declare their wish by a vote of the people, a majority of those voting to determine the question; and, when they shall say that they will agree to this contract thus modified, then, upon that vote, they are to be admitted by proclamation of the President.

Accordingly, this bill proposes to enact that Kansas shall be received into the Union with the Lecompton constitution upon equal terms with the other States; upon the fundamental condition, however, that she shall signify, by a vote of her people, their acceptance of this modification of the contract which Congress proposes. It then proceeds to offer an alternative proposition in the event that a majority of the people of Kansas should determine not to accept this modified contract, and not to be admitted into the Union under it. It then provides that there shall be no more conventions; that they shall not offer themselves for admission until they have population enough to entitle them to one member of the House of Representatives according to the existing ratio. Now, I maintain that both of these propositions are entirely right in themselves, and perfectly consistent with the previous action of the Senate.

The bill passed by the Senate recognized the authority of the convention at Lecompton, and the validity of their action; and it proposed to admit Kansas with the constitution framed by them, but admitted her upon the fundamental condition that she should concede her right to tax the property of the United States. There it stopped. It did not proceed to provide for the event that the people might not choose thus to modify this contract and to enter into the Union on these terms. The proposition of the committee of conference, and the bill passed by the Senate, are alike in these respects: both acknowledge the authority of the Lecompton convention; both admit the validity of the constitution framed by that convention; both act upon the principle that Congress has no right to require that constitution to be submitted to the people; both recognize that principle fully and entirely; both admit the State conditionally; that is to say, upon the condition that they shall cede away the right to tax the public lands of the United States.

But the proposition of the committee of conference goes further than the bill of the Senate. The bill of the Senate stopped there, and did not seek to provide for the contingency that a majority of the people of Kansas might not accept this modification of the contract which we propose to them. The bill passed by the Senate took the risk that the people in that troubled region might assemble in convention and declare that they would not accept this condition, and would therefore be out of the Union. The bill passed by the Senate provided for none of these contingencies, but acted upon the supposition, as has been done sometimes before, that the people of Kansas would concur in all these things, and risked the chances of meeting these difficulties. The scheme of the conference committee goes further. It provides especially for the difficulty I have just suggested. It says, "before we admit you you must say whether you will concede away the taxing power for this modification of the grant which we have given you. If you are willing to concede away the taxing power for the consideration we now offer you, then you shall be admitted upon proclamation by the President." In doing this the bill under consideration has proceeded in precise conformity with principle. What was the case of Iowa? She offered herself for admission with a constitution republican in form, and with certain boundaries which Congress changed. Congress admitted her upon condition that her people would consent to that modification of boundary. Congress said the assent was to be signified by a vote of the people, and thus the precedent is precisely parallel with the proposition that is now made; and Congress declared that if they did assent by a vote of the majority of the people, then the State should be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the other States by proclamation of the President. How was it with regard to Michigan? The same thing occurred. The same condition was imposed, except that Congress said it should be referred to a convention of the people that was to be called to consider this one question only.

In regard to an ordinance claiming lands, I know of but two cases in which changes were made. One was in Arkansas, and the other in California. In Arkansas, the State was admitted upon the express condition that she should cede the taxing power over the property of the United States, and a change was made in the quantity of lands which she proposed to take in consideration of that concession. The bill of admission was passed on the 15th of June, and on the 23d of the same month a supplemental act was passed submitting it to the Legislature of Arkansas, to say whether they would accept certain propositions—there were five of them, I believe—in consideration of this concession of the right to tax the property of the United States. Congress referred it to the Legislature to determine; because, as they said in the act, the power had been given them by the convention which formed the constitution; thus showing that, in the opinion of Congress, the right to cede away the power to tax any portion of the property or lands within its domain was a right which belonged to sovereignty, a right to be given by the same power which made constitutions, and which created conventions. It is obvious that if, in regard to boundary, it required an act of the sovereign people, either through their own vote, or through conventions, or through Legislatures that had been specifically endowed with this power by the convention, to cede away the jurisdiction over certain territory, it certainly would require it in order to cede a particular portion of that jurisdiction; that is to say, the right to tax.

Is not this practice fortified and supported by reason? Is not this conditional submission of the ordinance—and nothing else is submitted—this submission of a change in the terms of a contract in regard to land, proper in itself? Suppose there had been no controversy in regard to the constitution offered by Kansas; suppose it were admitted on all hands that the convention which assembled at Leecompton was properly authorized; that its proceedings were legal and valid; and suppose this precise difference had arisen in regard to the land, that they had demanded the twenty-three million acres provided for in their ordinance, and that we had thought proper to give not more than the three or four millions which this proposition of the committee of conference proposes to give them: would it not have been said to be perfectly fair and right and proper, and that it was due to the State that we should ascertain whether she would give her assent to this change in the contract? Why, sir, it takes two parties to make a contract, and it takes two to change it. Would any one have objected; would not all have said that perhaps it was the wisest way, because thus we avoid the danger of the people meeting in convention, and saying that they would not accept this fundamental condition upon which they were admitted? We avoid the danger of all the mischiefs that would occur from the anarchy and confusion which would arise if they were thus to assemble and reject the condition—a danger which is the greater in a troubled Territory, where its population is disturbed and divided, than in ordinary cases; for in most cases it might be presumed with safety that, in order to be admitted, the State would acquiesce in the conditions which were proposed. But, sir, it is a risk that would be run in all such cases; and no one can say that it is not only safer and better to pursue the precedents to which I have referred, but that it is right and proper in itself, that it is due to the people of the State who ask admission.

Now, sir, I ask how can it be said that by this act we submit the constitution? We do no such thing. We acknowledge the validity of the constitution, and we say, in regard to this contract which is offered to us, "the terms are not acceptable; we will not accept the terms you offer; but we will accept others, naming them, and if you choose to be admitted on them, you may." It is true that in giving that vote for admission they may be governed by other reasons than those which relate merely to the proposition itself; but is that any concern of ours? Can we look into the human breast and search for motives? Can we prescribe what are to be the reasons which are to govern the popular vote? By no means. All that we have to do is to keep within the limits of our powers, and to respect those of the States.

And what is it that we have affirmed in regard to the submission of the constitution? We have never said that the people might not submit their own constitution; we have never said that it was improper to do so; what we have said is, that it is a matter for the people themselves to determine; that they must determine it either through the act which called the convention into being, limiting and defining its powers, or they must determine it through their own convention; and we have said that if they did not require the submission, Congress could not require it of them, because that was an act which belonged to the sovereign power of the State itself. That is our doctrine. If, then, we submit this proposition in regard to the modified contract, how do we depart from this doctrine? We do not say to them, "your constitution is unsatisfactory." We do not say to them, "you must have a popular vote on the constitution." We do not say, "we dispute the evidence which you have presented according to the legal form." On the contrary, we say, "we receive it all; we acknowledge the authority of your convention; we acknowledge the validity of your constitution, and we acknowledge that we have no power either to change that instrument or to require you to pass upon it in any other form than that which you have determined for yourselves; but in regard to the contract that you propose to us, we have the right to change that, and we submit it to you to say whether you will or will not accept this modification which we propose of the contract." Is not that a fair statement of the case? Is it not plain that we preserve our consistency because we not only require no submission of the constitution, but because we accept and acknowledge it; we submit only what we have a right to submit, and that is the change we make in the contract that they propose to us.

But, Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky objects that in doing this we are doing what is unfair, because, he says, we accompany it with another proposition; we say to the people of Kansas: "If you will consent to this change, and desire admission upon these terms, then we will make you these grants of land; but if you do not, you must remain in a territorial condition until you have people enough to entitle you to one Representative in Congress, and then only can you form a constitution, and come into the Union as a State." He says, in this way we offer them a reward to accept one constitution, and we propose to punish them in the event that they do not accept it. This is an entire mistake on the part of the Senator, and it arose from begging the question. We do not submit the constitution to the people at all. We say to them: "So far as you have gone, you have proposed to come into the Union upon certain terms; you have presented us a constitution; you have also presented us an ordinance which contains a contract in regard to the taxing power; we accept your constitution; we acknowledge that to be republican in form; but we do not accept the ordinance. If, however, you choose to take a lesser quantity of land, we make you a grant which is liberal;" but which ought not to have been called excessive by the Senator from Kentucky; because I believe it is precisely the same grant which he proposed in his own amendment to the Senate bill. How is it unequal and unfair? How is it that it is to be considered as revengeful or fretful legislation, if we say to them, "in the event that you do not come in under this application which you yourselves have made to us for admission, you must remain in a territorial condition until you have people enough to entitle you to one member, according to the ratio of representation? He himself, in his own remarks, gave the answer to it.

We maintain, as a general proposition, that the people of no Territory ought to be admitted as a State until they have population enough for one member of Congress. Does any one dispute that principle? Is it not evident upon its face? But we say in this case of Kansas—and we are sincere in it, for we said it two years ago in the bill offered by the Senator from Georgia—we will waive these considerations for the sake of the peace of the country, and in order to settle this agitating question, provided you will come in and make a final disposition of the whole matter. If, however, you refuse to come in and make a final disposition of the whole matter, the consideration falls upon which we were willing to incur the mischief of admitting a new State with an insufficient population. We can no longer attain that good. The next best thing we can do for the peace of the country is to say to her, "you must be quiet until you have people enough to entitle you to at least one member before you enter the Union." We thus at last put down these attempts at conventions which may disturb and distract that people, and introduce questions of discord and confusion in Congress. We thus establish a sound general principle, whose justice, I think, cannot be disputed. In regard to the grants of land, it was not necessary to say anything of them in the contingency of a rejection of our proposition, because it is obvious that whenever the people of Kansas come in hereafter, if they should fail to come in under this submission of the ordinance, they will make their own propositions in regard to land, and there is no doubt but that we shall deal with them as liberally as we have always done with the new States. If they do not come in under this constitution, and we cannot settle the question in that way, is it not obvious that the nearest approach we can make to putting an end to these agitations, is to say to them, "you must remain in your territorial condition until you have more stability, more people, and give us at least a truce and a breathing spell?"

How much better is that for the peace of the country than the proposition made by the Senator from Kentucky! In that event he thinks it fair to allow these people to form a constitution for themselves, and to require, when that constitution is formed, that the President shall bring it in upon proclamation; thus abdicate the constitutional duty imposed upon Congress to see that this instrument is republican in its character; thus violating, as it seems to me, in a most essential particular, that great constitutional duty which is imposed upon us to see, before a State enters into the Confederacy, that its constitution is republican in form. Why, sir, without this it is impossible that we could carry out the guarantee of a republican form of government which is imposed on us by the Constitution of the United States. If we pursue that routine, we do not admit them until we know that they have a republican constitution; and if a change is attempted to be made, we can maintain the existing government against any proposed change, if it should be anti-republican. But if we admit it beforehand, with an anti-republican constitution, on proclamation by the President, how can we ever afterwards change it? Can we go in to impose a government upon the people? Can we say what must be a proper and republican form of government to suit them? That was never designed. All that was meant by the Constitution of the United States, was that we should choose between one government which we had acknowledged to be republican, and another which might be attempted to be substituted for it which was not republican in its character. But we were not to choose between a government made by the people of the State and one made by ourselves, but between two governments, of which one at least had been made by the people and acknowledged to be republican.

After this, what becomes of the question of frauds, which has been dwelt upon so largely here? Is not such a proposition as that which was contained in the second branch of the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky an admission that these questions of fraud are matters which it is not for us to consider, that we must take the chances, that we must take whatever the proper authorities of the proposed State pronounce to be legal? Does he not thus concede the precise principle upon which we have acted in receiving the Lecompton constitution? or, if he repudiates this conclusion, does he not admit that he is opening the door to frauds of every description in Kansas; when he abdicates all power on the part of Congress to look into questions of fraud or fact in regard to the formation of the proposed constitution? And how would his scheme affect the peace of the country? A new constitution to be formed in Kansas out of the distracted elements existing there! Each of the sections of the Union pouring in its people to produce a desired result, and this under temptations to fraud and violence, which would be the stronger from the fact that the result, no matter how obtained, would be final, and no longer subject to the supervising power of Congress. Do we not know that we should be thus sowing the seeds of dissensions and agitations which would probably disturb this Union to its center? Because we do not accept such a proposition as that in the alternative that the people do not come in under our scheme of submitting this modified ordinance; because instead of that we leave them in their territorial condition, and impose upon them the sound restriction that they must thus remain until they have people enough to entitle them to one Representative in the House of Representatives, the Senator thinks we are trying them with threats, and acting unfairly and unjustly towards them.

Sir, I can see no foundation for any such charge. I believe that, if a majority do not vote to accept this proposition on which their admission will depend, the best thing for the people of Kansas, and certainly the best thing for the people of the United States, which can then be done, will be to let them know that they will have to remain in this position probably for some years to come. We may thus obtain a truce on this agitating and disturbing question, and a truce for even four or five years may be of inestimable advantage to us. It may be that, in that time, we may improve the opportunities of this truce into a permanent and lasting peace; that we may engage the public mind in the consideration of other questions; that we may employ it in those vast interests, material and moral, which are necessary to our progress and advancement; that we may learn to treat each other with more of justice and moderation, and with a more conciliatory spirit. Whenever that is attained, I believe, then, with the Senator from Kentucky, it will be hard to fix the limits to our progress and our improvement.

But, sir, if these agitations are to continue—and it seems to me that his scheme invites them, instead of putting an end to them—for four or five, or even, perhaps, three years longer, no man can say what is to happen in the future. I believe that the deepest interests of the American people are concerned in adopting some scheme to quiet this question for the present, at least; and if they would adopt this scheme presented by the conference committee, it is probable, in my opinion, that we should have repose for a while at least—a repose which, perhaps, might be improved, as I said, into a permanent peace. I believe that by adopting this proposition, the question would pass for a time, at least, out of Federal politics; it would be localized; and when that is done, I think there are interests of magnitude enough to employ the public mind, and to engage it in a more wholesome manner. But, sir, like the Senator from Kentucky, I can only say that in signing my name to this recommendation of the conference committee, I sought to do what I believed to be best for the whole country. I believed it to be just in itself; I knew it to be consistent with the principles which I and my friends have been advocating here; and I was willing to do almost anything which was compatible with just and fair dealing, and which did not sacrifice consistency or principle, to settle this question. If I could secure justice and preserve the peace of the country, I believe I should secure all the good which those whom I represent can derive from any settlement of this question.

Mr. COLLAMER. Mr. President, I do not propose, at this time, to occupy the Senate at any great length; but I shall endeavor, as succinctly and as distinctly as I can, to state, in the first place, why I, together with those who act with me, opposed the Senate bill, without going into the argument on its merits; and, in the second place, why we voted for the amendment of the House of Representatives; and, in the third place, why we cannot vote for the proposition now offered.

First, as to the Senate bill: its substance was, if adopted, that it admitted Kansas into the Union as a State under the Lecompton constitution without any further action of the people. Our objections consisted essentially in these: that that constitution was framed by a convention which was the fruit and result of usurpation and fraud; that the usurpation which had been instituted originally continued so as to deprive the people of the opportunity of free voting on the subject of calling a convention; that an unfair and imperfect census was taken, by which a large part of the people were deprived of the chance of voting for delegates; that the constitution was formed in defiance of the will of the people, as manifested in their then recent election for a Territorial Legislature, and was made in point of fact only by those who acted in and approved of it, by a minority of those originally elected to the convention; that the constitution was professed to be presented to the people in a disguised and deceptive form; that the people themselves were deprived of the opportunity which had been promised to them, of passing upon the whole constitution; that an election was held, wherein they professed to obtain some six thousand votes for the constitution with slavery; that an election for State officers was made under that constitution by officers not in any way appointed by the people, and unknown to the law; that that election was fraudulently conducted; and that, besides all this, the people, at an election held on the 4th of January, by virtue of an act of the Territorial Legislature, by a very large majority repudiated it. These, put together and aggregated, constituted our objection to the Lecompton constitution; and for these reasons we considered that it ought not to receive the attention of Congress; that the State should not be admitted under it; and that it was not entitled to be regarded in any measure as a constitution presenting the views of the people of Kansas.

In all these respects the Senate, by a large majority, voted us down. Our objection was not merely that the constitution had not been submitted to the people. We insisted that, in point of fact, the people had, on the 4th of January, under lawful authority, voted directly to reject it by a very large majority. That, to be sure, among others, was ground of complaint; but all these objections, and others which were presented by other gentlemen, were aggregated in the complaint. The Senate, however, decided that, in point of fact, the Lecompton constitution was the constitution of Kansas, so far as the action of Kansas was concerned; and that it was only for Congress to say whether they would accept it; that the people had made that constitution legally by their delegates—not only formed it, but adopted it, and that the only question of difference existing there was one in relation to slavery, which, as they said, was fairly submitted. They therefore passed a bill admitting Kansas as a State with that constitution.

I next call attention to the amendment presented by the House of Representatives. What was its character? Why was it voted for? So far as I could understand it, the substance of it, without recurring to particulars, insisted on three things; first, that the Lecompton constitution should be submitted to a vote of the people, and if they adopted it, very well—it was to stand; but, second, if they did not adopt it, they should proceed, by a convention, to form such a constitution as they wished; and, that, upon being ratified by the people, they should be admitted as a State with such new constitution; and third, in order to secure fair elections on the constitution, a board was formed, consisting of the Governor and Secretary of the Territory, appointed by the President, and of the presiding officers of the two Houses of the Territorial Legislature, elected by the people; and this board was to direct and control the elections and their returns, pass upon them, and finally decide them. That was the proposition which came to us as an amendment from the House of Representatives. Why did we vote for it? In the first place, it would be sufficient for me to say that here were presented to us two alternatives—on the one hand, the Lecompton constitution, which had been rejected by the people of Kansas, most imperatively and conclusively, and, on the other, an offer to submit it to the people, accompanied by a provision that if they did not like it they might make another constitution, which they did like. Could there be any hesitation as to how we should vote in regard to these two alternatives? Could there be any doubt as to the choice we should make between them?

In the next place, if we voted against the House amendment, we deprived the people of Kansas even of the right of establishing a free constitution; we left them to have the Lecompton constitution imposed upon them, and gave them no opportunity to form a free one. Hence we voted for that proposition. Again, it was fair—it was fair even to those who claim that the people, in forming their constitution, may make it a free State or a slave-State constitution as they please, because it offered that opportunity. That proposition was a very liberal step for those gentlemen to take—and there are some such in the country—who hold that the people, in the formation of a State constitution even, have not the right to enslave their fellow-men. But those gentlemen, if any such there were in the two Houses, voted for it with very great liberality; and why? First, because it was the best of the two alternatives offered to them. Next, because, after the knowledge of the vote of the 4th of January, disclosing ten thousand majority against this constitution, there was every moral certainty that when the Lecompton constitution, with slavery, was presented to the people of Kansas, it would be rejected; and there was therefore no hazard in voting to give them an opportunity of that kind.

But, sir, we were induced to vote for the House amendment for another consideration, and that is that it provided a fair board by which elections were to be conducted. We said the previous elections in Kansas had been controlled by violence and corruption and fraud, but here was a chance to have them safely and honestly conducted; and so much security was felt in the board provided by the House amendment, that we were even willing to say that when that board had supervised the election, appointed the officers, received the returns, and adjudicated upon those returns, the whole subject might be settled by the proclamation of the President, and we were led to the latter merely from confidence in the former provision.

But another consideration, and perhaps the most important of them all, was that the House amendment proposed a course of proceeding which would put an end to this controversy in either event and at all events. If the people of Kansas received and accepted the Lecompton constitution by the vote of a majority, they were to be received; and if they did not they were to call a new convention and form such a constitution as they pleased, and when that constitution was ratified they were to be admitted. There was to be the end of controversy. It was because the House amendment did end the controversy that it commended itself to the acceptance of those who voted for it on this side of the Chamber.

Now, Mr. President, I come to the next step: the proposition which is offered as a substitute for both those bills—the proposition of the committee of conference. I do not propose to go into its details; but let us see whether it gives to those of us who voted against enforcing the Lecompton constitution upon the people without their consent, and who voted for the proposition of the House of Representatives, those leading features of security, and those objects which we desired to attain, which were given to us in the latter proposition. I will state its leading provisions. The first is, that the Lecompton constitution shall be presented to the people of Kansas for their acceptance or rejection. "Oh, no," says the honorable Senator from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTER,] "it does not submit the constitution to the people." The majority of the Senate, by the bill they have passed, decided that it was a constitution perfect, so far as Kansas was concerned, not to be passed upon any further by the people; and he says this bill so treats it. If I understand it, it does not so treat it. It submits a certain question to the people; that is, whether they will accept certain land grants; and it provides that, if they accept those land grants, then, and in that case, Lecompton shall stand as the constitution; but it further provides, that if they reject that proposition in regard to the land grants, they reject the Lecompton constitution. Now, I ask, is it true, as the Senator from Virginia says, that that is consistent with the former action of the Senate? Does it not submit a question to the people by which they may reject the Lecompton constitution? Certainly it does. Did not the Senate say, in the former bill, to those people, "it is all perfected on your side, and you shall have no opportunity to reject Lecompton." Yes, they did, unconditionally; and I say they now propose a question to the people by which the people may reject Lecompton; and yet you say that you do not subject the Lecompton constitution to their vote! The two are utterly inconsistent; and there is no ingenuity or sophistry, though the gentleman may have much of the former, if not of the latter, which can by possibility disguise or blink this out of sight.

But, sir, as I said, this proposition provides for submitting to the people of Kansas a question in relation to land grants—whether they will accept a certain proposition in relation to lands. It further provides that, if they will not accept that, then, and in that case, Lecompton goes aside, and the people of Kansas are to remain in their territorial condition for a length of time entirely indefinite. It says they may have a convention when they have a sufficient number of people to entitle them to a Representative in Congress. That number is now ninety-four thousand; but, after the next census, in 1860, it may be one hundred and twenty or one hundred and fifty thousand; we know not. When that time will arrive, we know not. Then, the amount of it is, that it is an indefinite delay; it shall be indefinitely deferred.

Besides, it is as much as saying to them, "we make you this offer of land, but if you will not take this offer of land, liberal as it is, now, see the danger you run of never getting it." Again, this same bill provides that a different board shall be created to direct and supervise the election. It proposes to add a member, the district attorney, appointed by the President, to the Governor and Secretary, so that they shall have three—a controlling majority of that board over the presiding officers of the two Houses of the Legislature. We view this as entirely unfair.

The first objection that occurs to my mind is the form in which this question is attempted to be presented to the people of Kansas. This has been very well defined by the honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN.] It is to put to them one question, by the answer to which they are to decide another question that has no relationship to it. You might as well put the question to that people—"will you vote that you will be freemen?" and now we say to you "if you vote that you will be freemen, you shall have the Topeka constitution; but if you vote that you will not be freemen, then you shall remain in a territorial condition." There is no more relationship between the acceptance of this grant of land and the character of this constitution, than there would be between the question proposed and the result that was to follow in the case I have just put. There is no necessary legal sequence or connection between the two questions. The proposition is therefore artificial, deceptive in its consequences. You put to a man the question—"sir, will you take such grants of land; as a citizen of Kansas are you willing to receive such grants?" "Yes," says he, "I am." "Well, will you vote so?" "I do not see why I should not vote so." "Well, we tell you now, if you will vote to accept these grants, you shall take the Lecompton constitution that you have rejected." In short, "if you will not vote against a favorable offer, you shall have imposed upon you a constitution to which you are opposed, and you must vote against a favorable offer in order to get rid of an obnoxious constitution. You must vote against what you desire, in order that you may get rid of a greater evil. If you vote for these grants which are acceptable to you, and liberal in their character, you do it at the peril of taking upon you a constitution that you detest." It is the very manner in which the question is put to the people which is objectionable. It is artificial in its character; it is calculated to mislead.

We have complained a great deal that the Lecompton constitution was submitted to the people in regard to the question of slavery, in a certain manner, which was unfair, deceptive, and dealing in duplicity. That submission was this: "You may vote for the constitution with slavery, or for the constitution without slavery; but you have to vote for the constitution, at any rate, which has slavery in it in either case." Now, how is it here? We will put to you the question, "Will you vote for these land grants? But now remember, if you vote for the land grants, you are to have this slave constitution, and if you vote against the land grants, you are to have slavery in your Territory without a constitution." That is, you are to have a constitution with slavery, or slavery without a constitution, but slavery at any rate. That seems to me to be the way in which the question is put to them; because you hold that, under the Dred Scott decision, it is a slaveholding Territory, and therefore if the people vote for these land grants, they are to take a slaveholding State constitution, and if they vote against them, they are to endure slavery under a territorial form of government. That is the alternative.

The next objection I have to the manner in which this new bill presents the question is to the provision in regard to population. It seemed to be agreed on all hands, and it was provided in the bill passed by the Senate, that the numbers of the people of Kansas were sufficient to justify their admission. They had numbers enough to admit them two years ago, if they would make a constitution to suit you. You thought they had numbers enough to admit them under the Lecompton constitution. There are numbers enough of them now to justify their admission as a State, if they vote for this constitution; but you give them to understand that there are not numbers enough, if they vote against this constitution, to make a free one. We have here a proposition that Kansas shall be admitted if she will have a slave constitution, and shall not be admitted if she will not have a slave constitution. There are people enough to hold slaves, but not people enough to enjoy freedom! This, it seems to us, is a palpable injustice—an entirely different affair from the House amendment.

In the next place, the proposition which is now before us produces no finality; it makes no settlement. It only makes a settlement provided they adopt the Lecompton constitution, by voting in favor of these grants of land. That will make a finality; and that is the only finality under this proposition—a finality in one result. If the people do not vote to accept these grants, it provides for no finality, no settlement, but leaves things in statu quo by declaring that the people of Kansas shall remain under a territorial form of government for an indefinite and unlimited period of time. I do not know that that part of the proposition will really have much practical effect. It seems to me to be rather brutum fulmen, because I suppose Congress can at any time admit them, notwithstanding this declaration; but, after all, that is the effect it is intended to have on the minds of the people of Kansas. It is intended, if this bill passes, that they shall understand that if they do not accept this proposition, this shall be a bar to their coming in until they have a certain population.

Another objection, and one to which I have alluded before, is that we are not content with this newly constituted board to supervise the elections; we are not willing to take results produced under such supervision, so as to say that the President, upon the returns being made to him, shall issue his proclamation, and Kansas become a State, without those returns being submitted to our examination. If a board were constituted in the manner provided in the House amendment, we had so much confidence in that manner of constituting the board that we were willing to pass it; but we are not willing to have a board constituted in the manner provided in this bill, and trust in the result. The history of affairs in Kansas is such as leads us to be cautious on that subject. We all cannot but know, at any rate a large portion of us are convinced, that the elections in Kansas have been either by violence at the polls, or by fraud and false returns afterwards, so conducted that a small minority of the people have been kept in power. I need not go over the evidences of this. The history of the transaction is full of them at every step.

There is another thing that we cannot but remember. Whatever officers, especially leading officers, who have been appointed in that Territory by the Executive of this Government, the President of the United States, have favored any degree of fairness to the majority of that people, have desired to secure them at all against the influence of violence and fraud, have incurred the executive displeasure. This remark will apply, I think, to all the Government officers there who have evinced any fairness, whether we refer to Governor Reeder, Governor Geary, acting Secretary Stanton, or Governor Walker. In all cases where there has been manifested a disposition to do fairness, and to get rid of frauds, the officers who have manifested such a disposition have certainly incurred executive displeasure and its consequences; and therefore we suppose that whatever officers are appointed by the Executive will read the history of their own fate in that of those who have preceded them, and will consult their own security in what they are doing. We believe we cannot find any safety in this proposition when the majority of the supervising board who have charge of the elections is given into the control of officers created by the Government of the United States; superseding and overriding the officers appointed by the people of Kansas. This is a feature which we regard as of vital importance, and to which we cannot consent. When I say that I speak for myself, and not by authority from any of my associates, any further than I derive it from the action which I have already witnessed at their hands. I have no direct authority to speak for them.

Now, sir, the whole of this proposition amounts to this: it is saying to the people of Kansas, you may vote for the Lecompton constitution, but if you do not have that, you shall have nothing. We are calling upon the people of Kansas to act on the great question of forming their constitution—of forming, ratifying, or putting in operation, if you please, by their votes, the constitution of their proposed State government. It is fundamental, it is the first great principle of self-government. Now you call upon that people to act on that subject, and do you secure to them even what was promised in the Cincinnati platform? Its pledge was, that in forming a State constitution the people should be left perfectly free to mold their institutions in their own way. Now, the people of Kansas are called upon to take action about the adoption of a constitution, to pass a vote which shall put that constitution in force, or reject it; and are they left free! They are trammelled up to that one single act, whether they will have the Lecompton constitution or have nothing. They are not left free to form any constitution they want, to shape any constitution as they may desire it to be, in relation to any of their institutions. In short, the vote seems to be very much like the case of Napoleon III., who allowed the people of France to vote, not whether you will have an emperor, not who will you have as emperor, but will you have me for emperor? that is all.

Mr. President, I wish now to say a few words in regard to the views presented by the honorable Senator from Virginia. He says this bill is in exact consistency with that which the Senate before passed. I have shown in one respect wherein it differs; but that is not all. What was the trouble with that bill? He says that bill merely declared, in relation to the ordinance, that we did not ratify it; that we disclaimed it, and did not provide for the state of things that would result if the people of Kansas should not agree to this condition on which they were to be admitted; and, therefore, this bill goes on to provide for that contingency. Well, sir, if the bill which the Senate passed was obnoxious to that difficulty, why, on earth, did they pass it at all? If it was an objection that you ought to make provision for the contingency of the people in a convention, or by their own votes, refusing to ratify the amended ordinance which you submitted to them, then why did you go on to pass a bill by which you admitted them on condition that they should not have the ordinance which the convention had made? The Senator from Virginia says the difficulty is in regard to the ordinance proposing the terms on which the State shall agree to forego the right of taxing the public lands, if it has that right, and the grants in consideration of which it will yield that right. He says, that is a matter on which the State should pass, as a people, by themselves, or by their dellegates, and that, until they do that, you cannot admit them as a State, unless they have themselves delegated that power to their own convention. Then, I ask, how came the Senate, to pass the original bill, by which they jumped over all objections of that kind? I say this is a different thing, and inconsistent with that bill in that respect. But the truth is, all that amounted to nothing, for the ordinance is no part of the constitution. They claim certain grants of land. If we receive them under their constitution, without disclaiming the ordinance, we make the grants; but the bill passed by the Senate provided that they should be admitted on condition that the ordinance should be of no effect, and further provided that nothing contained in the bill should exclude them from claiming what had been granted to Minnesota, (which is what is now offered,) or prevent Congress from making grants whenever it chose. Was not that left right? I see no objection to that part of the bill; there never was any objection made to that on this side of the Chamber, I believe. Neither the people there nor anywhere else made any objection to it on that ground. No, sir, this is a mere device. There has never been any issue of that kind made in any quarter, by any man, or by any paper in Kansas, here, or elsewhere. It is altogether an afterthought, a device cooked up for this occasion.

The honorable Senator from Virginia claims that this very proposition does that which would settle this controversy, as he thinks. Well, then, he must think they are going to adopt the Lecompton constitution, I suppose; but he hardly intimates that. He hardly believes they will do that. What then? It will leave Kansas in a territorial condition, and then, he says, we shall have a guarantee of peace for three, four, five, or six years. Wherein is that guarantee of peace? May not, and will not, the same controversy continue in Kansas as heretofore? Shall we have taken any step to cure it? Not at all. Will they not continue to call conventions and ask for admission into the Union whenever they please? Certainly; but oh, it is said we have provided here that they shall not be admitted until they have the proper number. That, however, does not prevent Congress from admitting them, nor prevent them from asking for admission. Every bone of contention, every apple of discord, every point of difficulty which has ever agitated Kansas or the country on this subject, remains, and will remain until they are admitted as a State. It is vain to suppose that we are going to localize the quarrel now any more than we have succeeded in doing so heretofore. The people of this Union, in all parts of it, particularly in the North and South, have taken too deep an interest in the question involved, to permit it to go on without their participating in it, in interest at least. They will partake in it. Hence this proposed bill will leave, and it does leave, at any rate in one result, all the difficulties open to perpetual agitation.

Mr. President, disguise this matter as we may, there is one fact of which, I think, we must be morally convinced: that the Lecompton constitution is abhorrent to the views and feelings and opinions of a large majority of the people of Kansas. I doubt whether a man can be found who will question that fact. The very message which the President of the United States has sent to us on the subject, imports that. He says that the people of Kansas were so strangely attached to the Topeka constitution that it was of no use to submit to them any other, for they would reject it; and it was not submitted to the people because it would be rejected. So it is in relation to the action of the delegates to the convention who had promised to submit the constitution to the people and did not do so. After all, why was it that they did not submit it to the people? Can any man present any other possible reason, than because they knew the constitution would be rejected? The vote which was taken on the 4th of January, even if you count on the other side all the votes given on the 21st of December, leaves no possible doubt about it. I suppose that all the people in Kansas who desired to have the Lecompton constitution, voted for it, either with or without slavery, on the 21st of December. Six thousand votes were returned as having been cast on that occasion. I do not think more than half of them were really cast, but call it six thousand. I suppose that about all the people of Kansas who desired to reject that constitution altogether, voted against it on the 4th of January—more than ten thousand. Under these circumstances, can there be any reasonable doubt as to the views of the people of Kansas? None at all. Viewing it in that light, I consider it altogether wrong to resort to any contrivances, any devices, any expedients, on the part of Congress, to endeavor to get rid of that expression of the will of the people, and to fix upon them, in any way, a constitution that we know they do not desire.

This proposition is subject to all the exceptions I have made to it, and yet more. It proposes to submit the question to the people of Kansas at such a time, in such a form, and under such peculiar circumstances, that we must see that it is intended, at least it is well calculated and ingeniously devised, to secure, if possible, the success of the Lecompton constitution, whether the people really desire it or not. Among the other means which may be counted upon for possible success in this vote is the improbability of getting the people to vote against a proposition for lands, which proposition they like, because a constitution may follow. Is it not operating as a blind on the people? "Here is a fair and liberal proposition of land to you; do you not like it?" Every man may say, "I like it." Then comes the question, "will you vote for it?" "No; I will not vote for it, because I will have to take such a constitution with it." Is it to be expected that every man in Kansas will understand that? Is not the very manner in which the question is presented to him calculated to disguise the real question, and to delude him?

Again, we know that that people have been harassed and dragooned, and continued under all sorts of violent oppressions which the forms of law would allow, for many years in succession. I need not go over the story of the violence and the wrongs which they have suffered; but they have suffered, and that long and severely. They very much need repose. Now you propose to them that they may have repose. How? If they will take slavery. Otherwise they are to have no repose, no security, but are to be subjected to a still longer continuance of their sufferings, and to endure longer tribulation.

In the next place, it may be counted that they will vote for it, because all those who desire the places of Senators and Representatives and Governors and secretaries and treasurers and other offices, all those who hope for and have some reasonable expectation of succeeding in obtaining some of these offices, desire to get Kansas in a State form as soon as possible. You will have all that weight to obtain a particular slaveholding constitution, though it is not the constitution the people desire. Besides, you have the assistance of the territorial officers appointed by the Executive. They well know what the ruling majority here desire to effect. They know that they desire to effect the adoption of the Lecompton constitution. That is perfectly understood by the Governor, the Secretary, the marshal, the district attorney, the land officers, and all the other officers of this Government in the Territory of Kansas. All their aid is to be counted upon. That would not be so if it were submitted to the people to make such a constitution as they desired. That would be an entirely different effect, and then the action and influence of these officers might be entirely neutralized.

Further, instead of saying to the people of Kansas, "you may settle this question by forming such a constitution as you want," this proposition gives them no such opportunity. It is so framed as to present to the world this view: "the majority in Congress have always desired to have this matter settled, but the Kansas people want to keep it up, and the Abolitionists try to make them keep it up. Now, we have offered to let them make a State constitution if they please; that is, to take the Lecompton constitution; but they have coolly rejected it." This being done, it may be argued, "can we not say to the whole world, do you not see that it is the Kansas people that try to keep the question open; they would not adopt the constitution we offered them;" and they must incur displeasure and prejudice for trying to keep the question open, when you have given them no opportunity fairly to close it.

There is another consideration to which this proposition addresses itself, calculated to give it success. The people of Kansas have been told by the Executive of the United States that, if they would only get to be a State, especially if they would get to be a slave State, it would be the shortest and quickest road to obtain a free State, because they have the right any day to alter the constitution, and can do it immediately. The President told them so. The report of the Committee on Territories, who presented the bill passed by the Senate, substantially indorsed the same doctrine; and gentlemen here say it is contained in the Lecompton constitution, although that constitution provides for one mode of amendment, which mode is, that it may be amended after 1864, by a two-thirds majority in both Houses of the Legislature, and then submitting the amendment to the people—an impracticable mode.

Now, the people of Kansas are to be presented with this question, in the form of which I have spoken, under this sort of assurance. I have no doubt that it is expected, certainly it is very well calculated, to induce that people to vote for the constitution; and, indeed, in a recently published letter of Governor Robinson, he says, that if there was no doubt as to how the certificates would be given to the officers chosen at the election which has already taken place, he thinks it would be well even to have the Lecompton constitution put on them, because they would have the controlling power; and he says that people are fatigued with their long political agitation, and in need of rest, and desirous of going about their industrial pursuits. Is not this whole proposition well calculated to secure a vote of that long oppressed people, desirous of peace, even for what they do not want? The truth is, it addresses them on motives of that kind. If they follow it, they will certainly be deluded. Just so sure as the Lecompton constitution is put into effect and operation, it will not be altered or amended. If they attempt to amend it immediately upon its being put into operation by the action of the newly-elected Legislature, the Governor would veto the act. The free-State people have not got two thirds of the Legislature, and they are not to have it anyhow. The attempt to amend the constitution will be stopped; but if it were to go on, whenever that resolves itself into a judicial question, as it may at any time, and is presented to the Supreme Court of the United States, it will no doubt be decided that the people cannot alter their constitution contrary to the provisions of that constitution. It will be held that it is a sort of national compact by which people have come into the government of the majority on that condition, and being thus in the nature of a compact, it is incapable of being changed, except agreeably to the terms of the compact itself. They will be deluded in that; and I suppose, indeed I know, that this is well calculated to delude them. Whether it will do so effectually, time must determine.

I have very little hesitation in saying that, whatever may take place, if this question of accepting the land grants is presented to the people under this bill, rely upon it, Mr. President—I speak merely from the lessons which the history of Kansas has taught me—a majority will be returned in favor of accepting the land grants. I say that a majority will be returned for it in all human probability, whatever the actual votes may be. I do not agree with the honorable Senator from Kentucky, that the result will be otherwise, and that the proposition will be rejected. I do not say that I do not believe a majority of the people will vote against it; but I say the returns will show a majority the other way; and when I say that, I speak merely from the lessons taught me by the history of Kansas itself.

There is another matter that equally bears on this proposition, and addresses itself to us on this occasion. An election has been held under the Lecompton constitution; and if the people accept these land grants with this condition, of course, then, I take it, they are to abide by that election. Now, can anybody tell me what is the result of that election? Does not the final and ultimate determination of it rest with a certain Mr. Calhoun to-day? Is it not altogether within his hands and under his control? Most unquestionably it is. If the people do as they may do under this proposition, and as it is calculated to have them do—accept the Lecompton constitution under the belief that the certificates of election are to be actually issued to a majority of the representatives of the free-State people, they will certainly be deluded.

I have attempted to show that all these motives and purposes are presented, by the arrangement of this bill calculated not to carry into effect the true wishes of the people of Kansas, but to frustrate and evade them, and obtain, in point of fact, from these motives and considerations, a vote of that people, by which they shall take upon themselves this slave constitution, abhorrent to their feelings.

Mr. President, I do not wish to detain the Senate longer. I have stated the reasons why, in my view, we cannot vote for this bill that is now presented here, whenever it shall come up properly, proposed by the committee of conference. It is utterly inconsistent with all the views we have entertained, and utterly inconsistent with the votes we have given in relation to the House amendment. I do not know but that, if it be presented to them, the people of Kansas will manifest a continuance of the virtue and endurance they have heretofore displayed, by which they will disregard all the motives and inducements here held out to them, hold on their way, and go on enduring even unto the end, rejecting this proposition. It is possible that such may be the result of their discernment and their virtue; but I think we have little reason to expect that such will be the result. Certain I am, that none of these gentlemen who contrived this bill, and devised the form in which it is presented, expect to have any such result. At least a strong hope is entertained that it will secure the purposes for which it is designed by these contrivances—secure success to the Lecompton constitution, whether the people desire it or not.

Viewing it in this light, regarding it in this view, it seems to me that the thing itself, in its character and in all its aspects, is utterly inconsistent with that conduct which becomes an American Senate—the Congress of a great people, whose conduct should be distinguished for directness, for frankness, for justness, for fairness, not for cunning and device. Sir, I think, if we intend to secure the confidence and command the respect of the people of this great and discerning nation, lovers of justice as they are, we shall reject this proposition.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I have but very little to say on this matter, and I shall not detain the Senate long. What I shall say relates simply to a single feature of the proposition now before us. In the outset, let me remark that I have heard in the discussions on this floor and in the country a great deal said about the equality of the States. A great deal has been said about certain encroachments that have been made on the doctrine of the equality of the States, and new measures and new propositions have constantly been resorted to of late for the purpose of producing that very desirable result which all seem to aim at—equality of the States. It was said that the Missouri compromise was repealed in order to produce that equality. Various measures that have marked our national history of late have been aimed professedly at an equality of the States.

Now, sir, this bill reported by the committee of conference, or this amendment, or this proposition, or this whatever you may call it—for it seemed to be uncertain yesterday what it was, whether it was a proposition of itself, or an amendment to something else—appears to me to be utterly, entirely, and totally at war with any idea of State equality, and for that reason I am opposed to it. I am opposed to it for many reasons, but that is the only one on which I propose to say anything this afternoon, because other points have been presented and discussed and elaborated at great length, and as has been well said, I suppose the country and the Senate understand them; and if they do not understand them, I am not going to undertake at this time to enlighten them.

The history of the Territory of Kansas has been peculiarly unfortunate, and the people of that Territory have been peculiarly unfortunate in the relations which they have sustained to the Executive, who ought to be the common protector and guardian of the rights of all. In the message which Mr. Buchanan transmitted to us not long ago—I have sent to the document room for a copy of it, and I am told it cannot be found; but I remember his proposition—he took this very curious ground: that if the people of Kansas stayed away from the polls and did not vote, they were guilty of rebellion; and he elaborated at some considerable length the idea that by refraining from voting, the free-State men in that Territory were guilty of rebellion. Well, sir, in the progress of affairs, it so happened that on a certain occasion they did go to the polls, and that, instead of being rebellion, was servility, because while the President arraigned them for rebellion for not voting, when they did come and vote for the purpose of protecting themselves against the consequences of the measures that he was endeavoring to force upon them, the President said it was the most solemn recognition that could possibly be made of the authority of that very constitution against which, at the moment they voted, they remonstrated.

Well, sir, what is the bill which we have before us? It is now to admit them; but the preliminary of a popular election is first to be had. I appeal to every gentleman on the other side of the Chamber, who said so much in favor of restoring peace and quiet in Kansas, and who was unwilling to subject that people to the contingencies of another popular election, how he can reconcile it with what he has heretofore said to vote for this proposition, which subjects them to the contingencies of a popular election, just exactly as much as did the proposition that was submitted by the honorable Senator from Kentucky, and which came back to us in the bill of the House of Representatives? All the expense, all the delay, all the excitement, all the agitation that were to be produced in the country by the proposition submitted by the Senator from Kentucky, are now taken by the majority of the Senate as readily as if they had never said a word against them; and it is to that proposition that I desire to say a few words.

In regard to the question whether Kansas is fit to be admitted, I will read an extract from a speech made upon the floor of the Senate, on the 21st of March, by an honorable Senator from Missouri, [Mr. POLK.] He said:

"Are there any good reasons why we should not admit Kansas? If so, what are they? Has she not the requisite population? All concede that she has. No one raises an objection on this ground."

I do not know that that statement was controverted. It was then laid down upon the other side of the House, and not controverted on this, and alleged to be universally admitted to be true, that Kansas had a population sufficient to entitle her to admission into the Union as one of the States. Now, I am going to advance this proposition; it may sound extravagant to you, sir, and it may sound extravagant to some other ears; but I contend that if Kansas has population enough to qualify her for admission into the Union as a slave State, she has enough to qualify her for admission as a free State, if there is anything in the doctrine of equality of States.

What does this bill propose to do? It proposes to submit a certain question to the people; but let us see how it leaves them. Mr. Buchanan, in his message to us says that Kansas now, in the present time, is as much a slave State as Georgia or South Carolina. She is that now, without anything more being done; that is, taking Mr. Buchanan as authority. You propose, then, to submit this question to her, whether she will take certain lands, and the lands which you propose to give her, according to an estimate which has been prepared, as I understand, at the General Land Office, amount in value to nearly five million dollars. This bill, in substance, says to Kansas, "if you will come into the Union as a slave State we will give you land worth $5,000,000." This is the proposition which the General Government of the United States makes: "if you will come into the Union as a slave State, with the Lecompton constitution, we are ready to give a premium of five millions for a slave State; but if, on the other hand, you prefer not to come in as a slave State, you must stay out; and what then? You must stay out a slave State; because you are a slave State as much as Georgia or South Carolina before you come in; and if we take you in, you will only be a slave State in the Union; and if you stay out you will be a slave State out of the Union." By no possibility, under the proposition which is submitted here, can Kansas become a free State.

Besides that, you virtually say to her, "if you do not choose to come in as a slave State you shall have no land, and you shall not come in at all," that is, we will not propose any legislation by which you may come in until you have enough population to entitle you to admission under the proportion or ratio which is established under the census for choosing Representatives to Congress. That is the simple proposition—to take the public land or the public Treasury of the whole country and hold up five millions as a bribe, telling Kansas if she will come in a State she may take the five millions, provided she comes in a slave State, and if she stays out she shall have nothing; and more than that, your enabling act, by which you offer to her to come into the Union when she gets the Federal numbers that will entitle her to a member on the floor of the other House, says nothing about land. She may come in then landless. If she comes in now, she comes in with the five millions. If she stays away now, she cannot come in at all until she gets the Federal population entitling her to come in, and then she comes in without any land.

Sir, I do not know how this strikes other gentlemen; but to me, it sounds as one of the most profligate propositions that could ever be submitted. I do not know how it may strike the northern ear; but it seems to me that if there is ever a time coming when this question, that has agitated our country so long, will culminate and come to a crisis, it must be when the Federal Government has reached such a pitch that it offers a premium of five millions for the admission of a slave State, and keeps free States out altogether. It seems to me that it will not do for any of us, after this, to talk about equality of States. Where is equality, where is justice, where is right, when that is the law which is administered from this Federal Capitol to one of our Territories asking admission into the Union?

Equality of States! Sir, I have heard a great deal said about it, and I have heard a great deal said, too, about another phrase which I believe, historically, has grown into popular use since I had the honor of a seat in the Federal Congress, which is now not quite sixteen years ago, and that is "northern aggression." It has become a popular and cant phrase—one of very frequent use; but I believe, historically, "northern aggression" is a bantering not yet sixteen years old, and when it was first mentioned, and for years after, upon this floor, it excited nothing but a smile of derision and contempt. Northern aggression! Why, sir, what chance has there been for northern aggression? Did not the honorable Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMMOND] tell you that all history could never blot it out, that the slaveholders had ruled this country? and did he not tell you how they ruled it? And, sir, he made no idle boasts; he told nothing but the truth in that respect. Have you not had constantly in the Executive chair, almost uninterruptedly, a southern man for President? and when you have not had a southern man, you have had almost always, with infinitely slight exceptions, what is worse—a northern man with southern principles. I infinitely prefer a southern man to one of them; I would now rather take the honorable Senator from South Carolina for President than the man we have got; and I will tell you why: when a generous thought came into his heart he would not be afraid to let it out for fear it might betray the sincerity with which he was acting. For that reason I would prefer a southern man to a northern man with southern principles.

But when such has been the history of the country, the undenied history of the country for more than sixty years, how perfectly idle and ridiculous is it to talk about northern aggressions? No, sir; of all the measures of this Government that were ever passed, there never was one, in my mind, so well calculated to challenge the unqualified condemnation of every northern man, no matter what his politics, of every man from a free State, as this proposition, which virtually puts the ban of this Government on every Territory seeking to come into the Union as a State, unless she comes in as a slave State.

It is for this reason, to say nothing about a great many others that might be suggested, that I record my vote now, and would record my vote under any circumstances, against the admission of Kansas into the Union under such a state of things as this. It is no matter to me what the consequences may be—not the slightest. It seems to me that if we submit to this, we submit to a degradation which makes us slaves, and slaves in the worst sense. What, sir, have the free States done, what has Kansas done, what has anybody done, that there shall be taken from the Federal Treasury, either in money or in lands, five millions as a premium to induce the Territories to come in as slave States?

And, sir, this is no new feature in the history of your Government on this question. When Mr. Buchanan was Secretary of State under James K. Polk, he offered $200,000,000 to the Spanish Crown to buy the slave island of Cuba. What for? Were we in want of islands? Had we not enough? That same James Buchanan who wanted to buy islands with a slave population at $200,000,000 a piece, by a single dash of his pen, gave away another island, on the Pacific coast, occupying relatively the same position to the Pacific that Cuba did to the Gulf of Mexico—I mean Vancouver's Island. Yes, sir; Vancouver's Island, on the Pacific coast, was given away by the same Mr. Buchanan, when our title to it was clear and indisputable; just as clear as it was to any part of this Union. Mr. Buchanan gave that away because—no, sir, I will not say because; but I will say it happened that he gave it away—it being on the Pacific coast, and in such a latitude that it would probably be made a free State if it ever came into the Union. At the same time that he has northern islands to give away, he wants to buy southern islands at $200,000,000 a piece. But yet, sir, we are told of the equality of the rights of the States; and it is a theme upon which we have been lectured over and over and over again, and it has been alluded to I do not know how many times in this discussion.

Now, as I said yesterday, when I suggested that this matter be laid over and brought up for discussion to day, I did not believe there was any purpose on this side of the House to talk against time; I have no such purpose myself; I have seen none such in others; and although there are a great many other considerations which are potent in my mind for voting against this proposition, this single one is enough to condemn it by every conviction of my understanding and every feeling of my heart; and having expressed this much, I shall not trespass longer on the attention of the Senate.

Mr. WADE. Mr. President, it is not my purpose at this time, after the general question has been so elaborately discussed, to detain the Senate at any length by anything that I may have to say at this period of the debate. But, sir, we have now before us, as we are told, a new proposition altogether. We are told that it is in the nature of a new bill, having but very little connection with anything that has preceded it. I must confess that I am astonished at the nature of the proposition which the gentlemen composing the committee of conference have brought in for our consideration. Untrammelled as the committee seem to have been by anything that has been done—so they say—and being about to initiate a new proposition altogether, the fact that their minds should have fastened upon such a thing as this, is well calculated, I think, to surprise anybody. If justice, right, and equal regard to the institutions of the South and of the North, were to be considered by that committee, it appears to me that an unsophisticated man might, in five minutes, have brought in a proposition against which there would have been no dissenting voice in either branch of your Legislature.

We had been divided here upon questions with regard to the will and wishes of the people of Kansas as to the constitution under which they should live. It was contended on the one side that the people, acting through the forms of law, had framed a constitution which ought to be obligatory. On the other hand, that constitution was assailed here by the Opposition upon the ground that it was an utter perversion of the will of the majority of the people of Kansas; that it was got up by trickery and by fraud, and that the majority of the people ought not to be governed by it. Thus we were at issue upon this thing called the Lecompton constitution. A portion of the people had called a convention, which framed this instrument, and called it a constitution. The people had previously met and framed another constitution, which they called their constitution, and which they said embodied the will of the great mass of the people of Kansas. I allude to the Topeka constitution.

Now, sir, when this committee were about to pass by all the propositions that had gone before, and to substitute a new bill, how easy it would have been for them to say, in perfect justice and fairness to all, "we will not take the first constitution made at Topeka, because it is denied on the other side to be the will of the people; we will not take the Lecompton constitution, because it is alleged to be fraudulent, and not to embody the will of the people; but we will throw both aside, and we will provide, under every safeguard that can secure an honest and fair election, for submitting this complicated and vexatious question again to the people, and they shall be at liberty to frame their constitution." For that purpose the committee might have selected any precedent they wished—they might have taken the enabling act for Minnesota, or any similar one, and they would have found no objection to it. We should all have voted for a proposition of that kind, just to all parties; we should have permitted the people to come up now fairly to the work of framing a constitution; we should have said to them, "make it republican in form; submit it to our consideration; and if we find it to be such, we will admit you with it."

Why did it not occur to this committee that that was the way to settle the controversy, if a settlement of it was indeed desired? The proposition which they have made, while it seems to me in a certain aspect to be humiliating to the South, is unjust, if not an open insult, to the North. It is humiliating to the South because it is a total and entire abandonment of the principle on which many of them staked their determination not to exist in the Union at all; for they said, "let us have the Lecompton constitution, or we will go out of the Union ourselves." That proposition they have surrendered; they have given it up; they do not pretend that they can stand by it unless it is in some sort submitted and thrown back to the people to pass upon. So far it is right; so far it is just; and I was glad to see the committee yield thus far to the reasons and arguments which had been addressed to them, showing that their Lecompton concern was fraudulent; that it did not embody the will of the people; that it was a fraud; and that their legal position was fraught with tyranny and danger in all subsequent time. That position has been repudiated and abandoned by them. We hear no more of the omnipotence of conventions assembled to frame constitutions. We hear no more of their being armed with supreme power to put upon the necks of a people just such a constitution as they please, without the people having power to get rid of it. That was the position we heard rung in our ears from southern gentlemen day after day, but a little while ago. Now they have thrown this absurd position to the winds, and I thank God for it. They seem to admit that the people after all must have the right, in some shape, to pass upon the institutions under which they are to live. So far it is a great improvement on the Lecompton concern. But if the people are to pass upon the Lecompton constitution, why not let them do it directly? Will any man be deceived by the verbiage in which this proposition is couched? Have you not left the people to pass upon it? If so, why not submit it in such a plain and fair manner that the people can all understand it?

Sir, this proposition reads upon its face as though it was a premium for votes. Are the people to vote directly upon the constitution under which they live? Not by any means; but they are to vote upon a grant of land; they are to vote whether they will accept a gift from the Government of five or six million acres of land; and if they decide to take the land, that decision is to drag after it the Lecompton constitution, that they have repudiated over and over again. Was ever any such thing as this concocted by a statesman for the action of the people? Is a land grant the principal thing in framing a State constitution? Sir, it seems to be a bid of land for liberty, a bribe held out. "Will you, people of Kansas, surrender your liberties for land?" That is the question; it cannot be disguised. I impugn directly the motives of no man, but I state what the effect of this action will be. How will it appear to the world, say what you will about it? If the people will vote themselves so much land, then they surrender themselves to a slave constitution, which you and I know they have repudiated over and over again. It is not competent for me to state the motives which have prompted to such action as this; but you vote for the incident, and the principal is to follow. How absurd and inconsequential! Why, Mr. President, if I should make just such a proposition as that to obtain your vote upon a private bill, and it should come out to the world that I had done it, I presume every just minded Senator here would vote promptly to expel me from the body as unworthy of a seat in it. The offer is: "so much land if you vote for this constitution; if you vote against it, you shall have neither land nor anything else."

Mr. President, I recollect well that in the course of some observations which I made not long ago, you, sir, [Mr. Briggs in the chair,] put the question to me: suppose a slave constitution were presented to Congress: would I vote for it? I recollect well the answer I made to you, and your apparent surprise at the absurdity of the answer. Yet I find the President of this body to-day assuming my position, and voting for the same proposition, only reversing its application. I would not vote for the admission of a slave constitution; nor will you vote for a free one. I do not complain of you; I cannot complain of you, because I occupy about the same ground that you will do an hour hence, when the vote is taken, except that practically our positions are reversed in the application of them. You come from a slave State, and I from a free State. The country will understand the positions we all occupy on this subject, and I do not care how soon they are understood by all.

Mr. President, it has been sought to break the force of the objections to this scheme by saying that there was uncertainty about the people of Kansas accepting the grant proposed in your original bill. This is a strange apology, and it comes at a strange and an unfortunate time. Sir, do you not know that the subject was mooted in the Committee on Territories, and it was said that no kind of objection could arise from any such thing; that we had a right to modify the ordinance and make what grant of land we pleased to the Territory; and if they rejected the constitution on account of our not giving them as much as they thought they were entitled to, they would not be a State; but if they accepted the constitution by organizing under it, subject to the provision we had made, that was an end of it? How happens it now that you make this whole controversy turn, as it were, on the uncertainty of whether the people will accept a donation such as you have made to every other State? Why in the name of Heaven is it now paraded here as the main reason why you have reversed your action?

Mr. GREEN. The Committee on Territories never did say that it was the right of the committee or of Congress to dictate the terms upon which the State should be admitted. They have always claimed that; but on the question of contract on the subject of lands, it was matter of agreement. The formation and adoption of a constitution, the committee held, was a question with which the Senate and the House of Representatives had nothing to do; and that has been the point all the time. I think, therefore, the Senator does injustice to the committee when he says that they thought the subject of the grant of lands was a proper matter for the consideration of the convention of the Territory. Not so; it is a matter of agreement, proposition, acceptance; but the constitution is a different thing; that is a finality already.

Mr. WADE. I do not deny that. That is just exactly what we did agree. We agreed that it was a proposed compact, and that if the proposition on our part should be accepted by the organization of a State government under it, it would be very well, and their action under it would show their agreement to our proposed contract. That is what we agreed to in committee, and it is a sound principle of law; and the idea of repudiating it is not twenty-four hours old. That is how we agreed; and yet the Senator from Virginia rises here, and to apologize for this misshapen production of the committee of conference, makes it all to turn on the uncertainty of whether the people of Kansas would accept this proposition. I might ask that Senator, or any other who has had anything to do with this subject, if that matter labored in your mind, how in the name of Heaven did you suffer your Lecompton bill to be debated here day after day, week after week, and I do not know but I might say month after month, without suggesting the great difficulty which must interrupt the whole proceedings, and lead you to surrender all you had done, and to set up a scheme entirely new? You did not apprehend any such thing as you went on with your Lecompton bill. The Senator from Virginia never suggested then that there was any trouble about the land grants that were provided for in that bill. You voted it through this body. It ran as smooth as oil. No man said there was any difficulty about that, nor could it be said; because so far as the ordinance was concerned, and the land grant was involved, the bill stood on exactly the same principles as every other territorial bill, and granted no more, no less. Why, then, seek to cover up this enormity under so plain a proposition as that? Sir, the people will understand it, whether gentlemen here understand it or not. It is in the nature of a bribe. It is not expected that the unsophisticated people through the whole wilderness of Kansas, will be able, like lawyers, to scan closely, and understand critically, the import of this grant. I will not say that the fact that it was known they would not understand it, constituted the reason why a question so simple as the adoption or the rejection of the Lecompton constitution is made to turn on the fact whether the people will accept a donation of lands; but it looks very much like it. It would be out of order for me to say it was so intended; but that will be its effect.

Well, sir, that is the nature of the proposition. I have said it is humiliating to the high-minded South, because it is a total surrender of the position upon which they planted themselves, and swore in their councils they would stake their institutions. You have given it up; you have surrendered Lecompton, in this miserable way to be sure, into the hands of the people of Kansas to reject it if they please, and as I trust in God they will. Therein, sir, you lie in the dust. Southern chivalry is here in these Halls, begging men to vote for a miserable proposition well calculated to mislead the people. I am sorry for it. I have respected their highmindedness. I have always hoped heretofore that they were above consenting to arrangements that could not stand out in open day. I do not say that anything sinister is intended in this proposition, but I know it is well calculated in itself to deceive the people, and therefore I pronounce it humiliating to the South. I say further, it is unjust, if not an open insult to the North. Why? I can tell you nothing new after the proposition has been so ably handled by the honorable Senator from Kentucky and the honorable Senator from Vermont, who have preceded me. They have made it too palpably plain for me to stand here long in elaborating this point. Here stands out before the whole world the most glaring injustice, the most palpable wrong; and no man dare face me down here, and say that you place slavery and liberty upon equal foundations by this measure. You talk of the equality of the States. Why, sir, you are trampling the free States into the dust, and offering bribes to slavery. It will not do. Whether we understand it or not, God knows the people of the United States, the honest people, will understand it.

I have said, and I still say, that this proposition is flagrantly unjust to the North, and, I think, an open insult. Well might the Senator from Kentucky ask, what would the South think of a proposition like this on the other side? I have too good an opinion of you to believe that you would bear it as meekly as we shall. I believe that you would conduct yourselves, in reference to such a nefarious proposition, in a manner more fraught with honor to your section than I fear we shall. I wish to God we had men as fearless to stand up for the right, as you have to stand up for the wrong. I honor you for the manner in which you stand up to what you say you regard as your rights. Well might the Senator from Kentucky ask, what would you think of such a proposition if the case were reversed? There is not a southern man who will not die in his tracks before he would surrender to a proposition so insulting to the South as this manifestly is to the North. I know you would not, and I give you all honor for it, because in that, if in nothing else, God knows I sympathize with you; you are right in it.

The proposition now offered to the people of Kansas is this: "you shall have six million acres of land, and immediate admission into the Union, if you will take slavery; but if you prefer a free State you shall be excluded; you shall be treated as outside barbarians, unworthy to be members of this Union for an indefinite length of time to come." It is undeniable; it stands out gross, palpable, upon the face of your record, and cannot be disguised. It required a good deal of assurance, a good deal of effrontery, to bring in a proposition like this: but you knew the material to which you were addressing it too well to fear the consequences. You say by this proposition, if Congress adopts it, "come in ye people of Kansas; here are millions of acres of land; here is immediate admission if you prefer slavery; but if, on the other hand, you prefer liberty, you are unworthy of admission, you are not numerous enough to be admitted." One slaveholder for the purpose of the admission of a Territory as a State, is worth more than twenty free men. That is the naked proposition which you have brought here for the consideration of northern men, and I perceive that you will have northern men who will go with you even for this. You will have them, and you knew you would; because you knew you could not make a proposition, however fatal to the rights, however fatal to the honor of the North, without finding here men who would stoop to it. When I contrast the high chivalric honor of the South in this particular with the North, I sometimes wish to change places with them. Here is a proposition offering a premium to slavery, and immediate admission without inquiry as to numbers, if the people of Kansas will come here as a slave State; but if they decide on the side of freedom, they are to be indefinitely postponed until a census shall be taken at the will of a craven and besotted Executive. That is the proposition offered to the high-minded people of that section from which I come. They will spurn it, though I perceive that some of their Representatives are about to take it.

Now, what are to be the consequences of the passage of this proposition? I must judge from what has preceded it. I do not know but that I may be uncharitable in my supposition; but when I look at your candle-box frauds, at your Cincinnati Directory frauds, all adopted by your Executive, and the agents who commit the frauds applauded and foisted into high offices of power and respectability, how can I repose confidence in you? When I see the just arrangement which had been made by that just man, the lover of equality and justice to all parties and to all sections, the Senator from Kentucky, stricken out, and another man added to the board to supervise the election—a man who was no more wanted there than a fifth wheel to a coach, for you had a full board before—I ask this committee, and I wish them to answer me now, why did you place the district attorney of the Territory on that board of commissioners? I repeat the question, why did you do it? Was it not right before? A corrupt Executive was allowed to appoint two. Was it wrong that the people should appoint two more? Why give your Executive the appointment of a majority of the board, and full power over the people, to trample them in the dust? Answer me that, if you can! I pause, but I pause in vain, for a reply. What shall I say, then? Sir, it savors too much of the candle-box and of the Cincinnati Directory. Is it intended, at all hazards, against the vote of the people, and in defiance of their wishes, to forge a majority, to make a false return to the President that you have outvoted the free-State men, and that Lecompton is adopted? Was that the anchor you had thrown to the windward, in giving a complete majority to your own party in that board, and not trusting the people on equal terms with the Executive?

Sir, I have no fears of the people of Kansas if you give them any chance, even if you will be honest in counting their votes; but here the matter is left to the President of the United States, who censured his Governor because he had refused to yield to an outrageous, notorious, palpable, undisputed fraud, and ultimately compelled him to resign. I say when such things are done, what may we not suspect? I can hardly realize that I am in the Senate of the United States when propositions calculated to blind the people, propositions calculated to hold out false colors, are presented in this way. In this scheme, you have evidently followed, as far as you could, the bill presented by the Senator from Kentucky; but you have amended that most just clause of his upon which the honesty of the whole transaction turned in order that you might still keep in the hands of those who have proved themselves to be unworthy of such a trust, the power to decide against the people, as they have done heretofore; the fate of the new State.

Now, sir, I am not so much of an enemy to the people of the South as they suppose. I think they will never gain anything by such a proposition as this. It is not because I suppose they will, that I manifest this zeal against it; but because, like the Senator from Kentucky, I know that the safety, the permanency, the true glory of our institutions must be built upon the solid foundations of eternal right and justice; and this trickery, these frauds, although they may serve the purpose of a party for a day, are fraught with danger to the whole community, and will finally result in disastrous consequences, even to those for whose benefit they seem to be perpetrated.

Mr. President, I have now said all that I intended to say, and much more, because when I see a proposition that appears to be unfair, and, I will say, that appears to be dishonest, I cannot retain exactly that equanimity that perhaps I ought. It may be all fair and all right, but I must announce the impressions that I deliberately have on that subject. I think it is palpably wrong—wrong to the high-minded people of the South, who, I am sure, when they understand it, will trample it beneath their feet as an unclean thing—unjust, palpably unjust, to the North, whom it places on a footing of inequality. Sir, if I did seek the destruction of the institutions of the South, I could devise no way more facile than that you have yourselves marked out; for, being in the minority, whenever you shall have divested yourselves of that character which we have conceded to you—that you are high-minded, honorable men—you will have lost the great stake in the Government that would ever enable you, as long as you practiced on these principles, to enjoy your full share in the councils of this nation, and even more. As I said, I do not know but that this proposition may be right; but its appearance is absolutely and deliberately wrong.

Now, Mr. President, I regret that such a proposition should have been brought in here. Why would you not let Lecompton die, if you had not the force to put it through? I would infinitely prefer, for the honor of the nation, both North and South, that you had had the force in both branches to put your Lecompton constitution through here, rather than have been compelled to resort to this indirection, in order to accomplish the same result; because its effect in demoralizing the nation, perverse and iniquitous as I think it was, would have been infinitely less than by this monster of a proposition.

But I have said that it was no part of my purpose to detain the Senate. I have very feebly expressed the feelings that I entertain in regard to this proposition. I do not believe you can seduce the noble-minded people of Kansas, who have withstood all your persecutions so long, to succumb to such a scheme as this. You have exercised the whole powers of your Government; you have invoked your armies and let them loose upon the defenseless people there; you have inflicted upon them hardships, and pursued them with a relentless persecution that I have never known before, and hardly ever read of in history; and yet they stand unconquered and unconquerable. It only remains to determine whether appliances to their cupidity, arts of deception can work out a fall for a people who have so nobly withstood all your force. I know well you cannot force them to it. Their intelligence is great, and I think they will be capable of seeing through this nefarious net, which is calculated to lower them, to degrade them, to a condition of servitude. I do not believe you will effect it. I have a better opinion of those noble spirits. I think the controversy will result in your most ignominious defeat before the people of Kansas. The only danger I apprehend is from the arrangement of this scheme by which you put the whole power of controlling the election into the hands of a corrupt Executive. The people are against you in overwhelming numbers. The only doubt is, whether the executive officers will count their votes aright. I am willing to venture that people, with all the skill in weaving nets for their destruction that you can devise, provided at last you leave them to be counted according to their numbers, and make fair, and not John Calhoun returns.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President, I do not desire to protract this discussion; but such broad, harsh, and unfair denunciations have been made upon the report by the Opposition, that I may be permitted to say a very few words in reply. Though the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADE] chooses to denounce the Executive as corrupt, if he considers it even gentlemanly, I do not. I must be permitted to say that in the action of the present Executive, whilst I may approve or disapprove of his judgment on many points, I have seen nothing corrupt and sordid, nor has any other Senator; and I dare him to name the instance. When he undertakes thus to characterize him, he becomes a slanderer upon the executive officer of this Government.

Now, a word on the facts before the Senate. The Senator from Kentucky says that the President's friends have abandoned Lecompton. That is not true. They stand precisely upon Lecompton as they always stood upon Lecompton, and the written report shows it. How he can feel justified in making such a statement to the Senate is to me most extraordinary indeed. Still he made it—he made it as matter of judgment, I presume.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. GREEN. I will forbear.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. The gentleman states, with peculiar emphasis, that certainly does not belong to the occasion, that it is not true.

Mr. GREEN. It is not.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I say it is true, what I said. Every word of it is true. I did not say simply what the gentleman represents me as having said. I stated the abandonment of the Lecompton constitution to consist in the abandonment of it as an absolute constitution to go with an absolute admission. That was what was contended for here. I should have been guilty of self-contradiction, if I had said what the gentleman imputes to me. What I meant by the abandonment, and a meaning that could not fail to be inferred from what I said, was that I spoke of the abandonment of it as an absolute instrument to be imposed on the people of Kansas without reference to their wishes. That is all I meant, I assure the gentleman now, at any rate; and that, I think, is all I said before.

Mr. GREEN. I understood the gentleman before, and understand him now, and as he explains it it is all the same. The friends of Lecompton then said it was a complete instrument legally adopted, and they yet say so; and there is no abandonment of it even in the sense in which he now makes the assertion.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. All I know is—and if there is anything in that that concerns the gentleman's purpose he is welcome to it—that it was contended here that this was a perfect and complete instrument, and that Kansas ought to be admitted on the basis of it, and admitted absolutely. Now I say that that is the position which is abandoned.

Mr. GREEN. I understood the Senator before, and he may amend his position forty times, as a Kentucky climber would, but it makes no difference to me. Sir, I understand that the friends of Lecompton from the beginning have said—

Mr. CRITTENDEN. May I ask the gentleman a question, with his permission?

Mr. GREEN. Certainly.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I do not wish to have any misunderstanding.

Mr. GREEN. Not a bit of it.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. He says as a Kentucky— I did not hear the word exactly.

Mr. GREEN. Climber—that climbs up, you know.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. That is the word?

Mr. GREEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. It is a phrase I do not understand; and I presume the gentleman uses it without any particular or specific meaning whatever attached to it.

Mr. GREEN. I will explain if the gentleman does not understand it.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I do not, sir

Mr. GREEN. As soon as you are through, I will do it.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I am through.

Mr. GREEN. There are certain men in Kentucky who hunt possum, and they go out and sometimes cannot shoot them, but have to climb the tree after them, and the higher they climb the more prominent they become. I do not know anything about what his position is, but Kentucky climbers may think that there is something to be made out of mystification of the question.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. The gentleman grows more and more mysterious every word he utters. I shall take an opportunity, when I can do it without interrupting him, to make a reply.

Mr. GREEN. I am very sorry the Senator did not understand me. I was upon this point: that, when he had said the friends of the Kansas Lecompton constitution had abandoned it, he was mistaken. He may think so, and I have no doubt whatever he honestly thinks so; but it is not so on the part of the friends of that measure; and I hope he will not undertake to speak for them. They know their own thoughts, their own purposes, their own objects, their own intents; and while they admit that the people of Kansas legally adopted a constitution, yet they say at the same time they made a proposition, in the nature of a contract, which Congress does not choose to accept. That matter of contract is a matter of agreement between Congress and the State of Kansas. It is this: they propose to be admitted on a certain offer of contract. If we do not accept that offer of contract, while the constitution would be legal, while the constitution may be valid, while it may be just and proper, yet we cannot force them into the Union unless they agree to our terms, inasmuch as they propose their terms, to which we have never agreed; and this makes a plain simple proposition. I understood him to say—I may have been mistaken, for it is very hard to understand him from the low tone of voice in which he speaks—that the Lecompton constitution is submitted by this proposition. That is not my understanding of it. This is a matter of fact; and, if he so understands it, I can account why he stands upon the opposite side. If the Lecompton constitution is submitted, why is it that the great advocate of submitting the Lecompton constitution stands against it? He offered an amendment, urged it in this Senate, voted for it, which did submit the Lecompton constitution; and now, when a proposition comes which he says does submit the Lecompton constitution, he votes against it. Why does he cross his own path; why does he commit his own suicide; why does he act the inconsistent part of voting against a proposition which he says submits it, when he before voted for a proposition which did in fact submit it? It proves that it is not submitted; and that is a perversion of the issue when he asserts that the Lecompton constitution is submitted.

But, says the Senator, bribes are offered. Mr. President, I had not thought, in my confidence in the integrity of the people, that bribes could have any effect either in the Senate, in the Congress, or before the people—that they were proof against bribes. If bribes are offered in this proposition, it proves two things: first, that we misjudge the American character; second, that bribes have heretofore been offered by Congress to the people of the States under similar circumstances. I have a volume before me in which counter propositions have been presented when States have asked admission into the Union. Iowa, Florida, Michigan, and Missouri—four States—when they came up plainly and palpably, Congress did not refuse to admit them, but Congress said to them, "we will admit you if you agree to certain terms;" and hence there are four plain palpable propositions and precedents justifying us for the course we pursue in regard to Kansas.

But he says that if we pass this proposition, and the people of Kansas vote down the offer we make in it, Kansas is to be kept out until there is population sufficient to entitle her to admission. I answer, if she now has that population, as he intimates, it does not keep her out one minute. He intimates it as a conceded fact, that by the action of the report of the committee, and by the action of the opposite party in Kansas, it is acknowledged that they have population enough to entitle them to admission. If that be true, then this clause in the bill reported by the committee of conference does not keep Kansas out one second. Having the population already, she can proceed according to the forms of law, form that constitution, and come here and present herself for admission.

But the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADE] asks, is the land grant the great matter? I answer, it is the great matter of dispute with us. To the people of Kansas, the adoption of the constitution may be more important; the shape and form of the constitution may be more important; but to Congress, who has no right to look into the shape and form of the constitution, but has a right to protect the public lands, to protect our rights in all those questions affecting public lands, it is the great matter of compact between the Federal Government on the one side and the State upon the other. Hence I answer the Senator and say, that the subject of public lands is the great matter of adjustment. There is no other matter of adjustment between us. I have said from the beginning, and now repeat, that we have no right to look into their State constitution, except to see if it be republican. We have all decided it to be republican; it was enacted by legal authority; and hence that constitution is not a matter of controversy with us. But there is a matter of dispute: she asks a certain amount of land. We answer, in reply, "we cannot give it." Let us adjust that matter of dispute. There is no dispute on the subject of the constitution or its formation; but there is a dispute with regard to the quantity of land, and the rights asserted by the convention of the people of Kansas. Let us settle that, and thus have peace and quiet between the Federal Government and the new State about to be admitted into the bosom of the Union.

The difference in the grants has been stated. Five different demands were made by the convention. But let me remark that these demands are not made in the constitution of Kansas. They are made by the same power that formed the constitution, but are not made in the constitution. Hence the constitution may stand as an entirety, as a form of government, as creating a republic, and yet the proposition of adjustment on the disputed point be rejected by Congress. The bill which the Senate committee before reported, proposed to reject the demands of the convention of Kansas. While they proposed to reject the demands of the convention of Kansas, they also said it should not preclude Kansas from asking and receiving an equivalent hereafter equal to the principles of the grant to the State of Minnesota in the enabling act of that State.

The difference between the Senate bill and the present proposition consists in this: the Senate bill left it as an open question; this bill closes the question. It is agreement; it is settlement; it is compact. It may be said, and said with truth, that a voter in Kansas may be influenced by his desire not to be admitted into the Union; and, in consequence of that motive, may vote against the propositions offered on the subject of lands. Let him do it. That does not change the legal effect of the proposition we make, nor does it complicate Congress in any illegal act. Motive is a thing with which this Senate has nothing to do. When the voters go to the polls and vote, they vote from considerations appealing to themselves, and not merely to considerations that address themselves to us.

Now, the difference between the proposition claimed under that convention ordinance, which is no part of the constitution, but a distinct, independent offer of a contract, and the present offer of contract made by this report of the committee, consists in this: first, they claim four sections in each township for school purposes; we give them two sections in each township for school purposes. There is a difference on that point of one half. They claim all the salt springs, and the necessary lands for their use and enjoyment. We give that to them. They also claim all gold mines, silver mines, or any other mineral and necessary lands to sustain and support, and use and enjoy them. We cut all that out, which is at least two thirds. They claim five per centum upon the proceeds of the sales of the public lands. That has been given to all the States, and we accede to that. They claim two townships for a seminary of learning. That has been given to all the States, and we accede to that. They claim twelve miles wide on two railroads, making a distance of at

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 28, 1858.

NEW SERIES...No. 115.

least a thousand miles in length—twelve miles on a road running from east to west at least eight hundred miles, and on a road running from north to south at least two hundred and forty miles, making in the aggregate, in round numbers, one thousand miles; twelve miles in width. Any one may make the calculation and see what they can make out of it. The committee thought it exorbitant and unjust, and would not accede to it; hence we rejected it, and the statement accompanying the report made by the chairman in the House shows that the amount saved to the United States is $25,000,000.

It has, however, been said that the offer we do make is a bribe offered to them. When the Senator from Kentucky made the same offer in his amendment, was that a bribe? When the House of Representatives made the same offer, was that a bribe? Are the Senator from Kentucky and the House of Representatives to be charged with an attempt to bribe the people of Kansas? Not at all. They were honorable in their motives, as I believe the committee of conference to have been honorable in their motives when they made a similar proposition, with this difference: he proposed to submit the constitution of Kansas to a vote of the people; we do not. He proposed, if they voted down that constitution, then that they shall form a constitution on the same offer of bribery, as he now calls it, that we offer to them. The matter of contract on the subject of lands is a matter of adjustment between the new States and the old Federal Union. In all the States of this Union it has been a matter of adjustment.

The question whether the State has a right to tax the public lands has never yet been settled. It is an open question; and the most profound lawyers in this Government have differed upon the right of the State to tax or not to tax the lands belonging to the Federal Government. The State of Missouri surrendered the right to tax either Government lands, or the lands sold by the State for five years afterwards, for two considerations: first, under the principle of land sales then adopted they were not sold for cash, and the fee-simple title did not pass at the time of sale; they were purchased at two dollars an acre: one fifth cash, and the balance in four equal annual installments. That was the law of the land. In view of that here was a difficult point raised: shall the individual purchaser be liable to taxation to support the government, or shall he not? That brought up this question: if he is liable to be taxed on the value of the land, the State government must have the power to enforce the collection of that tax. If the State government has the power to enforce the collection of that tax, it must subject that land to sale in case of default. If you subject that land to sale in the case of default, then the purchaser, under that sale, must either get a valid title or be defeated in his title, because the fee-simple stands out, vested in the United States. That is what brought all this controversy about not taxing land for more than five years. I can say that Missouri for more than thirty years was not permitted to tax lands even after this mode of sale was changed to a cash sale. The consideration promised Missouri was five per cent. on the sales. She has to this day received but three per cent. Two per cent. was promised to be invested in a certain manner for the benefit of the State. That investment of two per cent. has never been made; and hence Missouri is now asking for it from the hands of the General Government.

I refer to this in this connection to show that this subject has always been a matter of contract, of agreement, of adjustment, between the new State and the Federal Government. So with Kansas. If the original Senate bill had passed it would have left this an open question. I was willing to vote for it, and did vote for it, although it left it an open question; and why? I regard the peace of the country as something; I regard the settlement of this question as important, and even if I do leave open some branch of the subject, if I can spread the mantle of peace over all, if I can harmonize all conflicting interests, if I can adjust all differences of opinion, if I can bring them all to the common altar of their country to pour out libations and join in one song of praise to the Union—I will do it, even if I leave some other subject unadjusted.

When, however, that failed, and the subject came before us to adjust the whole matter, I considered the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky with calm attention. I knew his wisdom and experience. I had the highest respect for his integrity, as I have yet. I saw a part in it which I was willing to incorporate, and that was, let us close up the whole question. I will not submit the constitution, for if I do that I stultify every act performed in the State of Kansas; but if it be desired to settle up the whole question, land grants, taxation, and all, I will take that much from the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky. We incorporated it and adjusted it in the best manner that we could. It may not be perfect, it may not meet his views, it may not be such as he approves; but still it was the best that we knew how to do. It leaves the people the power to come into the Union by accepting this proposition on the subject of lands, or not. We have no power to force them into the Union if they do not accept our proposition. We have no power to resubmit the constitution they adopted. Hence we do what we had the power to do, and we leave undone the things that we had no power to do.

I am aware that it has been said that the voting on the proposition has no relation to the real question to be decided. That is a great mistake. As I before remarked, individuals may have any motive in their mind they please. We cannot change their motives; we cannot destroy their object; we cannot make it legal. The Senator from New York [Mr. SEWARD] may laugh—that is all allowable—but I claim that we have the right to fix up a legal proposition, and if men vote on it from improper motives, we have no power to control them. If the Senator thinks we have, I differ with him on that subject. Motive lies in the human heart; motive is the principle that prompts to act; and if any man can influence motive except by addressing arguments to the judgment and to the feelings, it is a matter that I know nothing about. It is true I do not profess to be profound on the subject of all these questions of casuistry. I do not profess to understand the machinery and the organization of the human intellect, and the connection that exists between intellect and the feelings that are so closely allied to it. I am no metaphysician. I have not taken the first lesson on that subject; but whether it be a matter of metaphysics, of law, or of ethics, it is at least a question of right; and that is, to fix the opportunity for every man to do his duty, and then whether he is operated upon by an improper motive or a right motive, and does not do his duty, or does his duty, is a matter with which we have no concern.

There is, in this case, but one question submitted. I undertook to prove, on the Lecompton submission of the constitution, that there was but one question submitted then. I think I succeeded. The question submitted then, was slavery or no slavery. That was decided. I now undertake to prove that there is but one question submitted now; and that is, will you accept these propositions, or will you reject these propositions? The consequences that follow are entirely different. If you vote for these propositions, and a majority coincide with you, the whole question is settled; the State is admitted; if you vote against it, just the opposite.

Now, does that necessarily include the question of rejecting or accepting the constitution? By no means, for this plain, palpable, and simple reason: they have no power to vote on the acceptance or the rejection of the constitution. They have only the right to vote on that unadjusted subject. When the constitution was adopted, it was not proposed to Congress. I want Senators to remember this. When the constitution was adopted it was for the people of Kansas, and not for Congress; and Congress had no right to look into it, or to consider it, except to learn one point: is it republican? When the ordinance was adopted, it was intended for Congress. Will you accept it, or will you not accept the ordinance? The constitution was never so presented. Now, is there not a marked difference? Can any man fail to perceive the distinction between the two? The constitution of the State was adopted for the people of the State. The ordinance was adopted for submission to Congress, in the nature of an offer to make a contract. We do not choose to accept that offer of a contract, but choose to make a counter proposition. Now, when that counter proposition goes back they will vote upon it, and accept it or reject it. If they accept it, all right; if they reject it, then they are out of the Union. Because, therefore, the effect of it may be to keep her out of the Union, does that repudiate the Lecompton constitution? I answer, no, no!

I say more than that: it is a legal constitution, whether the State is admitted under it or not; and unless the State of Kansas chooses to change that constitution, either in or out of the Union, it will stand as the constitution of the State. There may be a State out of the Union as well as a State in the Union. Kansas cannot force herself into the Union. Kansas can form a State organization, and she can hold it ready whenever Congress shall be willing to receive her. Florida did the same thing. Florida formed her constitution. She was not received for five years after that constitution was formed, and still that constitution remained firm, inviolable, in existence; and when Florida did come into the Union she came in still with the original constitution. When you admit a State you do not indorse the constitution. When you admit a State you do not approve her constitution. Those words were employed in one instance out of the merest folly, and in the commission of the greatest blunder the Congress of the United States ever did commit in the admission of the State from which my friend on my left [Mr. STUART] hails—Michigan. He says perhaps they are not in. I answer, the State is in, because it has the assent of the Congress of the United States.

Let us come to the point, and understand each other. We are not here in a mere debating society. We are here to subserve the great interests of our country. We have different views upon what will subserve those interests. Let us meet together in the frankness and candor of honorable Senators, representing great States, equals in this Union. In that light, we meet not to controvert and discuss, but we meet to compare opinions, to present our reasons, to give our votes, and to rest upon our constituency for our defense and protection. In that light, this committee has acted. The result of that action is presented to the country. It presents no bribe; it dodges no question. It presents a plain, simple proposition for the consideration of the people of Kansas. When it is said that there is a threat held in terror over the heads of the people of Kansas, to force them to accept this proposition, the Senator from Ohio well answers that, for he says they cannot be intimidated; they cannot be driven; they cannot be bribed. If they cannot, why do you object? Now, answer me; if they can neither be bribed, intimidated, nor driven from their purpose, why not give them this opportunity to say whether they desire to accept these propositions, and thereby come into the Union, or not?

I have said, Mr. President, what I have said, for the purpose only of vindicating the committee from any reflection upon their motives. They may be wrong in judgment. I do not pretend to set up the result of their consideration, their report, as being beyond the power of attack; but I did think that the Senator from Ohio, and the Senator from Kentucky, had misconceived what the object of the committee was, and therefore it was our duty to make a correction. My colleague on the committee, the Senator from Virginia, had made one correction; but subsequent remarks had induced me to think that a further correction was required. I have done it; I have given my views upon it. It is before the Senate; it is before the country. If I am wrong, I am willing to be set right; if I do injustice to any one, I will take speedy means to do justice; if I do right, I trust I shall never be driven from that position.

Mr. SEWARD obtained the floor.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I trust I shall be allowed one word of explanation.

Mr. SEWARD. Certainly; I yield the floor.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. My friend from Virginia, in whose candor and fairness in argument I have great confidence, has mistaken me in one particular. He supposed me to endeavor to criminate this offer of land as an inducement to them to vote for this proposition, because it was a greater quantity than that usually granted. He misunderstood me. I did not intend to say any such thing; I said it was the largest quantity of land grants, but I afterwards followed it up by saying that it was what was habitually granted to other States. So he misunderstood me in supposing that I either thought or said that the quantity of land offered to Kansas for her to accept the Lecompton constitution was greater or more than that which was usually given to other States.

The gentleman seemed also to suppose, if I understood him, that the course I was pursuing was calculated to produce or prolong this Kansas agitation. It seems to me, Mr. President, that my friend from Virginia ought not lightly, though it is perfectly in order, to say that a Senator's course is calculated to produce agitation. I think that the report of the committee is calculated to produce and prolong the difficulty. That is my opinion, and that is the reason why I vote against it. It provides no certain determination of our relations with Kansas. It reminds her, in a certain event, to a territorial condition, and that event amounts, in my mind, almost to a certainty; and by so doing, it leaves her exactly in the attitude and condition in which she has been, subject to create such extensive agitation as she has in the country.

My policy, and the policy indicated in the amendment which I had the honor to offer here, was to close up this subject inevitably; that if, the Lecompton constitution being submitted to the people, they would not accept that, then they should make a constitution that would be acceptable to them, and there would be an end of it. It was contemplated, in a continuous series of the most active operations that were possible, to bring her into the Union at once, and thereby put an end to the disturbing relations which exist between her and this Government. That is what my amendment provides. This does not do that. This says, if she rejects the Lecompton constitution, instead of going on to make another and closing up the matter, that she shall be postponed until her population shall be of a certain amount. I hope he will understand me in that particular.

Sir, I had intended to correct, or attempt to offer some explanation and have some correction with the honorable Senator from Missouri, [Mr. GREEN,] but I hardly know whether it is necessary. It was my misfortune, he says, not to be heard, on account of the lowliness of my voice. What I said, taken altogether, sustained this position in my narrative: that the ground in respect to the Lecompton constitution taken by this Senate, has been abandoned by its friends; and, for brevity of expression, I may have said occasionally, but with the explanation that went along with it, that the Lecompton constitution has been abandoned—every Senator understanding me as meaning that the position of the Senate in reference to it, insisting upon it as an absolute constitution, not to be referred to the people, was abandoned. The gentleman did not hear and did not understand me correctly. All must have understood me who did hear me. It was my misfortune not to be heard by the honorable Senator.

I am really at a loss to understand, but I do not know whether it is necessary to inquire further into it, what he meant by the allusion about "Kentucky climbers." I am really at a loss to understand what these classical figures and allusions mean. I hope they do not mean anything unkind. If they did so, the gentleman will pardon me for not replying to them. If they were meant for my State, why, I do not know that I have a word to say about it. I have never, in all my time in this Senate, permitted myself to cast the least reflection upon any State of this Union.

I look upon them in reality, and try to treat them habitually, as sovereignties which are represented here. I do not know whether the gentleman meant anything offensive to Kentucky, or to reflect upon her character. If he did, it was exceedingly unkind. I have nothing to say on the subject. I do not know that it merits or is worthy of any explanation whatever. Old Kentucky stands there for herself. She is above the taunts that envy may cast upon her, however humble and inadequate her representative may perhaps be to the subject. She never can—

Mr. GREEN. If the Senator will permit me to interrupt him, I will state that I meant nothing unkind either to the Senator or his State.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I thought the Senator did not. He meant nothing unkind, if I understand the gentleman, and he cast no imputation upon her. Then, sir, it is only that curious and mysterious sort of figure of speech which I do not understand. [Laughter.] I have nothing more to say.

Mr. SEWARD. Has the honorable Senator closed his remarks?

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SEWARD. Then I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. STUART. I simply wish to say that I desire to speak upon this question in the present order, but I am subject entirely to the disposition of the Senate as to whether I am to go on now or to-morrow.

Mr. SEWARD. I rose not with the intention of taking the floor myself; but, seeing the honorable Senator from Michigan rise to take the floor, while I recognized his right to it, I thought it was time to adjourn.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Let us go on now. Gentlemen are ready to continue the discussion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. BIGGS in the chair.) The Chair recognized the Senator from New York, and the question is on the motion he has submitted that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HUNTER. If it is understood that we shall finish this question to-morrow evening or to-morrow night, I am perfectly willing to adjourn now.

Mr. SEWARD. I will answer the Senator from Virginia at once. It cannot be understood that we shall finish the question to-morrow night, but it may be understood that we are debating in good faith, without the least design to delay, and if we can reach the question then, it will be closed to-morrow night; if not, not. I wish to say also that we have been four hours and a half upon this subject to-day; and for one, I do not admit the right of the majority to require us to make contracts to foreclose this debate, especially when they themselves are taking their share in it, and making it necessary for us to reply to them. I therefore insist on my motion to adjourn.

Mr. IVERSON. I call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BELL. I wish to state that I have paired off with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. PEARCE] on this subject. I improperly voted yesterday, having forgotten that engagement; but it was upon no material question.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The honorable Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BENJAMIN] and myself have paired off on this matter for this evening.

The result was then announced—yeas 22, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Brodenick, Brown, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Crittenden, Dixon, Douglas, Durkee, Fessenden, Foster, Hamlin, Harlan, Houston, Kennedy, King, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Tumbull, Wade, and Wilson—22.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Biggs, Bigler, Bright, Clay, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gwin, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Slidell, Toombs, Wright, and Yulee—23.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. SEWARD. I now move that the further consideration of this subject be postponed until to-morrow at half past twelve o'clock, and be made the special order for that hour.

Mr. IVERSON. I ask for the yeas and nays upon that question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STUART. I do not wish to detain the Senate at this time. I only wish to say that it seems to me hardly necessary to spend any time here to-night in a mere matter of controversy. I have yielded, from time to time, to-day, to several Senators who desired to speak, and am disposed to do so at any and at all times. I simply want, in good faith and in due time, to present my views upon this subject. I understand there are others who also desire to do so. The debate has gone on to-day by the friends and the opponents of this measure. We have sat here now until nearly five o'clock. I simply suggest whether it would not be more reasonable to adjourn this question over until to-morrow, and not seek to press it until it is found that there is a disposition to retard it. As far as I am concerned, I only wish to disclaim any such disposition on my part. I do not know of any member of the body who has any such disposition. I submit, therefore, whether it is better to spend any number of hours in efforts to postpone and prevent a postponement, which every Senator knows may be done, or whether it is better now to come to the conclusion to dispose of this question, and adjourn over until to-morrow.

I submit, with great respect, to the Senate, and I beg to repeat it again, not to be misunderstood, that it seems to me better for all of us to pursue that course at this time. So far as I am concerned personally in the question, I only say that I am at the pleasure of the Senate. Of course, it would be more convenient to me to speak to-morrow morning, when the Senate and myself are less fatigued; but, upon that score, I do not think that I am in a condition where I ought to ask the especial indulgence of the Senate. I do not, therefore, put it upon that ground. While I say that it would be inconvenient to me, yet I would be entirely willing to go on now, if there was anything in the condition of the question which required me to do so.

Mr. HUNTER. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. STUART. Certainly.

Mr. HUNTER. The Senator knows that I agreed to adjourn, and was perfectly willing to do so; but it was understood last night—at least I so understood the Senator from New Hampshire, when he made the proposition to postpone this subject over until to-day—that its consideration would take two days. All I ask is, an assurance from both sides of the House that we shall be able to dispose of it to-morrow. I am perfectly willing then to adjourn or postpone it.

Mr. STUART. I have no doubt of the Senator's motives and intentions, but I know nothing of such an arrangement. I will call the attention of the Senator to what was said at that time. When that proposition was made, several Senators all over the Chamber exclaimed, "Thursday!" "Thursday!" Some said Wednesday, and some Thursday. There seemed to be, to my ear, no understanding. I know of no private arrangement.

Mr. HUNTER. I know of no private arrangement, but I understood the Senator from New Hampshire to submit a proposition to take two days to this subject. He proposed that we postpone it until Wednesday, and dispose of it on Thursday night; or, if we should take it up to-day, to dispose of it to-morrow night. I am not disposed to press Senators.

Mr. STUART. I believe that will be the result now. If the Senate adjourns, there will be no difficulty. Every Senator can say all he desires to say to-morrow. That is my belief; but I am not advised on that point.

Mr. HUNTER. There will be no difficulty, if there is an understanding that Senators will aid us to do it.

Mr. STUART. I certainly will.

Mr. HUNTER. Then I will agree to postpone this subject until half past twelve o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. SEWARD. I want it to be understood that that is an understanding between the honorable gentlemen, and not an understanding between anybody else. I have already stated, so far as I am concerned, that I believed this debate was in good faith; that I thought it might come to an end as likely to-morrow as at any other time, but that I would come to no engagement. What I object to is that terms shall be dictated to us, which, it seems to me, we cannot accept with self-respect, and which ought not to be made when every demonstration is given on our part of good faith.

Mr. CLARK. I desire to make one suggestion in regard to this matter. I think it will be recollected by honorable Senators that the proposition was made last night to defer this subject until Wednesday, to take two days for discussion, and then close the debate. That was not acceded to; it was not acceptable. Then the proposition was made that we should adjourn until to-day, that we should go on fairly and candidly without factious delay, and close the debate in the ordinary way. That we are disposed to do now. We think we have worked as long to-day as we ordinarily do. I think I may say, in behalf of gentlemen on this side of the Chamber, that they are willing to go on debating the matter fairly, honorably, and as Senators ought to do, and then close the debate, and take the vote; and that is all they ought to be required to do. If the debate can close to-morrow afternoon, we are willing to take the vote to-morrow night or the day after, and to close the debate without faction or unnecessary delay. That is all that ought to be required of us.

Mr. GREEN. I do not think the Senator from New York ought to say that we dictate to them. It is a matter of adjustment, a matter of agreement. When we propose a certain time, is it dictation? Why, a minority may propose to a majority, and it is no dictation; or a majority may propose to a minority, and it is no dictation. But we desire to get rid of this question; he may not. When we make a certain proposition, I do not wish him to characterize it before the country as a dictation; and when he does thus characterize it, I choose to contradict him, and say that, so far as we are concerned, it is not correct. If I understand it, we do not. It is an offer. The question is, can we accede to it consistently with public duty? I answer, there is not a single Senator on this side who would have a single Senator on the other side to sacrifice his opinions of duty for the sake of expediting this one thing; but, if we can, we should like to have it closed at once.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have not had the remotest intention of taking any part in this debate, and I have not now; and I suppose there are not many gentlemen on our side of the Chamber who do intend to take part in it; still I will not pledge myself that at some period of the debate I may not be excited, or incited, to take some interest in it, although such is not my intention now. But I am surprised that the honorable Senator from Virginia, who knows that I have great respect for him, should take part in what I cannot help calling the imposition of unreasonable terms. I do not like this thing in the Senate; and I am rather inclined to come to the opinion of the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. TOOMBS,] that it is best to put an end to all attempts at making bargains, unless we can have them in the old customary form—the form which is respectful and kind to both sides of the Chamber. Then, sir, when a debate arose, I believe it has been customary heretofore—I came here in the middle of the famous Kansas debate, and I know what it was then—to give the largest liberty to gentlemen with regard, not only to the time that they themselves would occupy in speaking, but to the time of speaking. So long as there was no disposition manifested to protract the time—to spin it out for the purpose of making delay—the old, ordinary, gentlemanly, proper rule of the Senate was adhered to; and that was, that every gentleman should have a right to speak, at a proper season of the day, upon the question of interest before the Senate. That rule ought to exist now.

All I ask of the majority is, not that they shall yield anything to any disposition to talk for the mere purpose of protracting debate, talking against time; but that they shall yield everything to the minority, so long as that disposition is not exhibited at all. I would ask Senators, has there been, on the part of the minority, exhibited, on this occasion, any sort of disposition to talk for the mere purpose of stretching out the period of debate? Until that takes place, I say it does not comport with the dignity of the Senate to tell us here, "if you will agree to close the debate to-morrow, we will let you adjourn; if you will not agree to get through, whatever you may want to say, and honestly want to say at that time, then you shall stay and talk to-night, at this hour." That might do in some bodies, in some associations, and from some people; and in other associations, and from other people, it ought not to come at all, in my judgment; but that every man on the floor, until that disposition is manifested, should be considered as having a proper view to the interests of the country, and what is demanded, a proper respect to himself, and a proper respect to the body of which he is a member; and the largest liberty should be accorded to him so long as he keeps nothing but propriety in view. Therefore, under this impression, all I have to say is, that in the present stage of the discussion, I will not be considered as agreeing to finish the debate to-morrow, although I do not think I shall have a word to say on the subject.

Mr. HUNTER. I made no attempt to dictate terms to the minority or any one else. I have never known a debate of this sort closed except by mutual agreement, which was all I proposed. I do not insist that gentlemen shall agree on terms which would be inexorable; but if there is a mutual understanding to close the debate as soon as it could be done consistently with what was due on all sides, and it was thought probable that we should close it to-morrow, I was willing to adjourn now; but if not, in my opinion we ought to devote a larger portion of the day than usual in these matters, if we are going to adjourn in June. If gentlemen will postpone the day of final adjournment, they may go on. I shall not object if they debate it for a week, if they do that. But if you are to adjourn in June, you cannot give a week to this subject and get through the necessary business of the country. You first adopt an inexorable rule to adjourn at a certain time in June; and then, when I make an effort to distribute the time among the different subjects so as to enable us to accomplish the greatest amount of business, gentlemen say I am dictating terms! I seek to dictate to nobody. I suggested this as an agreement into which all parties might enter. Why not?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I would ask the Senator in all kindness, whether it is not dictation, offensive dictation, to say, "if we can understand that the debate is to be closed at such an hour, very well, we will adjourn; if not, we will go on?"

Mr. HUNTER. I think not.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It looks very much like it.

Mr. HUNTER. The meaning of it is this: we will adjourn now, provided we can get through the matter at that time; but if the debate is to take a longer time, we must spend a larger portion of the day on the subject. I think that is very fair.

Mr. TOOMBS. I wish simply to say, in answer to my friend from Virginia, that he is now making a proposition which I shall not agree to. Both Houses have agreed to adjourn in June, and we have plenty of time to do our business. I do not concur at all in the parliamentary idea of the Senator from Maine, about dictation. It is a right, a duty of every deliberative assembly; they are invested with full authority to stop debate when they please. In every body except this that rule is applied. I think it is a misfortune that by our rules we cannot apply it now; it ought to be remedied, and I hope will be very soon. The other branch of the Congress of the United States who have equal powers and duties with ourselves, lay down an inexorable rule, that, whenever they choose or think proper, debate must stop.

Mr. BELL. Try it in the Senate.

Mr. TOOMBS. It is a rule which ought to be applied here, and the Senator ought to have it applied to him, in my judgment. It is the rule of nearly all legislative bodies; it may be different in some. In the British Parliament they have not such a rule, but they cough down and scrape down and ironically cheer down anybody whom they do not want to hear, and they can close their debates whenever they desire to do so.

Therefore I am a party to none of these arrangements. So far as I am concerned I want no more debate. I am willing to sit here, season in and season out, until this vote is taken. That is the only way in this body in which a vote can be taken. I have rarely known an important question taken here without having a night session. I have sat in the other branch for two nights and a day in order to take a vote. It has been the common practice to make gentlemen speak day and night, and it has been considered no great hardship by any one. This thing of making gentlemen speak in hours and out of hours has been the practice ever since I have been in the Congress of the United States, and nobody considered it a hardship. This new idea that gentlemen shall speak in proper hours, by which, I suppose, is meant between one o'clock and five o'clock, to get the galleries, is a novelty belonging to this session and the Republican party. It has not been according to the usages or practice of either branch of this Government, from its commencement until now. Gentlemen have spoken night and day, in season and out of season, in the other branch, when they please to apply this rule. On account of there being no disposition in this body to resort to means to obstruct legislation, the rule never having been necessary until now, it was never adopted here. Now it is necessary; and, in my judgment as a public man, it ought to be adopted, so that the business of the country may be placed in the power of the majority, in whose hands the Constitution places it.

Mr. MASON. I wish to say that I dissent altogether from the position taken by the honorable Senator from Georgia, that it is right in a majority to put a stop to debate at their pleasure when the majority think the public interests require it. I dissent altogether from the idea that it would be politic or prudent in this body, which is a representation of the States, to adopt that rule to which reference was made by which debate would be cut off at the pleasure of a majority of the body. For one, I have always protested against it since I have been a member of this Senate, and always shall protest against it. Sir, in a popular Government, where the Government is to be administered as the people desire it shall be administered, it is important that the people shall know how the Government operates through a majority, and I would be the last man to take any steps whatever to put a stop to debate in the Senate of the United States. Yet upon this particular question I should agree with my colleague. We have our time measured now by a law passed by the present Congress for the termination of the session; and in the distribution of the time of the Senate, and a reference to the many subjects that will come before it, it seems to me right that the debate shall go on unless honorable Senators on that side of the Chamber, to whom, I presume, it would be chiefly confined, should believe, of which they are the best judges, that they can close it to-morrow, or perhaps the next day. As a matter of expediency only, but with no desire to stop debate upon it, I have been obliged to vote against an adjournment; but I will leave it to them within a reasonable time.

Mr. SEWARD. That is all I asked. I supposed it would go no further than that.

Mr. CLARK. I desire to make one suggestion to the honorable Senator from Virginia. I think this side of the Chamber appreciate as much as he does the position in which we stand. I think we are all aware that we are to adjourn on the 7th day of June. I do not think that that side of the Chamber is any more anxious to do it than this side of the Chamber. If they will trust to our judgment, candor, and fairness, I have no sort of doubt, if the matter was left to us, an adjournment would be had; everybody would consult the public good, and this debate would be brought to a close as soon as it could conveniently be done, and the whole business of the country would be going along. But if they insist on staying, and will not give any further time, and should say we will close the debate to-morrow, it will enlist the pride of this side of the Senate that you shall not close it to-morrow night, and delay would come on a collateral issue instead of meeting the question fairly. They are in the majority. Let them exhibit magnanimity towards us; allow gentlemen to go on; treat us with candor and liberality, and if we do not meet you half way, then you can try the crushing-out process if you think proper.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It seems to me that we are wasting time, instead of gaining, by this process. We have had, during the last few weeks, several discussions of this kind, as to arrangements between one side of the Chamber and the other. Now, it has been said on this side, I believe, by every Senator who has spoken, that there is no disposition to delay this matter. So far as I know anything about it, that is true. We have lost, now, half an hour in this profitless discussion; and if we adjourn and meet at the ordinary hour to-morrow, I can only give my opinion, but it is certainly my opinion, that this matter will be settled quite as soon as it will be to sit here through the whole night. I apprehend the debate will be closed to-morrow. So far as I know anything about it, there are very few persons here who design taking up any considerable time in discussing this matter; but, as a matter of course, no individual Senator can say how many persons will speak upon either side, nor can we anticipate the time the discussion will take. There is no attempt, and no desire to delay this thing a moment. For my own part, I am ready to vote now unless there are persons who wish to speak. If there are, I will be for giving them a chance. This is, I believe, in good faith, the understanding of every Senator. Then why not let us adjourn, meet here to-morrow, and go on with business? It seems to me that this is the quickest way of getting at the question.

Mr. HUNTER. That is what I proposed—that gentlemen should say, on all sides, that they would endeavor to bring the debate to a close to-morrow, if they could; and if they could not, I did not ask any Senator—

Mr. TRUMBULL. I only wish to say to the Senator, that I do not propose to delay it; nor do I know of anybody who desires to do so. I am certain there is no combination to do so. If there was, I think I should have heard of it. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Several SENATORS. There is a motion pending.

Mr. BIGLER. I hope the Senator will withdraw it for a moment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I withdraw that motion, and move to postpone the further consideration of this subject until to-morrow.

Mr. GREEN. And make it the special order for half past twelve o'clock.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, sir, and that it be made the special order for half past twelve o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. IVERSON. I rise to a point of order. No motion is in order until the motion made by the Senator from New York, upon which the yeas and nays are ordered, shall be disposed of.

Mr. TRUMBULL. A motion to adjourn would be in order at any time, I apprehend; but I will not insist upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New York, that the further consideration of this subject be postponed to, and made the special order for, half past twelve o'clock to-morrow.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 35, nays 10; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bell, Bigler, Broderick, Brown, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Clay, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Douglas, Durkee, Evans, Fossenden, Fitzpatrick, Foot, Foster, Gwin, Harlan, Houston, Hunter, Jones, Kennedy, King, Polk, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Trumbull, Wade, Wilson, and Yates—35.

NAYS—Messrs. Biggs, Bright, Green, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Mallory, Mason, Toombs, and Wright—10.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. KING. Oh! no; let us adjourn.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. It is proper that we should have an executive session. The Senator from New York knows nothing about the business for which it is desired. It will not take more than five minutes.

Mr. KING. A motion to adjourn has been made.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. It is important to the public business that we should have an executive session now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Michigan that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I hope that the Senate will not adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, April 27, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

BANKS IN THE UNITED STATES.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a report as to the condition of the banks of the United States, in compliance with the resolution of the House of the 20th July, 1832.

Mr. LETCHER. I move that two thousand extra copies of that report be printed for the use of the Treasury Department. I understand that this information is furnished voluntarily by the banks to the Treasury Department. Heretofore the number printed has been twenty-five hundred, but the Secretary of the Treasury says that two thousand will be sufficient to answer his purpose.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Virginia, under the rules, goes to the Committee on Printing.

WAGON ROAD TO THE COLORADO.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the War Department, in reply to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 20th instant, calling for a copy of the report of the exploration of the wagon road from Fort Defiance to the Colorado river, in the Territory of New Mexico, with a map of said route, by Edward F. Beall, stating that no such report or map had been received; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

POST OFFICE ADVERTISEMENTS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Postmaster General in reference to post office advertisements in newspapers; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

LIEUTENANT MAURY.

Mr. FENTON, by unanimous consent, presented the concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of New York in relation to Lieutenant Maury, of the United States Navy; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

FORT SNELLING REPORT.

Mr. PETTIT. I rise to a question of privilege. My purpose, in rising, is to make a report which, by the consent of the House, is allowed to be made at any time. I am directed by the committee appointed by the House to inquire into the facts and circumstances connected with the sale of the Fort Snelling reservation to make a report, accompanied by resolutions adopted by the committee, the evidence taken by the committee, and its journal of proceedings.

Before submitting the report in reference to it, and moving the action of the House on it, I may be allowed to say that the committee has not been fortunate in coming to a unanimous agreement in facts or conclusions. I wish to say, therefore, that I bring in this report, at this time, with the entire concurrence of the committee. The minority of the committee, consisting of its chairman, the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BURNETT], and his associate from the Berkeley district of Virginia, [Mr. FAULKNER], will, I understand, shortly present a report. My purpose, at the instance of the entire committee, is to move that the report be laid on the table, be printed, and made a special order in this House for Tuesday, the 18th day of May next.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I shall object to its being made a special order. I am willing that the report shall be made, and take its course in the regular order of business.

Mr. GROW. I rise to a question of order. I am not informed as to what action this committee propose to report, but if it involves any member of this House, then I make the same point of order made by me in the last session, that they have not the right to report, because if, in their investigation, a member is involved, they must come into the House and ask the permission of the House to proceed.

Mr. PETTIT. I can obviate the objection made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania by stating that there is nothing in the report of this committee implicating any person connected with either branch of Congress.

Mr. GROW. Then I withdraw my point of order.

Mr. BURNETT. I ask that the views of the minority may also be received, and take the same course with the report of the majority. The objection made by the gentleman from North Carolina to this report being made a special order, he will see, by an examination of the resolution under which the committee have been acting, does not apply. The committee have the right to report, and to call it up at any time.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Then I cannot prevent it. If I could prevent it I would.

The SPEAKER. A simple motion to postpone to the time indicated will bring the matter up at that time.

Mr. PETTIT. Then I make the motion that the report be postponed until Tuesday, the 18th day of May next, and that the report of the majority and views of the minority be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PETTIT. I am also directed by that committee to offer this resolution:

Resolved, That the compensation of stenographers employed by committees under the authority of the House, be paid, as audited by the Committee of Accounts.

I ask for the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I think it would be better to fix some price by the House. All the resolutions appointing stenographers or giving authority for their employment, have provided that they should be paid the usual compensation. If there has been any usual rate of compensation adopted, I am not aware of it.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The Committee of Accounts will fix it.

Mr. BURNETT. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee that the committee, or myself, at least, were governed in their action in fixing the compensation to be paid, by the price paid to the reporters of the Globe for reporting the proceedings of the House. We followed that rule, supposing that it was right, and that it would meet the approval of the House; and I now move the previous question.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Before the gentleman does that, I desire to ask him what he proposes under that construction?

Mr. BURNETT. I do not remember.

Mr. HOUSTON. If the gentleman from Indiana will modify the resolution, I think it will be better. Let him modify it so as to specify the amount.

Mr. SEWARD. I move to lay the resolution on the table. I do not think this House has any right to make an appropriation without fixing the specific amount to be appropriated.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky has demanded the previous question.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I desire to ask the chairman of this committee what amount he certified to the stenographer of his committee?

Mr. BURNETT. The committee employed two stenographers for nearly the whole time. The amount which we indorsed to them for their services as stenographers was $1,010.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I hope the demand for the previous question will be sustained, because if we are to go into a discussion over the matter, it will cost more than the whole amount involved.

Mr. SEWARD. If the gentleman will insert in the resolution the particular sum which the committee have allowed, I will withdraw my motion; otherwise I will insist upon it. I do not think the House have the right to appropriate money in this indefinite way.

Mr. PETTIT. I ask the gentleman to withdraw his motion for a moment, to enable me to make an explanation.

Mr. SEWARD. I will withdraw the motion to lay upon the table if the amount to be paid is inserted in the resolution.

The motion to lay upon the table was disagreed to.

The call for the previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I demand the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, only seven members voting therefor.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. BURNETT moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. HUGHES obtained the floor, but yielded to

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The gentleman from Indiana yields to me for a moment. I have in my hand three appropriation bills; and, as the Committee of Ways and Means may not be called for a week, I ask that, by unanimous consent, they may now be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I am compelled reluctantly to object to the gentleman's proposition. We are now in the fifth month of the session, and the Committee of Ways and Means have already used up most of our time, and have objected to the other committees being called in their order. I am a member of a committee which has not been called during the session.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I beg to be distinctly understood that I have never objected to a call of the committees of the House.

Mr. CLINGMAN. The objection was made by the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union immediately after the Journal was read, so that the committees could not be called.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The Committee of Ways and Means have not consumed an undue share of the time of this House, nor has its chairman opposed the call of committees for reports at any time.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, I wish to bring before the House a matter of privilege.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana has the floor on a question of privilege.

Mr. HUGHES. I will say just here that I hope there will not be an attempt to clamor me down when I rise to a question of privilege. I am in order, and I intend to remain in order; and I cannot be heard in this House if this system of clamoring against me is kept up. I offer a resolution to censure a member of this House, which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas, FRANCIS E. SPINNER, a member of this House from the State of New York, did, on the 26th day of April instant, propose to offer for the consideration and action of the House a preamble and resolution which was ruled out of order by the Speaker, and which was of the following tenor, to wit:

"Whereas, The Burlington Hawkeye, a newspaper, published in the State of Iowa, has recently published the following article, written from Council Bluffs, in relation to the land sales at that place, viz:

"During the second week, after the office had opened, an order was received from Mr. Commissioner Hendricks, at Washington, to locate six thousand (6,000) acres in the name of the honorable Jesse D. Bright, of Indiana. Of course the order was complied with, out of the regular office hours, and thus the honorable Senator got a nice slice of the public land at a single haul, while the rest of us had to take our turn at the mill as the wheel rolled round. Wonder if the peculiar position which Senator Bright occupies towards the Administration had anything to do with this piece of party favoritism? Was it any part of the price paid for his support of the Lecompton constitution?"

"And whereas, the 'Weekly Council Bluffs Bugle,' a newspaper published at Council Bluffs, in said State, under date of April 14, 1858, published the following article, viz:

"PARTY FAVORITISM.—A correspondent in the Burlington Hawk Eye, speaks of a 'recent piece of party favoritism,' and alleges that it was connived at by the 'powers that be,' at Washington. The correspondent was nearly correct as to the amount of land entered, but is sadly at fault as to the person entering the same. Six thousand and two hundred acres were entered in one day, in the names of Jesse D. Bright, William H. English, and James B. Foley. Bright entered two thousand four hundred and eighty, English, two thousand two hundred and eighty, and Foley one thousand four hundred and forty acres. The entries were made under instructions from the Commissioner of the General Land Office."

"The writer insinuates that the allowance of the entry was the price paid for Bright's vote, in favor of the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution; but his base insinuation will lose all its force when it is known that English and Foley voted against the admission. The correspondent must place a very high price upon western lands, or a low estimate upon the honor and integrity of the President and Senators. This is a little too low an insinuation to come from any citizen of Council Bluffs, the whang-doodle of the Black Republican party only excepted."

"Therefore
"Be it resolved, That a committee of five be appointed to investigate the matter, and to inquire into the facts and circumstances connected with the order of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, whereby the Hon. JESSE D. BRIGHT, and the Hon. WILLIAM H. ENGLISH and the Hon. JAMES B. FOLEY were permitted to enter about six thousand acres of land at the Council Bluffs land office, and into the facts and circumstances connected with said entry; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers, and to report by bill or otherwise."

And whereas said preamble and resolution reflect upon the integrity and characters respectively of a member of the Senate, and two members of the House, without containing any charge or matter proper for the action or consideration of the House: Therefore

Resolved, That the offer to introduce said preamble and resolution was a breach of the privilege, order, and decorum of the House, and that the said FRANCIS E. SPINNER, is hereby censured for the same.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. HUGHES took the floor.

Mr. CAMPBELL. If the gentleman from Indiana desires to be heard, I will withdraw my point of order for the present. It strikes me, however, that this whole thing is a matter of newspaper controversy. Very many Senators and members of this House have been abused through the public press, and I do not think that it is proper to take up the time of the House with such censures or strictures of the press. I withdraw my point of order.

Mr. HUGHES. I am obliged to the gentleman for withdrawing his point of order; but I have not seen any point in his point of order. He made no point.

Mr. Speaker, I would have preferred to say what I have to say upon this subject, without the introduction of a formal resolution; but the privilege of making a very short explanation, which was due to a Senator from my own State, was denied me, when the attempt was made yesterday, by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SPINNER,] to introduce his resolution.

I have no reason to believe, and have had none, that I would be permitted to vindicate his character against this attack, except by bringing myself strictly within the rules of the House; and therefore I have introduced this resolution, which I propose to press now, and to ask a vote upon.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I rise to a question of order. The resolution does not raise a question of privilege. If every member of this House who is abused, or who imagines that a Senator from his State is vilified through the public press of this country, is to be allowed to make a question of privilege here upon it, we shall have nothing but questions of privilege before us.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio to the language of the resolution:

"Therefore, resolved, That the offer to introduce said preamble and resolution was a breach of the privilege, order, and decorum of the House, and that the said FRANCIS E. SPINNER is hereby censured for the same."

The Chair is of opinion that it is a question of privilege, inasmuch as it proposes to censure a member of the House.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Very well; then it is open to debate.

Mr. HUGHES. I was saying, sir, that having been driven to the necessity of introducing this resolution by the unjustifiable attack that has been made, not only upon a Senator, but upon a public officer from the State of Indiana [Mr. Hendricks] not entitled to be heard upon this floor, I expect to press this resolution to a vote. And I believe that when all the facts and circumstances attending this matter, which I apprehend are susceptible of proof, shall be brought before the House, this resolution will pass by a sufficient majority to place upon the record an emphatic condemnation of this House against the practice of embodying in the form of its official proceedings the newspaper slanders of the day. And I do not think, sir, that the character of the Senator from Indiana, or of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, a citizen of Indiana, or of the members of this House, from Indiana, who are impugned in the resolution which the gentleman from New York proposed to introduce, important as they are and should be, are yet of as high importance as the dignity and character of this House itself.

This resolution appeals to the House, not only to repel unjustifiable and malicious assaults upon Senators, public functionaries, and members of the House, but calls upon the House to maintain its own dignity and its own character, and to set the seal of its condemnation upon the abuse of the privileges of this floor by embodying, in the form of official proceedings, scandalous and false matter, and thus giving it an importance which it intrinsically does not possess.

Mr. SPINNER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him if he denies the facts stated in the resolution?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield the floor to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. HUGHES. I will answer the gentleman before I have done. I have hardly ever declined to yield the floor to a gentleman who appeals to me for that purpose; but when I proposed to make a simple explanation of this matter yesterday, a unanimous shout of "order," from that side of the House, clamored me down; and I now decline, when I am in order, to yield the floor to any of those gentlemen who indulge in that sort of amusement.

I came into the Hall yesterday shortly after that part of the resolution which related to the Senator from Indiana had been read. The rest of the resolution was not read at all. And I did not know that any reference was contained in that resolution to my two colleagues from Indiana, [Messrs. FOLEY and ENGLISH.] If I had, I should not have proposed to say anything. But, being informed that the Senator from that State was assailed—a gentleman who had not the right to be heard in this House—I asked permission simply to make an explanation. It was denied me. Those who made the attack objected. I propose now, so far as my colleagues, Messrs. ENGLISH and FOLEY, are concerned, to leave that matter entirely to themselves. They are here upon the floor, and can, and no doubt will, defend themselves.

I desire to make an explanation, which will show that the whole of this newspaper matter, which was, I suppose, here under pretense of getting up a committee of investigation, is upon its face false and scandalous, because it is founded in ignorance of a public statute of this country, which every man is bound to know. That statute is as follows:

"Provided further, That it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, to cause to be located, free of any expense, any warrant which the holder may transmit to the General Land Office for that purpose, in such State and land district as the said holder or warrantee may designate, and upon good farming land, so far as the same can be ascertained from the maps, plats, and field-notes of the surveyor, or from any other information in the possession of the local office; and, upon the location being made as aforesaid, the Secretary shall cause a patent to be transmitted to such warrantee."

And the land warrants which are issued by the Government show upon their face that they may be located here in Washington city, in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, just as well as in the land offices of the different States. The Senator from Indiana, in conjunction with two members of this House, it appears, saw proper to take their money, and the money of some of their constituents given to them for that purpose, and invest it in land warrants for the benefit of themselves and others, and saw proper, instead of traveling to the State of Iowa, or any other State, to locate those land warrants, to avail themselves of this public statute of the country, and went to the Land Office here to make their locations; and in pursuance of the law, in pursuance of its express requirement, the Commissioner of the General Land Office, an appointee also from the State of Indiana, caused the land entries to be made. That is the whole thing out of which this whole matter has been manufactured.

Now, sir, the gentleman from New York, who proposed to introduce that resolution, was bound to know the law and cannot plead ignorance of it, for "ignorance of the law excuseth no man;" and I presume, sir, no gentleman of sufficient character in this country to be honored by any constituency with a seat upon this floor, would rise in his place here and plead ignorance of a public act of the Congress of the United States. Out of this matter has been manufactured this newspaper attack; and I have offered this resolution proposing upon its face action of this House because it was necessary, in order to bring what I wish to say within the rules. I have no objection that the resolution shall be referred to a committee who shall have power to investigate both the charge which is made by the gentleman from New York and the charge which is made against him. I undertake to say, that when any committee is raised and investigates this matter, it will appear in proof that the resolution which the gentleman from New York proposed to offer to this House yesterday, was concocted by some other person or persons maliciously, and was presented here for the purpose of giving it importance and embodying it in the official proceedings of this body; that it was peddled round the House and offered to other gentlemen than the gentleman from New York, who declined to be made the supple-instrument for carrying out the cold-blooded malice of whoever it was that originated this thing; and that, finally, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SPINNER] accepted the task. It will appear further, sir, that notwithstanding the resolution was promptly ruled out of order by the Presiding Officer of this body, and the scandalous part of it reflecting upon my two colleagues upon this floor was thus suppressed, the whole resolution was immediately telegraphed off to the New York newspapers, and will be brought to us by this evening's mail. It will appear further—and I undertake to prove it—that the gentleman from New York, after the House had adjourned, stated that he did not desire a committee to be raised when he introduced the resolution, and that his purpose was accomplished.

If these facts are proved, how will this case stand? I say that they are susceptible of proof; and how will the case then stand? This is not the first time, during this session, when a member of this House, under the pretense of getting up an investigation—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must confine himself to the matter now before the House.

Mr. HUGHES. That is what I propose to do. Voices on the Republican side of the House. "Oh, let him go on!" and "There is no objection on this side!"

Mr. HUGHES. I say that this is not the first time, this session, that a gentleman has offered a resolution for the action of the House proposing an investigation founded upon newspaper slanders. Now, sir, the resolution upon its face contains nothing proper for legislative consideration, nothing proper for legislative action, nothing proper for legislative information. If the facts and circumstances which I state are proved in connection with this matter, the truth is transparent that it was a stab at members upon this floor, at the Commissioner of the Land Office, and at a Senator; and that it was using the proceedings of this House for the purpose of giving importance and poignancy to that stab.

Now, the question is, will this House tolerate this kind of proceeding? The question is, does the dignity of this House demand that if such a case is brought before it, it shall express its condemnation? I hold, sir, that it is the duty of the House to express its disapprobation of this course, and its official disapprobation. I hold, sir, that any member of this body who makes himself responsible for an act of this sort, is subject to the censure of the House, and ought to be censured; and much more so where, as in this case, as soon as the attack is made, technical objections and clamor are raised to smother a defense.

I call the attention of the House, further, to the circumstances under which this resolution was imposed upon the House. The House having under consideration a resolution for the purpose of permitting night sessions, and considerable diversity of opinion appearing to exist upon that subject, the official report shows that the gentleman from New York put his resolution in in this way:

"Mr. SPINNER. I think this difficulty can be got along with if the House will allow me to offer a resolution."

The gentleman from New York then rose in his place and stated that which conveyed the idea that if the House would hear a resolution which he proposed, it would solve this difficulty as to whether the House should have night sessions or not. This, sir, I will not characterize. I will not say what it was, or what sort of treatment of the House it was. I leave each member of the House to his own judgment upon that subject. To this appeal of the gentleman from New York, the Speaker responded as follows:

"The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to offer a resolution. Is there any objection? The Chair hears no objection."

I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the members of this House, whether, if the true character of that resolution had been declared, and it had been made known that it was another attempt to put upon this House the irresponsible and infamous attacks of newspapers upon public men, there would have been no objection? Every member upon this floor knows that there would have been objection. But under the pretense that the gentleman was about to offer something that was calculated to relieve the House from the embarrassment in which they then were, growing out of the diversity of opinion upon the question whether or not they should have night sessions, this covert attack upon a member of a coördinate branch of this Congress, who has no right to be heard upon this floor, upon a public functionary who has no right to be heard upon this floor, and upon two members of this House, was in part placed upon the record, and failing to place it all there, the telegraph was invoked to do the rest. Does the dignity of this House demand that such a course as this should be rebuked, or is this House to be made the conduit, the sewer through which to reproduce the mendax infamia of a debased and prostituted press?

Sir, I say that in presenting this resolution to the House, I have done no more than what was due, not alone to the character of the individuals assailed, but to the dignity and character of the House itself. If, in the judgment of the House, the facts are not sufficiently set forth in the resolution; if, in the judgment of the members, witnesses ought to be summoned and examined, and the allegations of the member from New York sifted to the bottom before any censure is cast upon him, so be it. I have no objection to that course. I have no objection to this resolution being referred to a committee, with power to examine into the charges made by the member from New York, and into the charge which I now make against him; and that the whole truth of the matter be reported to the House, to be followed by such action as the House may deem proper.

It has been suggested to me, and I have seen it in the newspapers, that the point of this accusation was favoritism in the Land Office. Well, sir, waiving the question whether it is a proper charge for this House to occupy itself about, I inquire if the member from New York has any knowledge of any favoritism, or can vouch for the truth of the insinuation? Why, sir, upon the face of his resolution he presents his authority—two or three newspaper paragraphs. If this House will resolve itself into a tribunal to try one charge of that character, then it ought to open the door to all such charges, and try them all. And how much else would the House do if it should sit here from year to year without adjournment. That is not a sufficient ground for such a charge, and I think the House will so regard it.

I propose to show affirmatively, by proof, that the gentleman from New York declared that he did not want a committee, but had accomplished his purpose. The House can from that infer whether any honest zeal for the correction of abuses actuated the introduction of that resolution, or whether it was introduced for another purpose.

I do not know that I ought to detain the House further. I have no personal connection with the matter in any form whatever. The Commissioner of the General Land Office is a citizen of my own State, and is a gentleman above suspicion and above reproach. The Senator alluded to is my personal and political friend, whose character is beyond the reach of such attacks. My colleagues upon this floor can take care of themselves. Had I been permitted yesterday to state the substance of what I now state, and to have appealed to the justice and magnanimity of the gentleman from New York himself, it was all that I desired to do. But, sir, I was prevented, and how prevented? Why, sir, when the fact is taken into consideration, the hot haste to send off this scandalous report on the wings of the lightning, while all explanation was to be stifled by irregular and disorderly clamor, it adds another and darker shade to the whole proceeding.

I do not profess to have much skill in parliamentary rules, and I am very well aware that I am liable to be frequently out of order, and am willing to be set right in the proper way. But, sir, I recognize the right of no set of men to sit in their seats, and by clamor put me down. If I am called to order it must be done in accordance with the rules which they profess to vindicate.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Will the gentleman allow me to complete a sentence, which, as left, might seem to do injustice to the Committee of Ways and Means? I did not mean to say that the Committee of Ways and Means technically objected to the other committees of the House reporting; but that the course taken by that committee produced that result. I am willing that they shall report, but I desire that it shall be done in the regular order of business in the morning hour, when the committees are called for reports, and I hope they may have an opportunity to report in that manner before long.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. CAMPBELL. I call the gentleman from Pennsylvania to order. My colleague from the Western Reserve district was not, the other day, allowed to make an explanation.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I desire to make a statement in reply to the gentleman from North Carolina.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I hope the Chair will not permit remarks to be made upon the Committee of Ways and Means, when there is to be no opportunity of replying.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania must protect his own rights in that respect. Whenever a question of order is raised, the Chair will enforce it.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. All I wished to say was, that the Committee of Ways and Means had occupied but a small portion of the time of the House, the time being nearly all taken up by the debate on Kansas, when their bills were under consideration in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HUGHES. I will say, in conclusion, that I have presented this matter to the House as I understand it, and as I sincerely believe it is capable of being proved. I do not know all about this resolution which the gentleman from New York, who introduced the resolution, knows. It is very possible that, upon a full examination, it might have a different appearance. I have offered this resolution. I would have preferred to offer a resolution proposing to raise a committee to inquire into this whole matter; but, under the rules, I could not get in such a resolution, and I have therefore submitted this resolution to the House. I will make no motion to refer it, but I will very cheerfully concur if it be the pleasure of the House to dispose of it in that way; or, having accomplished all I desired in submitting these remarks, will be content to have the House make any other disposition of the matter.

Mr. ENGLISH obtained the floor.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I rise to a question of order. Is it not in order, at this stage of the proceedings, to demand, under the fifth rule, whether the House will consider the resolution at this time?

Mr. ENGLISH. I appeal to the gentleman from Ohio that it is due to me, under the circumstances, that I shall be allowed a few moments.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I will say to the gentleman from Indiana, with all possible kindness, that I have no idea to cut him off from being heard. The House, I have no doubt, will hear them. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SPINNER] also desires to be heard. I presume that the House will hear both gentlemen. I am willing to hear them, for one. But my object now is to propound an inquiry to the Chair. Is it not proper, at this time, that the House shall be asked whether or not it will consider this question?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that, if the fifth rule be applicable, the time for its enforcement was when the resolution was read from the Clerk's table.

Mr. GIDDINGS. As the gentleman from Indiana had the floor, I did not care to interrupt him. I wished, before making the point, that he should conclude his explanation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio had the right to interrupt the gentleman from Indiana. The attention of the Chair was not called to the rule before. When a motion or proposition is made, the question, "Shall the House now consider it?" is not put unless it is demanded by some member, or deemed necessary by the Speaker. Without expressing any opinion as to whether the rule is applicable or not, the Chair thinks that the application of the gentleman from Ohio comes too late when the House has permitted debate on the pending proposition.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I know that, in the other House, the party making a proposition has been fully heard before the question of reception was raised. I know, too, that here the question of reception has been raised after the member presenting a proposition has been heard in explanation of it. I am not prepared to say but that the Speaker is right. I think, however, that a member has the right to raise the question when the member making a proposition has explained the reason for its presentation. But I am willing that this question shall be decided at this time.

Mr. ENGLISH. Mr. Speaker, I have been for five years a member of this House; and I can appeal to the record to bear me out in the assertion that, in all that time, I never have uttered a sentence reflecting upon the personal character of any of my associates upon this floor; and never before have I had any occasion to notice or to refer to any charges of a personal character against myself; nor do I deem it necessary to say more now than to make a plain, unvarnished statement of the facts in this case.

I begin by premising that I know of nothing in law or morals which would make it improper, in any sense of the word, for a member of Congress to purchase the lands of the United States. I presume that that is a position which will not be called in question by any human being at all familiar with the laws of this land and the practice of the Land Office. I presume that the majority of the members of Congress have, at one time or other, entered or purchased Government land, with money or warrants. The only question, then, is, as to whether there was an impropriety in entering the land, in the present case, in the manner alluded to in the extracts from newspapers, which the gentleman from New York [Mr. SPINNER] has thought proper to introduce here? The statute is very explicit on this subject, and it is one which has been in existence for twelve years, and known to all men familiar with the laws of Congress. It is as follows:

"That it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, to cause to be located, free of any expense, any warrant which the holder may transmit to the General Land Office for that purpose, in such State and land district as the said holder or warrantee may designate, and upon good farming land, so far as the same can be ascertained from the maps, plats, and field-notes of the surveyor, or from any other information in the possession of the local office, and upon the location being made as aforesaid, the Secretary shall cause a patent to be transmitted to such warrantee."

Nor is this all. A reference to the face of the land warrants themselves shows the fact that the holder of them has the right to locate in any land office directly, or through the General Land Office in the city of Washington. Here is the language:

"NOTE. You can locate this certificate at any of the United States land offices, or it will be located for you by the General Land Office on the return of it, with your request to that effect indorsed thereon, specifying the State and land district in which you wish the location made."

That is the whole of the case. On the 23d of last February, my worthy colleague [Mr. FOLEY] and myself, for ourselves and certain of our constituents who had requested us so to do, deposited in the General Land Office here certain land warrants, with the request that the same be located in the State of Iowa, under the public laws of the United States and the instructions of the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of the General Land Office, which were the same in reference to all persons. There was no favoritism about it, in any shape, manner, or form. It was a legal, bona fide transaction; one made in good faith in every respect whatever, and neither illegal, unusual, nor improper.

Now, sir, for the purpose of making this matter clear beyond all cavil, I will send to the Clerk's desk to be read the identical instructions which were issued from the Department of the Interior, and under which these land warrants were located, if they are located; of which fact, however, we have no official information. Here are the papers, and it will be seen from them that no privileges were given to us that were not alike extended to every other person, high or low:

GENERAL LAND OFFICE, April 27, 1858.

SIR: As requested by you this morning, I have the honor to inclose a copy of the instructions of the Secretary of the Interior to this office, of the 19th February, 1858, under the second proviso to the fourth section of the act of 28th September, 1850, Statutes at Large, volume 9, pages 520-1.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

THOMAS A. HENDRICKS,

Commissioner.

Hon. W. H. ENGLISH, House of Representatives.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
WASHINGTON, February 19, 1858.

SIR: The proviso attached to the fourth section of the act of Congress granting bounty lands for military services, approved September 28, 1850, makes it "the duty of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, to cause to be located, free of expense, any warrant which the holder may transmit to the General Land Office for that purpose, in such State and land district as the said holder or warrantee may designate, on any good farming land, so far as the same can be ascertained from the maps, plats, and field notes of the surveyor, or from any other information in possession of the local office."

The second section of the act of March 22, 1852, "to make land warrants assignable, and for other purposes," authorizes the registers and receivers of the land offices thereafter to "charge and receive" a certain "compensation or percentage" * * * * * "for their services in locating all military bounty land warrants issued since the 11th of February, 1847."

The sixth section of the act of 3d March, 1855, "in addition to certain acts granting bounty land" for military services, also authorized certain charges on the location of warrants issued under that act.

The proviso in the act of September 28, 1850, hereinbefore recited, has been modified by these subsequent enactments, and locations cannot be made "free of expense," but are subject to specific charges to be paid by the locator.

The act of 22d March, 1852, which extended the bounty granted by the act of 1850, to certain cases, in its fourth section provides that "all the benefits of the last mentioned act, shall be extended to those cases; and the fourth section of the act of 3d March, 1855, authorizes the location of the certificates or warrants issued pursuant to that act, according to existing laws regulating the location of bounty land warrants."

The rights of the warrantees and assignees of bounty land certificates, issued under the acts of 1850, 1852, and 1855, appear to be on an equality, therefore, so far as relates to the duties to be performed by executive officers, in the location of warrants.

The Commissioner of the General Land Office will, therefore, receive military bounty land warrants issued since the 11th of February, 1847, whenever presented at his office by the owner, with the request accompanying them that they be located in a specified land district; and when the Commissioner is satisfied that proper steps have been taken by the applicant to place the amount of money, legally chargeable on effecting the location of the warrant or warrants, in the hands of the district officers, he will forward the warrants to the register and receiver of the proper district, to be by them located, pursuant to the proviso of the last section of the act of September 28, 1850.

And as it is manifest that the proviso can only be carried out in harmonious conjunction with other enactments regulating the disposal of the public lands, and the assignment and location of bounty land certificates, the warrants presented at your office can have only such opportunities of location at the district office, after the arrival of the money and warrants there, as the owner could have if personally present, and offering said warrants and money, on the day that they both first reach the local office in business hours.

The act of 23th September, 1850, contemplates that the particular tracts to be located in this manner shall be selected or designated by the local officers of any particular district, from the vacant public lands in such district liable to be located by the specific warrants sent them from your office. And when locations are made by district officers in cases of this kind, they will certify, in connection with their usual certificate in each case, that the location has been made "upon good farming land, so far as the same can be ascertained from the maps, plats, and field-notes of the surveyor, or from any other information in the possession of the (said) local office."

Whenever, therefore, military land warrants are presented to your office for location, you will "cause them to be located" in accordance with the views above expressed.

Very respectfully your obedient servant,

J. THOMPSON, Secretary.

The Commissioner of the General Land Office.

I desire to call the particular attention of the House to one sentence of these instructions:

"And as it is manifest that this proviso can only be carried out in harmonious conjunction with other enactments regulating the disposal of the public lands, and the assignment and location of bounty land certificates, the warrants presented at your office can have only such opportunities of location at the district office, after the arrival of the money and warrants there, as the owner could have if personally present, and offering said warrants and money on the day that they both first reach the local office in business hours."

That covers the whole case, and shows there was no preference in any shape given to these warrants.

I also want to call the attention of the House to another fact. These lands were brought into market, and the local land office opened, on the 23d of February last. The warrants were not deposited in the General Land Office here until that day, therefore the holders of these warrants had no preference. On the contrary, they were compelled to wait fourteen days, the length of time required to transmit the warrants from this city to the local land office; and in the mean time all persons there present had an opportunity to choose and select their lands. There was no attempt to locate the lands here. The warrants were simply sent to the local office there, for the purpose, under the law, of having the local land officers locate them under these instructions, and under the statute to which I have referred.

Therefore, so far from its being true that the holders of these warrants had any advantage, it will be seen by all that they did not stand even upon an equality with those present, because they had no opportunity to get any land until fourteen days after the lands were opened for location to everybody.

It is well enough, too, to remember that this transaction occurred last February, and not recently, as the gentleman's resolution might lead people to suppose. I am strongly inclined to believe that the gentleman was prompted by party malice, and that the whole object and intention of bringing this question forward was to create an impression upon the country that my course upon the Kansas question was influenced by some favoritism in this transaction; and I desire to say most emphatically, that if the gentleman from New York, or any other gentleman, inside or outside of this House, makes that charge, or insinuates that my course in relation to the Kansas question has been influenced by any other than worthy, proper, and patriotic motives, I denounce him, and send him forth branded as a liar, a poltroon, and a coward. [Cries of "Good!" "Good!"]

Mr. DAVIDSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, here reported as truly enrolled an act for the relief of Duncan Robertson; when the Speaker signed the same.

Mr. SPINNER. I have no excuses to make for what I have done here. I am responsible for it. I merely wish to repel the charge made by the gentleman from Indiana who first spoke, [Mr. HUGHES,] that I obtained the floor to offer my resolution surreptitiously. So far as that is concerned, sir, most certainly every gentleman upon this side of the House will bear me witness that the only motive they had for remaining here, and preventing an adjournment at that time, was because they desired to have the resolution introduced before the House adjourned. And with that view I made the remark that if gentlemen desired to adjourn they could effect it by receiving the resolution which I proposed to introduce.

The gentleman from Indiana made another charge, if I understood him correctly, and that was, that I had said that I did not desire a committee of investigation. That charge is false. The gentleman may have been so informed, but it is utterly untrue, and I defy the gentleman to prove it.

Mr. HUGHES. All I have to say on that subject is, that I am prepared to prove it conclusively if there be an investigation.

Mr. SPINNER. I hope the House will take a vote upon the question immediately. I was anxious that it should be done when the gentleman from Indiana took his seat. If my course here, with a view of ascertaining whether a public officer has any right to give members of this House, or of the other House, privileges beyond the common citizens of the United States, is wrong, I am willing to be censured for it.

I merely wished to repel those two charges. I did desire a committee of investigation, for I desired to know the truth of the charges. The resolution embraced slips cut from a Republican and a Democratic paper—the one making a charge against a Senator, and the other defending the Senator, because that persons who voted against the Lecompton bill were equally implicated. It did not deny the fact, but made that defense. My object was to ascertain whether an officer of the Land Office had the right to do as he had done. I did say afterwards, that perhaps my object had been attained, and that I cared little what disposition the House made of it.

Mr. FOLEY. Were you not satisfied, before you offered the resolution, that this transaction was perfectly legal and according to usage?

Mr. SPINNER. No, sir. I thought it was wrong.

Mr. FOLEY. Were you not satisfied that it was legal?

Mr. SPINNER. I was not aware that it was legal. I thought it was wrong.

Mr. FOLEY. You insinuated a slander.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I would inquire of the Chair if it is too late to raise the question whether this is a question of privilege or not?

The SPEAKER. The Chair decided this to be a question of privilege. Of course any gentleman taking exception to the ruling of the Chair had the right to take an appeal from the decision. The Chair did not, in so ruling, attempt to rule upon the question of facts set out in the preamble. The Chair simply discovered from the reading of the resolution that it contained a proposition to censure a member of the House. That the Chair considered to be a question of privilege. Whether the alleged facts were true or not, it was not the province of the Chair to determine.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I only desired to get the precise decision of the Chair. My own views are that this House has no control over individual members of the House in the discharge of their duties, and that this House will not take upon itself to decide that question. I do not consider the Speaker as having considered that point at all. Will the Chair now propound the question to the House whether they regard it as question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already decided the question; and, if a majority of the House are of opinion that the decision of the Chair is incorrect, it is perfectly competent for the House to overrule the Chair. The Chair stated on a former occasion that, whenever a question of privilege was raised by any gentleman upon the floor, and the Chair had doubts as to whether or not it was a question of privilege, the Chair thought the safest practice was to refer the matter to the House, to take its opinion as to whether it was or not. But here the Chair had no doubt that the resolution involved a question of privilege, because it proposed to censure a member of the House; and so he decided.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I wish the Speaker to understand my point, and that is all I desire.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. If no appeal is taken, I object to debate as being out of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio is stating a question of order.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. He has stated his point of order, and the Chair has overruled it; and, unless an appeal is taken, I object to debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio rises and intimates that the Chair has misconceived the precise point of order which he raised. The Chair desires to hear the gentleman from Ohio, thinking that he has not misconceived the point.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. In that view of the case, I will not press my point of order.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I do not understand the Chair to have decided that the House has the right or the privilege to censure a member for the discharge of his duty.

The SPEAKER. That is for the House to determine when they come to vote upon the resolution.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Is it too late to raise it as a question for the House to determine now, whether they will entertain this as a question of privilege? That is what I want to get at. Will not the Speaker now propound the question to the House whether they will take jurisdiction of this case?

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot propound the interrogatory to the House, the Chair having decided that the resolution involves a question of privilege in his opinion. As to whether it be a question of privilege, there may be no dispute about that, and yet the House might conclude that the resolution ought not to pass.

Mr. GIDDINGS. The very point that I wish to get at is, whether the House will consider the resolution on its merits.

The SPEAKER. The Chair regards that point as having been decided when the resolution was entertained as a question of privilege.

Mr. CAMPBELL. It is my purpose, Mr. Speaker, to move to lay this whole subject on the table. Before submitting that motion, however, I will occupy a few moments of the valuable time of the House in regard to the question which has been so suddenly sprung upon the body.

It was my misfortune—perhaps a misfortune—during the last Congress, when all the important business of the country was undisposed of, and the appropriation bills in my charge had not been acted on, (being chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and anxious to carry them through the House,) to make the remark, when a proposition was submitted to have a committee of investigation, based upon something that had appeared in a newspaper, that I did not think it becoming the dignity of the House to bring itself down to a level with those who might see fit to malign it through the medium of "manufactured rags and oil." I wish to avail myself of this occasion to say that I alluded then to that class of scribblers who are hired to malign those who are in power, and not to those who, through that medium, honestly seek to disseminate correct information.

I do not see any propriety in pursuing this matter further. Every one must be satisfied, from the statement of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SPINNER,] that his object was correct; it being to ascertain whether an executive officer of this Government could give to Senators and members of this House advantages, in entering lands in the far-off West, which the hardy pioneers who have gone there could not have.

I hold in my hand, sir, the Daily Globe, the official paper of Congress, by John C. Rives, of December 7, 1857, containing this charge:

"Who will not be stricken with horror and shame at the evidences afforded by the following abstract of documents, on file in the office of the Register of the Treasury, connected with a fraudulent account of William Cullom, Clerk of the House of Representatives of the United States against the Treasury of the United States, and the collusion [mark the words] therein by the Secretary of the Treasury?"

Here we have the official paper of Congress, published at the expense of Government, charging directly upon the Secretary of the Treasury a collusion with the late Clerk of the House, to rob and plunder the people. You have organized a committee of investigation into the conduct of the Clerk, but none into the conduct of the Secretary of the Treasury. My opinion, founded as it is upon a long acquaintance with both those gentlemen, is that the charge is untrue.

Again, coming a little further down, I have here the Boston semi-weekly Courier, which has just been handed to me. I do not know what its politics are, but I send it up, and ask that the extract which I have marked may be read.

The Clerk read the extract as follows:

"Again, notwithstanding all this, the Republican-American coalition majority in Congress in 1857, under the same degrading circumstances—at least, intoxicated with their temporary enjoyment of power—voted the extra allowance to their clerks; and upon motion of one of the Massachusetts members, the outrage was committed in an aggravated form. This motion was so worded that the clerks might claim under it extra pay for services in previous years; so that, in one instance, the allowance reached the sum of several thousand dollars. The account was disallowed by the First Comptroller of the Treasury, at that time the venerable and upright Mr. Whitlesey, of Ohio. He refused to allow the payment, on the ground that the appropriation was illegal, being a direct and express violation of the joint resolution, and therefore law, of 1854. The Comptroller was beset by interested parties to this gross fraud, and every mode of appliance was resorted to, to induce him to change his view of the matter and his purpose to resist the payment to the extent of his official power and duty. Personal appeals were made to him by members of the House, in behalf of the allowance, and, if two distinguished leaders of the coalition party (Mr. Banks, then Speaker, and Mr. L. D. CAMPBELL of Ohio) are not very much belied, they approached the Comptroller, not only with urgent solicitations, but with dishonorable propositions, to induce him to wink at the allowance, illegal as it might be. His integrity, however, was proof against all such approaches. His decision was confirmed by the Secretary of the Treasury; and now, as before, the attempt is made to defeat the law through the deficiency bill, in which it is sought to defraud the Treasury by the pretense that the late Clerk of the House has paid the said extra allowances, under a vote of the House, and that it ought to be refunded to him."

Mr. GROW. I rise to a question of order. I want to know if the Speaker will rule as he did yesterday, that papers cannot be read here which reflect upon members of this House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state that the general rule would hardly be applicable in this case, inasmuch as the gentleman from Ohio himself asks that the paper be read.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I read these merely as specimens of the attacks which are made in both official and unofficial papers, upon members of Congress. I will not indulge in language such as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HUGHES] has just used in regard to them. I will simply say that I think the publication in the Globe imputing corruption upon the late Clerk, [Mr. Cullom,] and the present Secretary of the Treasury, [Mr. Cobb,] and that I know the charge in the Boston Courier against the late Speaker and myself are without any foundation in fact. I could go on, if I had before me the files of newspapers which I have at home, for an hour or more, quoting from the attacks made in various newspapers against members of this House, upon any one of which, if true, a committee of investigation might be justified.

Mr. Speaker, several committees of investigation have been organized during the present session of Congress, one of which reported this morning. Others will report.

As a little incident interesting to myself, in reference to these charges of the press, I will refer to one of the many which have been made against me as a member of this House.

At the commencement of the last Congress, this House was in a partial state of revolution, unable to elect a Speaker. Remembering that many years ago a high compliment was paid to Massachusetts by South Carolina [the motion of Mr. Rhett to place John Quincy Adams in the chair] under similar circumstances, I moved a resolution giving the temporary honors of the same position to a gentleman from South Carolina with whom I had served for many years, and in whose impartiality and ability to preside I had confidence. For that act I was denounced throughout the entire North by the press of the party with whom I had acted. Some of my constituents, among them my best friends theretofore, demanded that I should resign, charging that my proposition gave satisfactory evidence that I had abandoned my principles, and sold myself out to the South. I did not deem these charges—

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. I rise to a question of order. I should like to know what the resolution offered by the gentleman from Ohio during the election of Speaker in the last Congress has to do with the question before the House?

Mr. CAMPBELL. It was merely to show that this whole subject, based on newspaper charges solely, ought to be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. It is hardly in order.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Very well; I will not disturb the gentleman from North Carolina by reference to any of my grievances.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. It is no disturbance to the gentleman from North Carolina; but I thought it might be to the Speaker.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The Speaker is not easily disturbed. I could name many instances where committees of investigation have been organized. During the present session a committee was organized to inquire into the proceedings of the Committee of Ways and Means, and of members of the last session in reference to the passage of the tariff act. It was founded upon newspaper report. I was absent with a sick family, in Ohio, at the time it was organized, or I should have then submitted some remarks in reference to the passage of that tariff act. It is not proper now that I should say anything upon that subject. When the proper time comes I may, if here, take occasion to say something. By the many precedents, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SPINNER] was certainly justified, on yesterday, in proposing an investigation into the conduct of an executive officer whose integrity was involved in the publications his proposition embodied.

The Chair, whether properly or not, I will not say, ruled yesterday that the reading of the charges was out of order. This morning there seems to be a change in the programme and it has been decided in order to read them.

I do not believe that a committee of investigation at this stage of the session would produce any practical benefit to the country. It may be that the result would vindicate the integrity of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, (which I have no reason to doubt,) and of the officer of the land office at Council Bluffs. But, sir, on the other side, the party friends of those officers, do not want an investigation. Therefore—

Mr. ENGLISH. If I understand the gentleman to say that gentlemen on this side of the House do not want an investigation, he is mistaken. I, for one, desire an investigation so as to show to the House that the resolution introduced by the gentleman from New York is slanderous and unfounded.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Very well, then. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SPINNER] is ready to meet the responsibility of his motion of yesterday, and instead of the motion to lay the whole subject on the table, I move the previous question on the passage of the resolution.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I appeal to the gentleman to withdraw the demand for the previous question for a moment. I will renew it if he wishes.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I move to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that motion for a moment.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. The gentleman will pardon me. I insist upon my motion.

Mr. SPINNER. I hope the House will not lay the resolution on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CHAFFEE moved to reconsider the vote by which the whole subject was laid on the table, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RECESS IN COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER stated the business first in order to be the demand for the yeas and nays upon the motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered upon the following resolution:

Resolved, That during the present week, it shall be in order each day after to-day, for the Committee of the Whole to take a recess until seven o'clock, p. m., after which hour general debate may be indulged in: Provided, That no vote shall be taken at such evening session, except on motions that the committee rise, and that the House adjourn.

Mr. FLORENCE. I withdraw the motion to reconsider. I suppose that will bring us to vote directly on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. It will bring the House to a direct vote.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. Have the yeas and nays been ordered on the resolution?

The SPEAKER. They have not been.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Is it in order to amend the resolution?

The SPEAKER. It is not; the previous question having been ordered.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to have general consent to insert in the resolution a proviso confining debate during the day to the legitimate subject of discussion.

[Cries of "No!" "No!" all over the Hall.]

Mr. FLORENCE. If I understand the purpose of the resolution it takes effect from to-morrow, and not from to-day. If so, I have no objection.

Mr. EDIE called for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered; and the yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina, called for tellers on the resolution.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. CRAIGE, of North Carolina, and EDIE were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 110, noes 33.

So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I ask leave to introduce a bill for reference.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I call for the regular order of business.

PENSION BILL.

Mr. SAVAGE. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The rules were accordingly suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BURNETT in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN stated that the business first in order was the consideration of House bill No. 259, granting pensions to officers and soldiers who served in the war of 1812, and in the Indian wars during that period.

Mr. SEWARD. I call for the reading of the resolution making it a special order.

The CHAIRMAN. The last resolution adopted by the House directed that when the House should again resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on House bill No. 259, debate should terminate thereon in three hours, and that then the committee should proceed to vote upon amendments.

Mr. SEWARD. I want to get at the first resolution which made this bill a special order. I want it read, for I deny that that order is extended by the second resolution.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I would inquire whether it is not now in order to move to take up an appropriation bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not, for the reasons which he has just stated in reply to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. SEWARD.]

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Then the Chair rules out my motion?

The CHAIRMAN. He does.

Mr. SEWARD. I ask for the reading of both resolutions.

The CHAIRMAN. They are in the office of the Clerk, and have been sent for.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I make the point of order that it is in order to move to take up an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is already entertaining a point of order which is not yet disposed of. When that is disposed of, the Chair will entertain the point of order raised by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The point of order raised by the gentleman from Georgia is, that the resolution originally adopted by the House closing debate upon House bill No. 259, is not now in force, it having expired by the terms of its own limitation. The Chair overrules the point of order, for the reason that the House, by a subsequent resolution, directed that when the House should again resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, all debate upon this bill should terminate in three hours, and that the bill should then be read through by sections, subject to amendment.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I desire to appeal from the decision of the Chair upon that point of order.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I supposed the resolution closing debate was in the usual form. The usual form is, that all debate shall close at a certain specified time after the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union shall again resume its consideration. This resolution, I now understand, is worded differently. It provides that all debate shall terminate, in committee, in three hours after the House shall again resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Now, sir, notwithstanding the difference in the wording, I contend that there is nothing in that resolution which requires this committee to take up that bill again. But whenever the committee shall take it up, if it is more than three hours from the time the House again resolves itself into committee, then general debate is closed, and we must go on and vote upon it. To have continued it a special order would have required, as originally, a two-third vote of the House.

Mr. KEITT. If there be any question about the matter, I will move that the committee rise.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I believe I took an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia made a point of order, and proposes to take an appeal as soon as the resolutions can be reported.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Very well, sir; that will do.

Mr. SEWARD. I propose to state my point of order. The first resolution passed by the House in relation to this bill fixed the 22d, 23d, and 24th days of April, as the days upon which this bill should be considered. The second resolution proposed that when the House again went into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, all debate should be closed upon that bill within three hours. What I want the Chair to understand is this: that there is no conflict between the two resolutions; they are precisely like two statutes which can be harmonized and made perfectly consistent with each other. Well, now, in all legal contemplation, the last resolution passed was intended to present this state of things: that if the House went into committee upon either of those days—the 22d, 23d, or 24th instant—the debate should be closed within three hours thereafter upon that bill.

That is the fair, legal, and legitimate construction of those resolutions; and I cannot understand how they can be tortured so as to allow a special order to be transferred and extended indefinitely.

I hold that the resolution closing debate only applied to the three days for which the bill was made the special order, in case the House went into committee on either of those days; and if the Chair decides otherwise, I shall appeal from his decision.

The Clerk then read the resolution making the bill a special order, as follows:

Resolved, That bill No. 259, granting pensions to the soldiers of the war of 1812, and those engaged in Indian wars during that period, be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and be made a special order therein for the 22d, 23d, and 24th days of April next."

Mr. SEWARD. Now read the resolution closing debate, which was adopted on Saturday, April 24, 1858, one of the days for which the bill was made a special order.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That all debate in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on bill of the House (No. 259) granting pensions to the officers and soldiers of the war with Great Britain of 1812, and those engaged in Indian wars during that period, shall cease in three hours after the House shall again resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the committee shall then proceed to vote on such amendments," &c.

Mr. SEWARD. The House did not go into the Committee of the Whole at all until the special order was exhausted, and, therefore, the last resolution necessarily failed in legal contemplation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. SEWARD. I appeal from the decision of the Chair. It is necessary that this question shall be settled correctly.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I call for tellers on the appeal.

Tellers were ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia raises the question of order that the special order for this bill has expired, as the original resolution limited it to the 22d, 23d, and 24th days of April. The Chair overrules the question of order for the reason that the House, by a subsequent resolution, determined that all debate upon this bill should terminate in three hours after the House should again resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The Chair decides that, under that resolution, the first business in order before the committee is the consideration of this bill. From this decision the gentleman from Georgia appeals.

Mr. HOUSTON. Is the appeal debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

Mr. HOUSTON. Why not? The general debate has not yet been closed. There are still three hours for discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say to the gentleman from Alabama that this is merely a question of the priority of business, and the Chair thinks that an appeal on such a question is not debatable.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire then to ask the Chair this question: whether, if the decision of the Chair shall be sustained, it will not always be in the power of a majority of the House, by passing a resolution to close debate, to make any bill a special order; and whether that would not dispense with, supersede, and override the rule of the House that requires two thirds to make a special order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would say to the gentleman from Alabama that this resolution closing debate was introduced and acted on by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOUSTON. That makes no difference. A resolution to close debate upon any bill is privileged, and does not require unanimous consent or a suspension of the rules. A majority of the House can, at any time, arrest debate upon a bill; but it takes two thirds to make a special order.

Mr. SEWARD. I desire to correct a statement made by the Chair. The Chair announced that there was a subsequent resolution passed, which superseded the one making this bill the special order for the 22d, 23d, and 24th days of April. My point is this: that the resolution closing debate is contemporaneous with the first resolution, having been passed on the 24th, and therefore, that its operation cannot go beyond the special order.

Mr. MAYNARD. The determination of this question will decide whether the House will take up a very important bill at this session of Congress. The House is now very thin, and I therefore move that the committee rise, so that we can take the question when next we go into committee.

Mr. JACKSON demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WRIGHT, of Georgia, and WASHBURN, of Maine, were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes twenty, noes not counted.

So the committee refused to rise.

The question recurred upon the appeal from the decision of the Chair, upon which tellers had been ordered.

Messrs. WRIGHT, of Georgia, and WASHBURN, of Maine, were appointed tellers.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 66, noes 58.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained as the judgment of the committee.

Mr. KEITT. I wish to inquire of the Chair whether, under the resolution of the House limiting debate to three hours, that discussion extends beyond the subject of the bill itself, or whether, the bill being a special order, discussion is restricted to the subject-matter?

The CHAIRMAN. If the question were raised, the Chair would decide that the discussion must be confined to the bill under consideration. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CURRY] has the floor.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I rise to a question of order. It is different substantially from that just decided by the Chair, raised by the gentleman from Georgia. My point is this: that it is competent for the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union now to take up this bill, an appropriation bill, or any other bill that it can reach, and that the operation of the resolution terminating debate does not operate to make this a special order for three hours at the present time. I hold that the true and proper construction of the resolution is, that whenever the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union has this question before it, it shall be then open for discussion for three hours, and no more, under the general debate; but that it is competent, at the same time, for the committee to pass this by, and take up any other bill on the Calendar. Otherwise, the Chair will perceive that it would be competent for any member of the House, at any time before going into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to move to terminate debate on any one of the fifty bills on the Calendar; and that would operate as a special order; so that a majority of the members, instead of two thirds, could, at any time, bring the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to the discussion and consideration of any question on the Calendar. Such I understand to have been the almost uniform ruling in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union heretofore. I think I recollect but a single instance in which the question has been ruled as the Chair intimates he shall rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Maine, that whenever the question which he suggests comes up, the Chair will decide it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Well, I raise the question now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman cannot make it as a question of order. It will be only a question as to whether the committee will lay aside this bill and take up some other.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I understood that that was the motion made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. J. GLANCY JONES.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CURRY] is entitled to the floor, and the gentleman from Maine cannot take it from him for the purpose of moving to take up some other bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. That is true; but I understood that the gentleman from Pennsylvania had made that motion.

Mr. CURRY. Then I claim the floor.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I took an appeal from the decision of the Chair, which came up properly in order after the point taken by my friend from Georgia. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, at the head of the Committee of Ways and Means, moved to take up the appropriation bills. The Chair determined that that motion was not in order. I took an appeal from that decision; and, at the suggestion of the Chair, waited till the appeal taken by the gentleman from Georgia should be disposed of. I respectfully insist now that the motion is in order, and I insist on that motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Maryland that at the time the gentleman from Pennsylvania made his motion, he could not have the floor for that purpose—and for this reason, that the gentleman from Georgia was on the floor on a question of order; and the Chair did not receive or entertain the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Hence the gentleman from Maryland could not have taken an appeal from the decision of the Chair. The gentleman from Alabama is entitled to the floor.

Mr. GARTRELL. If my friend from Alabama yields me the floor for a moment, I desire to give notice to the committee that I shall, at the proper time, move to amend the first section of this bill, by striking out of lines ten, eleven, and twelve, the following words:

—“the amount of their full pay in said line, according to his rank, but not exceeding, in any case, the pay of a captain of infantry”— and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

—the sum of ninety-six dollars, to be paid semi-annually.

Mr. KELLY. I desire to give notice that I will offer the following amendment, to come in at line nine, section two:

Provided, That the applicant prove, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, that he is in indigent circumstances, and unable by manual labor to procure a subsistence.

Mr. CURRY. I approach the discussion of this subject with some reluctance, and am sensible of the difficulty and unpleasantness of the task. To deny a boon of this kind to those who are patriotically described as the “old soldiers,” subjects one’s conduct to misconception. It is very far from my purpose to derogate from the value of the services of those who fought the “second war of independence.” My impulses and feelings prompt me to the exercise of the largest liberality in their behalf; but impulses and feelings are not safe guides for legislation, and must yield to convictions of duty, springing, not from gratitude, but from the Constitution, the rights of others, and the state of the Treasury. “Pathetic duty,” said Livingston, in discussing this very question, “was a heresy in politics as in morals.”

It is the rule of all governments to grant pensions of some sort. In England, the King has been regarded as the sole judge of the merit for which pensions are to be given. The power was conceded to him to furnish rewards for public service, to acknowledge or stimulate merit, and to raise those who had been serving their country above the caprices of fortune. It has been sadly abused to sustain a royal household, to feed a host of parasitic dependents, to tempt and corrupt the opposition, to buy up placemen, and secure political influence. The nation grew restive under these grants of royal favor. A severe and protracted struggle has been waged to require ministerial responsibility for the bestowment of this patronage, to reduce and limit the amount of pensions, and secure parliamentary interference. The struggle has been so far successful that all parliamentary interference has been an “interference of restraint.”

Unlike England, in the United States the pension system, instead of being restrained, has been enlarged. As the screw, from every revolution, gathers additional power, so every enlargement of our pension list has but increased the demands and augmented the outside pressure. This bill is the most comprehensive of all; the most generous in its recognitions of merit; the most indiscriminate and princely in the bestowment of its charities.

To provide for the revolutionary soldiers, different acts of legislation have been passed by Congress. At an early period, during the war—as was stated by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FENTON,]—pensions, adequate to their support during life, or the continuance of their disability, were rightly granted to those who lost a limb, or were otherwise disabled in the line of their duty. Subsequently these laws for the benefit of the wounded and disabled were enlarged and explained. In 1818, those “who served in the war of the Revolution until the end thereof, or for the term of nine months, or longer, at any period of the war on the continental establishment,” and “by reason of reduced circumstances in life,” were in need “of assistance from the country for support,” were provided for. In 1828 pensions were given, without any qualification as to property, to all officers and soldiers who served in the continental line of the Army to the close of the war. Finally, in 1832, the terms were enlarged, and pensions were granted to all who served, in a military capacity, during the war of the Revolution, for a period of not less than six months. First, those disabled in the military and naval service received pensions; then the indigent and necessitous; and lastly, all were embraced.

So fervent was the national gratitude, these pension laws, although opposed in part by some of the purest and best men of the Union, received the popular sanction. It ought not to be forgotten, however, that it was repeatedly denied in debate that these laws could be claimed as a precedent for pensioning soldiers of later wars. It was asserted that no such claim could ever arise; that there could, in the nature of things, be no similar service. It was a physical, and moral, and political impossibility. To this that sagacious statesman and incorruptible patriot, Nathaniel Macon, in 1818, replied, that “it did not require the gift of prophecy to foretell that thirty or forty years hence as much may be said in favor of the army engaged in the second war of independence, as we have now heard about the first: though as much may not be said about the state of the country and of the sufferings of the people, because the facts will not warrant it.”

Sure enough, the prediction in forty years has been verified, and pensions for the soldiers of the war of 1812 are now claimed as a matter of right and justice. This bill goes even beyond the laws making provision for the soldiers of the Revolution. As before stated, the most comprehensive act granting pensions for revolutionary service was that of 1832. The rate of pension was graduated by the length of service and the grade or rank in which it was rendered. Two years’ service entitled the party to the full pay of his rank in the line, not to exceed, however, the pay of a captain. For shorter periods the pension was proportionably less; but no pension was provided for merely being in a battle, or for any length of service less than six months. A private’s pay in the Revolution was \$6 66 $\frac{2}{3}$ per month, or \$80 per annum. In the war of 1812 it was \$8 per month, or \$96 per annum; so that while the highest pension a private in the Revolution could receive for two years’ service was \$80 per annum, for one year’s service \$40 per annum, and for six months’ service \$20 per annum, this bill gives \$96 per annum for only three months’ service, or for even one day’s service, provided the party was engaged in battle. There were many persons, during the war of 1812, suddenly called into service, as at New Orleans, North Point, Plattsburg, and Bladensburg, who were engaged in “active battle,” and who were not in service but a few weeks; yet, under this bill, they will be entitled to full pensions, while the revolutionary soldier, who may have served five months and twenty-nine days, and during that period been engaged in more than one active battle, would receive nothing. The man who served only three months in the war of 1812 will receive, under this bill, \$16 per annum more than the revolutionary soldier who served two years; and yet how vast the difference between the two struggles!

This bill throws all other pension bills in the shade, and out-Herods Herod in the magnificence of its liberality. In very wantonness of generosity and gratitude, it throws aside restrictions, magnifies, as I have shown, the services of the soldiers of 1812 above those of the “times that tried men’s souls,” and rising above all such petty considerations as length of service, privations endured, disabilities incurred, it embraces in its scope all who served for a term of three months, or were engaged in a battle; all, without distinction, the invalid confined to his couch or hobbling on crutch, and the stout and stalwart; the rich, living in wealth and luxury, and the indigent, straitened by poverty and a numerous family; those who served five years and those who served three months. I am mistaken. The proposed amendment of my friend from Georgia, [Mr. GARTRELL,] reminds me there is a distinction. The general and colonel, and major and captain, get their forty dollars per month; the lieutenants their thirty dollars; the ensigns, their twenty dollars; the surgeons, their sixty dollars; the sergeants, their eleven dollars, while the private, who shouldered his musket, bore his knapsack, performed the drudgery, fought the battles, has his eight dollars per month. It matters not if the common soldier has twelve children, and the officer only one child; the private has penury and want, and the officer plenty and ease, still this inexorable bill makes the distinction. The Duke of Cambridge, recently, with noble candor, declared that English prowess and achievements in the Crimean war were due to the common soldier. Without disparaging the gallantry and courage of our noble officers, I can truthfully affirm, and the experience of the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUITMAN] will confirm the assertion, that we owe much of our military glory and prestige to the rank and file; and there is no just reason, when the Government is dispensing its gratuities, and bestowing its charities, for discriminating offensively and injuriously against the common soldier. It is a fallacy, that the officers encounter more dangers, or possess more patriotism than the privates, or are more concerned for their country's success in time of war.

The Scriptures commend the wisdom of the man, who, intending to build a tower, sitteth down first and counteth the cost to see whether he hath sufficient to finish it. So it is well enough for us, in advance, to count the cost of this bill and ascertain the probable annual expenditures under its operation. The estimate, I admit, must be somewhat conjectural; but the data are sufficient to give proximate certainty. I have before me a table, carefully prepared at the Pension Office, making an estimate of the amount involved in this bill. The estimates are based upon a comparison of the force engaged, with the bounty and granted under late laws for such service. The number of survivors, entitled to claim the benefits of the proposed pension and the amount necessary to be appropriated, are ascertained by finding the whole amount of force employed in the war of 1812, the pensions necessary for all, and then taking three eighths of those sums. After this liberal deduction, and including the marine and navy corps engaged in 1812, the amount involved in granting pensions under this bill is $11,321,730 per annum. One of the strongest objections in 1818 to the bill, then under consideration, providing for the surviving officers and soldiers of the Revolution, as conceded by its advocates, was the supposed exorbitancy of the sum required, amounting to $120,000 per annum. By this bill, in characteristic conformity with modern progressiveness, without any qualms of conscience, $11,000,000—as much as the whole expenditures of this Government in 1825—are to be given away every year.

This exorbitant amount, I am aware, is hooted at, and considerations of economy are stifled by railing at improper expenditures in other respects, as if one wrong justified another, and by appeals for the soldiers, whose services are assimilated and made superior to the services of the revolutionary soldiers. Now, there is no legal obligation resting upon us to confer these pensions. There was no such stipulation in the contract between the Government and those who served it. They become, then, mere gratuities. If claimed as a matter of right, the next step will be to adopt the policy of Great Britain, which has her magnificent Chelsea hospitals for the relief and support of worn-out and disabled soldiers, and her Greenwich hospital, once a royal palace, as an asylum for seamen who, by age, wounds, or other accidents, become unfit for service. If the principle of this bill be right and defensible, then it is perfectly competent for Congress to construct hospitals and asylums and homes for those who have been soldiers and sailors, to feed and clothe and shelter them and their wives, and educate their children.

As practical legislators, it behooves us to ascertain whether the Treasury can support this large additional expenditure; and if it cannot, to provide the necessary means. Let us examine our present financial condition, as exhibited in the report of that most faithful and able public officer, the Secretary of the Treasury:

The Secretary of the Treasury estimates the aggregate means for the current fiscal year at.....$75,389,934 00
Expenditures for same period.....74,963,958 41

Leaving an estimated balance of.....$426,875 59 or less than half a million dollars in the Treasury on 1st of July, 1858.

Now, to operate this Government, a surplus is at all times needed of.....$5,000,000 00
Appropriations for Sound dues, printing, and Army deficiencies, &c., will amount to.....19,000,000 00
Private claims to be paid.....1,000,000 00
Increase of Army.....2,000,000 00
Public expenditures, not estimated for, such as court, custom, and light houses.....5,000,000 00
Falling off of customs below estimates.....10,000,000 00
Making an aggregate of.....$35,000,000 00
To meet this, Treasury notes have been authorized to the amount of.....20,000,000 00
Leaving unprovided for.....$15,000,000 00

These are all moderate estimates, and they do not include the expenses of the Oregon war, amounting to four or five millions, the French spoliation, covering not less than five millions, the Pacific railroad, variously estimated from ten to one hundred millions, and yet this pension bill will add eleven millions more, making an actual bonafide debt of twenty or twenty-five millions, (besides the public debt of $25,000,000,) for the payment of which no provision is made. No one, surely, contemplates the creation of this additional debt without preparing to meet it. How is it to be done? By loan or by increase of tariff. With ordinary prosperity, the present duties will be barely sufficient to defray the current expenditures. They will not bear an increase of several millions. The taxes, then, must be increased, if loans are not resorted to. On what articles? Will you abolish the free list, tea, coffee, &c., and put your increased tax on them, and sugar, iron, salt, coarse cotton and woolen goods, the prime necessities of life, or on luxuries? It is proposed to throw these additional burdens on the Government, and common legislative prudence and sagacity demand that ample and speedy provision should be made to meet them. Burdens are to be imposed, taxes are to be increased, retrenchment and economy made impossible, and the country should know it, and means should at once be placed in the hands of the Government to carry out your legislation. I insist that gentlemen who are pressing so vigorously the passage of this bill should accept the consequences of their legislation, and take the responsibility of increasing the taxes or negotiating a loan. If you give this gratuity, the laboring classes should be advised that they have to pay it. To such demands as this and many others, in the present financial condition of the Government, as Edmund Burke said in 1780, it should be now answered with firmness, "the public is poor."

This is a gloomy picture. Unfortunately it is a truthful one. Two causes may conspire to place the Government in a better condition. First, a rapid reaction in trade and commerce by increased general prosperity—swelling the importations and increasing the revenues. Secondly, by retrenchment—lopping off expenditures and resisting the pressure for large appropriations. Our legislation, thus far, has not furnished much assurance of a disposition to economize. Our Government has become disgracefully extravagant, and for it all parties are responsible. Under the watchwords, "retrenchment and reform," the friends of General Jackson carried on the political contest, in 1828, against the administration of the younger Adams. Under the same attractive rallying cry, the Whig party defeated Van Buren, and elected General Harrison in 1840. In 1841 Mr. Calhoun, the wisest and most sagacious statesman that this country, so prolific of great men, has produced, said, that $17,000,000 were sufficient to defray the expenses of this Government, economically administered. Since then new territory has been acquired, our frontier has been extended, hostile and expensive tribes of Indians have been brought within our jurisdiction, and our expenses have necessarily increased, but out of all reason—they have run up to nearly eighty million dollars. To test whether these large expenditures are proper, and whether the revenue has been judiciously and economically applied, I propose to institute a comparison between 1840 and 1857; and to those who have not noted carefully our extravagance, the results will be astounding.

The disbursements of the Government for many years have been comprised under four general heads: the civil list, including foreign intercourse and miscellaneous, the military service, the naval establishment, and the public debt. The expenditures under the civil list, excluding foreign intercourse and miscellaneous, have increased from $2,736,769 31 in 1840, to $7,207,112 42 in 1857, showing an increase of one hundred and seventy-five per cent. since 1840. The total expenditures, exclusive of the public debt, have run up from $24,139,920 11 in 1840, to $65,032,559 76 in 1857, showing an increase of about one hundred and seventy per cent., while the increase of the population during the same time has been only sixty-seven per cent. The contingent expenses of the two Houses of Congress were, in 1840, $384,333 17, and in 1857, $1,364,578 53. For printing and stationery for the two Houses were paid, in 1840, $115,904 77, and in 1857, $732,687 42. The cost of collecting the revenue, which is not embraced in the general expenditures, was, in 1840, $1,513,138 23, and in 1857, $3,161,935 86. The Army expenses were, in 1840, $6,608,770 92, and in 1857, $15,434,424 50. The aggregate strength of the Army in 1840 was ten thousand five hundred and seventy, and in July last, according to the report of the Secretary of War, fifteen thousand seven hundred and sixty-four. The average cost of each individual, in 1840, was $625 93, and in 1857, $979 09, making the present cost of each individual in the Army to exceed that of 1840 by $353 16. The total expenses of the Navy, in 1840, were $6,110,214 11, and in 1857, $11,281,038 29. The whole number in marine corps and Navy, in 1840, were ten thousand and eighty-one, and in 1857, eleven thousand one hundred and forty-six. Leaving out the marine corps, the cost of each individual in the Navy, in 1840, was $643 70, and in 1857, $1,112 90. The appropriations for public buildings, custom and court-houses, post offices, &c., in 1840, were $662,168, and in 1857, $4,561,855 41. It is but proper to state that the revenue received at many of the points where these outlays have been made will not, in a dozen years, defray the cost of construction. These facts show that economy in the disbursement of the public money exists only in name, and admonish us against opening any other sources of expenditure.

It is an axiom that economy is the life-blood of Republics, and that it is robbery to take more money from the people than is barely sufficient for a wise and economical administration of public affairs. It ought to be engraven in letters of light on the walls of this Capitol, that Government has no more money than it obtains from the pockets of the people, and that it is a curse to have an overflowing Treasury. We are dazzled with the idea of a rich and magnificent Government, lavishly distributing its millions and attracting by its splendor the gaze of the world; but it is an ignis fatuus, luring but to destroy. We want a poor Government, and the people want light taxes and small expenditures. To quote from Mr. Calhoun:

"The purity and duration of our free institutions, looking to the vast extent of the country and its great and growing population, depend on restricting its revenues and expenditures, and thereby its patronage and influence, to the smallest amount consistent with the proper discharge of the few great duties for which it was instituted."

Having established the inequalities of the bill, the utter incapacity of the Government, with its present resources, to sustain this additional burden of eleven million dollars annually, and the necessity for more rigid economy instead of greater extravagance, I propose to advance a step further and suggest some general considerations in reference to this subject. The report accompanying the bill urges its passage "as an act to be done now to affect the future, constituting a military policy," and speaks of a liberal pension system as "almost a necessary consequence, while our military policy continues the same that it has been since the foundation of the Government." The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SAVAGE] who has special charge of the measure, in his able speech, enforced and elaborated the same view. No such stimulus is needed as is suggested in the report, and was argued by the gentleman from Tennessee, "to secure the love and confidence of our people," or to arouse "their ardor and patriotism to meet dangers yet to be encountered." It is a reproach to the valor and patriotism of our people to intimate that such sordid considerations control them in rallying to their country's standard in times of trial. The history of the country is luminous of the reverse. Every war in which we have been engaged bears honorable testimony of the contrary. When the "shrill trumpet and spirit-stirring drum and ear-piercing fife" are heard in the land, from mountain and vale, from town and country, the citizen soldiery flock, not to the "royal banner," but to the stars and stripes, as the "waves come when navies are stranded."

I may assume, however, from what we have heard, that the object and purpose of the advocates of this measure are to fasten the pension system upon the country, to give it permanence, to incorporate it into our political and military organism, and establish a precedent which may be conclusively pleaded in favor of the allowance of these bounties to all soldiers engaged in all subsequent wars. Whether so intended or not, a favorable decision on this bill—

"will be recorded for a precedent;
And many an error by the same example
Will rush into the State."

As our regular Army is constantly engaged in skirmishes with hostile and predatory Indians, you cannot stop short of all who are in the service. Pensions to the revolutionary soldiers cannot be justly used as a plea for this enlargement of the system. The Revolution had a special preeminence, lifting it above all other wars; and it is idle to assimilate to it the war of 1812 and cotemporary Indian wars. Half starved, half clad, tracking their course with blood, the hardships endured, the sacrifices made, the toils and privations undergone, by the heroes of 1776, find no parallel in later wars. It is not necessary to institute a comparison as to the courage and gallantry of the men in the two wars, or the value of their services. Suffice it to say that, in our revolutionary struggle, the Americans were regarded as rebels and traitors, and not unfrequently treated as such. The Government was unstable, precarious, and often inactive. "In journeyings often, in perils by their own countrymen, perils in the city, perils in the wilderness, in weariness and painfulness, in watchings often, in hunger and thirst, in cold and nakedness," the revolutionary soldiers fought against the mother country, and received their scant pittance in a depreciated currency. Very different was the war of 1812. It was a regular war between two independent nations, conducted, for the most part, according to the recognized rules of modern warfare. The soldier, when discharged from service, or before, received his pay in good money, and one hundred and sixty acres of land besides. The soldiers of the war of 1812 were gallant men; deserve well of their country; but wherein do they exceed in personal courage, value of services, or hazards of war, those engaged in the Seminole war in 1817; the Black Hawk war in 1832; the Florida war from 1835 to 1842; the Creek disturbances in 1836; or the Mexican war in 1846? There can be no distinction in principle. There is no talismanic superiority in service against British troops or the Indians during the war of 1812, over Mexican troops or the Indians, at a later period than 1815. If one be entitled, so are the others; and the passage of this bill inaugurates a policy which cannot be arrested. Vote this gratuity, distribute these bounties, and you array and ramify influences which, possessed of the precedent and acting on the defensive, will defy and defeat all efforts to arrest, or return to economy. The first man who proposed, in Rome, a gratuitous distribution of corn from the public granaries was condemned to suffer the punishment of treason. After a while the pensioners became so numerous that the most absolute and despotic emperors feared to interfere with their bounties. When Augustus came to power, he found three and twenty thousand citizens of the male sex (for females were excluded) enrolled as recipients of the public dole; and, while he confessed that these largesses were working unmitigated evil, he avowed, in later years, that, if he withdrew the gratuitous distributions, a successful rival would displace him, and restore them.

This question is argued as if the Government had unlimited power, and could sequester, at will, the property of its citizens. I do not belong to that school of politicians who invest Congress with the omnipotence of the British Parliament, and from the power "to lay and collect taxes," "to raise and support armies," "to provide and maintain a navy," claim sovereignty over property, and the uncontrolled right to appropriate it, as caprice or partiality or hate or benevolence may dictate. There is no sovereignty in Congress; and when we tax the people beyond what is necessary for an economical administration of the Government, to bestow bounties, gratuities, and pensions, we rob Peter to pay Paul; we oppress a majority to support a few favorites; we transfer the property of nine men to the tenth man. It was never intended to invest our Government with an absolute power over the property of the citizens. Our revolutionary struggle was a successful protest against the English notion of sovereignty over private property. Representation is a farce; popular elections are an abortion; constitutions are ropes of sand; our Revolution was a failure, if there is sovereign power over property in this Government. Clear grants of power, specific enumerations of objects of appropriation, reservations of undelegated power, were unnecessary if Congress can indulge a "sovereign, legislative patronage in favor of local, private, or individual interests." English kings have claimed the right to dispose of public and private property to favorites, to purchase adherents; but I have sought in vain for any word of the Constitution authorizing us to make donations, or bestow benevolence with the money of the people.

Great Britain has struggled for years to relieve herself of the excesses of her pension system, to make ministers responsible for the bestowment of her gratuities; and we, with the benefit of her experience, are gravely proposing to take up and adopt her exploded and condemned theories. Her experience ought to be an admonition to us; but, in the face of it, and without a clear ground of constitutional authority, we are copying a bad example.

The history of pensions, in other lands, is a history of frauds and abuses. Here we have men, rioting in luxury, begging to be quartered on the Government, and a greedy troop of cormorant speculators and claims agents, harpy-like, getting up instructions from Legislatures, and inciting a clamor for the "poor soldiers," many of whom would be fleeced of a large portion of what you propose so munificently to donate. In other countries, the system is reprobated; in this, its consequences will be most pernicious.

A class of consumers will be created, interested in sustaining a Government that supports them, who will advocate large expenditures, and may infuse poisonous opinions in the public mind. Crowned heads, by pensions, attach families to the throne, secure political influence, and enlarge their power. Congress, by its douceurs and gratuities, may extend the power and patronage of this Government, already alarmingly great, and raise up a class of "feeders upon legislative patronage," who are interested in giving a blind support to all its measures, and uninquiringly acquiescing in whatever may be done. I repeat, as there is no sovereignty in this Government—least of all, a sovereign power to take away the property of the citizens—and as Congress is but an agent or trustee, it cannot exercise powers not delegated, nor give bounties and do benevolence at the expense of those who created the Government.

Suppose we concede, for argument's sake, that the power to grant pensions and make gratuities and give away the public money as caprice or kindness prompts, was conferred in the Constitution: I should then hold that the system was unwise and inexpedient. It is bad policy to accustom men to look to Government for support. It is unwise to quarter soldiers or sailors, able-bodied and healthy, on the public Treasury. It is destructive of manly independence to rely on extrinsic means for subsistence. This whole matter grows out of a wrong conception of the duty and design of a free Government. Instead of having men as stipendiaries, instead of making Government an almoner of bounty, and converting it into a huge eleemosynary concern to dispense charity; instead of making it a sort of second-hand Providence, predestinating, regulating, and controlling the destiny and pursuits and industry of individuals, its duties are few, simple, and well defined. In France, Government may be expected to furnish employment for the working men; and, failing to do that, to supply them with bread and wages. But in France, the Republic has lapsed into a crushing military despotism. In Rome, the people may have been fed from public granaries; but it is recorded of her, that the days of her Republic were numbered when the people consented to receive corn from the Government cribs. In a free country, the citizen should, to a very great extent, under wise and just laws, be thrown on his own resources, and not slavishly rely upon the Government to give him bread and clothes, build his roads and houses, regulate his appetites, take care of his morals, and educate his children. Such a system centralizes the Government, enervates, paralyzes, and withdraws stimulus to personal effort and activity, reduces to dependence, destroys responsibility, debases, and demoralizes. All such legislation by Congress, whether in the form of protective tariffs, fishing bounties, assumption of State debts, building roads, giving land to colleges, or furnishing homes under sweeping and unconstitutional homestead laws, is at war with the true theory of a Republic, destructive of its integrity, and dangerous to popular liberty.

The wise and patriotic statesman at the head of this Government, in his inaugural and annual messages, strongly recommended us to scrutinize expenditures with the utmost vigilance, and to practice rigid economy. With an overflowing Treasury, this would have been difficult to do. With a depleted Treasury, nothing is easier. The Democratic party, responsible in a very great degree for the administration of public affairs, liberal in its promises to retrench and reform, owes it to its own self-respect, and, in view of the effort to reconstruct a new party, to its future success, to commence a rigid system of economy and retrenchment; to lop off all expenses not necessary for the defense of the country and the frugal administration of the Government; and to put an end, so far as it can, to waste, extravagance and fraud.

I am aware that it has been said that there is a natural tendency to extravagance in Republics; that a resort to direct taxation is the only cure for this chronic malady; and I believe, with Sir Robert Peel, that "all indirect taxation has a natural tendency to produce injustice;" yet, with proper efforts, with a cordial coöperation between the executive and legislative departments, this Government can be brought back to republican simplicity and economy. An earnest of our purpose will be given, and a great advance will be made in defeating this and similar bills, and rebuking this disposition to look to Government for the dispensation of its favors.

I do not desire, Mr. Chairman, to be understood as questioning, in the slightest degree, the laws providing for those who have been disabled in the service of their country. I think them eminently wise and proper. I have greatly failed, also, of my purpose, if anything that I have said can be construed into a disparagement of those brave and true men who, at their country's call, left home and kindred, and periled everything in her behalf. For their self-sacrificing patriotism, their heroic daring, their gallantry and courage, I would render all proper honor and reward. Many of them are my neighbors; scores of them I represent on this floor. The county of my residence bears the name of, and its shire town is located on, one of the memorable battle-fields of the bloody Indian war. I can have no motive for doing injustice to or underrating the services of our country's defenders. Sinister considerations might prompt me to the advocacy and support of this bill; but those who have encountered hardships and shed their blood for their country's honor, would scorn a gratuity tainted with injustice, and obtained by overriding the Constitution and bankrupting the Treasury.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, in the few remarks which I propose to make on the present occasion, if I can get the attention of the committee, I propose to refute some of the positions taken by the gentleman from Alabama who has just taken his seat, [Mr. CURRY.] I propose to show, if I can, that these pensions to the old soldiers of the war of 1812, should not be denied on account of the cost to the Government which it may involve and that the effect which the system may have had in Great Britain cannot be urged as an objection against the system which this bill proposes to establish. Sir, there is a great difference between the Government of Great Britain and our Government. That is a government of a crown, ours is a government of the people. They have a standing mercenary army. Our Government is upheld by the voice of the people. Our battles are fought and our victories won by the citizen soldiery; they stand far above the soldiers of the army of Great Britain, and are not to be judged by the same rule.

Nor can the Constitution be invoked to prohibit this Congress from granting money to pay the soldiers. It is proposed to be given as an evidence of the appreciation of the country for their services, and as an incentive to chivalric and generous patriotism upon the part of the people of the country.

The first proposition is, has the country the means or capacity to pay the pensions which this bill proposes to pay? It has been said by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CURRY] that our expenses have already run up enormously. He has given us a frightful picture of the extravagance of the Government—that the Treasury is well nigh bankrupt, while the appropriations are enormous; that they have increased from $13,000,000, under the Adams administration, to now nearly eighty million dollars per annum. The picture painted by the gentleman from Alabama is, I am sorry to say, lamentably true.

The gentleman from Alabama has informed us that this Government may be administered, if economy and prudence are practiced, for an expense not exceeding thirty million dollars per annum. I suppose that may be true. I presume my friend from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] would say that that is too much. I should say about fifty million dollars a year would be all-sufficient.

Well, sir, if we take the advice of the gentleman from Alabama, and reduce the expenses of the Government to a reasonable standard, we shall have abundant means on hand to pay the aggregate amount which this bill proposes to give to these meritorious men. The expense of printing, the large increase of the contingent fund, the expenses of the Army, and the expenses of every Department of the Government can, and ought to be, reduced, and but a small portion of the reduction which ought to take place would furnish the means to meet the provisions of this bill.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman who opened the debate upon this bill placed it upon two grounds. It is the policy of this Government to look upon its citizens as the palladium of its liberties. The citizens of the country form the army of the country. Our service is a volunteer service. It is a service voluntarily bestowed upon the country to protect it from foreign aggression or from intestine commotion. We do not look upon our citizens as serving for mere gain, as pressed into the service by draft to support the Government for mercenary motives. On the contrary—if the Government is to continue—we look upon our citizen soldiers as those on whom we can rely in the hour of difficulty and peril, because of their gallantry, and of their love of country. So long as the liberties of the country rest upon them, they rest upon a firm basis. But because the citizen soldier does not act from mercenary motives, does it follow that when he has served his country faithfully, when he has saved it from aggression, after he has conquered the foreign foe, after he has protected the peace of the country from insurrection, that we should give him no evidence in his declining years that the country appreciates his services, and appreciates his valor displayed upon the battle-field?

It is upon that ground that this bill is based. Mr. Chairman, the war of 1812 has been called the second war of independence. And why was it so called? Why has it been so denominated? It was because it was a war waged against Great Britain, in order to protect the sovereignty of this country. It was a war waged against Great Britain to maintain the rights of this country; to recognize the right of foreigners to expatriate themselves, and to transfer their allegiance to our flag. Great Britain denied the right of any person to transfer his allegiance from that crown to this country. That was the cause of the war. Great Britain denied our sovereignty and our independence, and formed an alliance against us with the Indian savages of our northwestern and western borders. These gallant men had to contend against such foes. They had to meet the British soldier and the Indian savage. And for their services, what was the pay then given to them? For all their toils, their sufferings, their valor, the pay of the private soldier was eight dollars per month. Was that any compensation to these men?

Are there any here from Kentucky who remember the commencement of the war of 1812? If there are, they will remember how eagerly the volunteers rushed to the standard of the United States. They will remember the surrender of Hull and the disasters which befell our arms. They can recall the partings of brothers and sisters, and wives and husbands, and fathers and mothers and sons. Did those fathers, sons, and brothers go for the pay of eight dollars a month; or did they go to wipe out, in the blood of the foe, the disgrace of Hull's surrender and other defeats? They were moved by patriotic motives, and by none other. They went to the war; and, fighting bravely against British soldier and Indian savage, they conquered an honorable peace. Not only did they secure an honorable peace, but they secured the territory out of which have been carved some of the northwestern States, which have now Representatives upon this floor and in the other House. They humbled the haughty arrogance of British power, and drove back the savages from our northwestern and western frontiers. Since then millions have flowed into the United States Treasury from the sales of the lands which they recovered from the grasp of the savage. This was done by the citizen soldiery who now come with their petitions asking that Congress shall soothe their declining years by affording them the pittance of a pension provided by this bill in addition to the pittance of their monthly pay given them at the time of the war—praying to the Representatives of the people that they shall not be allowed to suffer from penury and want in the midst of the wealth and prosperity of that country for which they fought. Shall their prayer be rejected? They are few in number; but, few or many, they deserve this acknowledgment at our hands.

Mr. Chairman, it has been stated here to-day that the estimates of the number of bounty land warrants given is a true ground to ascertain the number of pensioners under this bill. I deny that it is. Every gentleman who will reflect for a moment will see that it is a delusive basis for an estimate. Bounty land warrants were given to those who had been mustered into service; those who had been in service only for fourteen days. In my own State of Missouri I know of at least three thousand citizens who have received bounty land warrants, yet who would not receive a pension under this bill. In the Indian campaigns, in the Indian scouts, as they are termed in the West, citizens gather together hastily for mutual protection, serve for a short time, and return to their fields. Nobody supposes that these will receive any pension under this bill. They certainly are not provided for. Those who served in the Black Hawk war, in the Florida war, in the Mexican war, and in the Seminole war, are proposed to be included; but they are attempted to be embraced in the bill by those who wish to embarrass its passage.

Mr. COBB. I would like the gentleman to state the authority upon which he makes the statement that those amendments are offered to embarrass the bill? I myself have suggested amendments for those who were in the Florida war. I propose to include those who served in the Mexican war, as I had forgotten to include them in the amendment of which I have already given notice. I offered that amendment, and intend to sustain it. Now, upon what does the gentleman found his opinion that these amendments are proposed in order to embarrass the bill?

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I was not aware the gentleman moved the amendment to which he refers. I will give him my reasons for making the statement which I have made. Before answering him, I will ask him a question. Will the gentleman vote for the bill?

Mr. COBB. I will, if it be amended and put in proper form.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. If the soldiers of the Mexican war and the Seminole war be provided for in the bill, will the gentleman vote for it?

Mr. COBB. If it be otherwise properly amended I will.

Mr. ELLIOTT. The youngest of the soldiers of the war of 1812 must be sixty years of age, and I do not see what analogy can be shown between the soldiers of the war of 1812 and those of the Mexican war, by arguing that the soldiers of the Mexican war should also be pensioned.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I will answer the gentleman from Alabama. He asks me by what right I made the statement that the amendments to this bill are proposed to embarrass its passage? I made that statement first, for the reason that those who offer them are opponents of this measure.

Mr. COBB. I would like to know how the gentleman knows that?

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. My next reason is, that those who will claim under these amendments are not entitled to the consideration that those who are provided for by the bill; and no sensible man, regardless of the Treasury of the country, would commit such a waste of public money as to give pensions to the former. Therefore it is that I say that those who introduced such a proposition have no other purpose than to embarrass the bill.

Mr. COBB. If the gentleman will give me five minutes I will explain.

Mr. SAVAGE. I rise to a question of order. I contend that the gentleman from Missouri shall not be interrupted.

Mr. COBB. I am dealing with the gentleman from Missouri, and not with the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. KELLY. I object to this interruption.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I was proceeding, when interrupted, to show that the conclusion of the Pension Office, from the number of land warrants issued, was no guide to the number of pensioners under this bill, for the reason, as I stated before, that the law authorizing the issue of bounty land warrants included all who had been in the service as long as fourteen days, whether they had been in battle or not. This bill includes none except those who have served three months, or who had been in actual battle. The war with Mexico, the Seminole war, the Florida war, and all the Indian wars, down to the passage of this bill, are included in former pension laws. The present bill only includes such as served in the war of 1812, and in Indian wars during that period. How long is it since then? Forty-five years have elapsed since that war ended. How many of the gallant soldiers of the war of 1812, engaged either against the British or against the Indians, are now living?

The gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. SAVAGE,] the mover of this proposition, gave to the committee the other day a calculation based upon such facts as could be ascertained, showing that in all probability there cannot at this day be living more than seventeen thousand old soldiers who would be entitled to the benefits of this act.

Mr. CURRY. I wish to correct the gentleman. The estimates made as to the amount of pensions involved in this bill, drawn from the number of land warrants issued, did not apply to any land warrants issued except for service in the war of 1812.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I was saying that the gentleman's estimate shows that the number of soldiers living could not exceed seventeen thousand. What may be the number of widows who would be entitled to the benefits of this act, we cannot state; but I suppose that one half of the number I have mentioned would be a liberal calculation. On this basis, then, it is easy to calculate what amount of money will be necessary to execute this law. Sir, it is but a mere pittance. It is but a little more than is expended by this House for the printing. It is not as much as is expended for your line of ocean steamers, which is unnecessary for this Government. Provide this pension, and the Government would be enhanced in the estimation of the Christian world; its character would be preserved, and its policy would be strengthened.

I want to say a word or two in regard to those who have been engaged in Indian wars. All who are familiar with the history of the country know that in 1812 all our western frontier, including Indiana, Illinois, Missouri and Arkansas, was subject to Indian depredations. Our country was surrounded, from Tippecanoe westward and northward, with bands of savage foes, aided and supported by the British Crown, and in alliance with the British authorities. The gallant and brave pioneers who settled that portion of our country had to protect their own settlements by their own arms, to a great extent. They are provided for by this bill. In the State of Missouri, which I have the honor, in part, to represent, I have constituents, a portion of whom, in 1812, lived contiguous to forts erected by their own hands for their own protection. There are many among my constituents yet living, who fought the battles of their country during that war, who had to fight their own battles, and at the same time raise their crops for the support of their wives and children. Such are the patriotic and gallant men who now ask this Government—which has grown rich by their exertions and services; which has filled its Treasury by the sale of lands which they then conquered—to do them this act of justice, and give them this pittance. Will the Government not do it? Are those poor men to be turned away?

But gentlemen say this thing is contrary to the policy of the Government, and that it is insulting the character of American citizens to grant them pensions for having fought the battles of their country. They say that our citizen soldiers go to battle to maintain principles, and to preserve their liberty. The argument is unworthy of a statesman of this enlightened age, in my judgment. When you gave pensions to the revolutionary soldiers did you insult them? When you gave bounty land warrants to those who were engaged in the war of 1812—a war in which my friend from Alabama was engaged, and got his pension—did you insult them?

Mr. COBB. I was not engaged in that war. I was too young.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. When you gave bounty land to the soldiers of the war with Mexico, did you insult them? No man was insulted by reason of granting those bounty land warrants, and it would be the same in this case. So far from its insulting American citizen soldiers, it would be considered a hardship should you refuse to pass this bill.

By enacting this law, granting this pittance to the soldiers of the war of 1812, who have survived forty-five years, and the youngest of whom are now sixty-five or seventy years of age, you place a memento, a trophy, in the hands of the citizen soldier, which he can show to his children as an evidence that his country has given proof of its appreciation of his valor, of his prowess, and of his disposition to maintain the flag of his country in the hour of adversity and danger; you will strengthen the Government, and strengthen the arm of your defense, by giving these marks of approbation to our fellow-citizens who have marched to their country's rescue, and fought in its defense. I ask any gentleman here who may have drawn a bounty land warrant for military services, if he does not prize it more highly than he does any land warrant that he may have bought? Does not every gentleman know that the citizen who has received a land warrant as a mark of the appreciation by the Government of his services to the country, values it far more highly than he does any warrant that he has purchased? The distinguished gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL,] who commanded a regiment at the memorable battle of Buena Vista, when he received his land warrant, (if he has drawn it,) valued it not, I am sure, for the hundred and sixty acres of land to which it entitled him, but as an evidence awarded him by his country of his valor, his prowess, and the services he rendered that country. And so it is with all our citizen soldiers.

Mr. Chairman, I think this bill ought to pass, upon several grounds. In the first place, it ought to pass upon the ground of justice to the soldiers who were engaged in the war with Great Britain of 1812, and in the Indian wars. Sir, this Government is indebted to them to the amount which this bill provides for paying. This Government justly owes them this amount. If you were to take into account their labor, their toil, their sacrifices, their losses, all these would, if counted, place the Government far more largely in their debt than this bill proposes to provide for.

The bill ought to pass, sir, for the reason that these men have grown old, and that few of them remain. It ought to pass, and they should receive these pensions because of their valor, and of their distinction, and of what they have done for the country. They should receive some evidences that their services have been appreciated by the country, in order to stimulate the rising generation of our people by showing them that while the citizen soldier is not to be bought and is not a mercenary soldier, yet, after he has rendered service to the country, that country will not be less magnanimous than the citizen has been; but will give him an evidence of its appreciation of his services that will be far more valuable to him than dollars and cents.

I have made these remarks, sir, because I regard this as one of the greatest measures that has been introduced into the Congress of the United States since the passage of the bill providing pensions for the soldiers of the revolutionary war. Gentlemen seek to discredit this measure, by saying that it sets an example under which the soldiers of the war with Mexico will perhaps some day ask for pensions. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." If, after the expiration of forty-five years, it can be demonstrated that the Mexican war was of equal importance with the war with Great Britain in 1812, and that the distinguished men who commanded in that war and the brave men who fought its battles rendered the country as great service as the citizen soldiery did in 1812, I would say that you should pension them likewise.

I make these remarks, Mr. Chairman, in order that the ground which I take, the position which I occupy, the reasons which govern me, in supporting this bill, may be understood by the committee and by the country. I hope that the bill will pass. I am not particular whether or not it be passed in the precise shape in which it has been introduced; but I hope that some provision will be made to pension these soldiers in their declining years, so long as any of them shall survive.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I feel constrained by every noble and generous impulse of my heart—by those patriotic feelings that swell my bosom, at the mere mention of the American soldiery, to raise my feeble voice in support of the bill now under consideration—a bill to pension the surviving soldiers of the war of 1812. Sir, it is an interesting theme—one that appeals most earnestly and eloquently to all the tenderest sympathies of our nature. Would I possessed the ability so to present it that it should receive the unanimous support of the members of this House, as I am firmly persuaded its passage will be hailed with grateful emotions by a patriotic people, who are always willing and ever anxious suitably to reward faithful and eminent services.

But, sir, although I feel myself inadequate to the task, I cannot, I dare not, let this opportunity pass without contributing my humble mite to an object at the same time so noble, so necessary, and so pregnant with all that is calculated to smooth gently to the tomb the last declining days of those who, in their manly youth, bared their bosoms to the foe's steel, and, amid the din and smoke of battle, bore aloft their proud country's flag.

Sir, of all that serried host who fought the battles of our last war with England, either on the Atlantic seaboard, or along our frontier, on those sea-like lakes, or in the more distant wilderness, where the stealthy savage trod, and his dreaded yells were encountered, how few now survive! Time, in its onward sweep, has driven them to the cold embraces of death. The few that now remain, bending beneath the pressing weight of years, are lifting their feeble voices, scattered here and there throughout our beloved country, earnestly invoking us to make some provision for them, now far advanced in the evening of life. Do they not richly deserve it? Let us glance for a few moments at the prominent circumstances by which it is pressed upon our consideration.

Our revolutionary struggle wrested an empire from the mother country. She never ceased to mourn the jewel she had lost. England, haughty and imperious England, had no practical experience of the solidity of the new Government our illustrious fathers had established. She, and indeed other European nations, deemed this Union but a "rope of sand," and that, by consequence, the surest way to sever it, and restore again her coveted sway over this fair land, was to agitate, irritate, trammel, and disturb us. We were an active, enterprising people, adapted to commerce, and constantly pressing, with indomitable energy, our inquiries into every sea. But it was claimed, with arrogant insolence, "Britannia rules the wave." We were obtruding on her native element. "She sat a queen, and would allow no rivalry."

The youthful commerce of these States had, from the period of the recognition of our nationality, been subjected to harassing seizures, searches, and spoliation, until unbearable oppressions roused our people to resistance; and then began, in fact, the second war of independence.

Sir, the patriotic statesmen, our noble predecessors in these legislative halls, impelled by a just and proper appreciation of the rights, honor, and dignity of this nation, determined to resist these European encroachments. A wise and patriotic President, one of the nobles of the Old Dominion, "the fruitful mother of heroes and statesmen," sanctioned the resolves. "Free trade and sailors' rights," was the tocsin sounded through the land; while on the boisterous deep, our gallant tars made true and recognized the aphorism of an illustrious champion, "Millions for defense, not one cent for tribute." Sir, it was in a war thus caused and prosecuted for these noble objects which was waged alike on sea and land, that the gallant and patriotic men were engaged, for whose declining days this bill would make some small provision.

Mr. Chairman, let me call the attention of the House to this meritorious class to whom, in my judgment, we should extend the bounty of Government. Let us glance hastily at the past. Hear that clarion voice of the immortal Clay in streams of burning eloquence, as from the floor of Congress he aroused the people to redress the humiliating outrages that had been committed upon the rights of our citizens, the honor and dignity of our nation, and the glorious flag of our country, by expelling a haughty and invading foe. That call was responded to with a patriotic ardor and enthusiasm that pointed with unerring certainty to the triumphant termination of the fearful and bloody conflict. Behold them at Lundy's Lane; at Plattsburg; at Chippewa; at the Thames; at the Moravian Towns. Look upon that noble and gallant band of citizen soldiers at Tippecanoe and North Point; see what prodigies of valor are exhibited! How they triumph over the veteran troops of the merciless foe, or the savage horde who were let loose upon our frontiers! Look, sir, at the last, but most brilliant and glorious engagement of war, when the veteran troops of Wellington, who, in the wars of the Peninsula and the south of France, had triumphed over Soult and Davoust and Ney, who had borne well their standard on many a hard-fought field, came to try their hands with volunteers and raw troops upon our southern border. Sir, while Pakenham marched his troops—his veterans—to what he and they supposed would be an easy victory, under the cry of "beauty and booty," see those noble, chivalrous sons of Tennessee and Kentucky, and of other infant western States, under the lead of the immortal Jackson, repel and defeat them. And now, Mr. Chairman, has this great country—rich in power, more rich in promise—no boon at all for those who, at the peril of their lives, saved her cities from pillage, her daughters from a brutal foreign soldiery or an unrelenting savage foe? "Tell it not in Gath," publish not this withering shame among the nations of the earth, lest they declare it is Republics only can be so ungrateful.

Sir, many of these men have already passed away. They went down to their graves, many of them stricken with poverty, emaciated with disease, or scarred with wounds acquired in their country's service. Oh how sad their end. Perchance their dying eye, as it grew dim, looked on some distant dome or staff, on which floated in heaven's free breeze, that flag, that glorious flag, those "broad stripes and bright stars" to which in the perilous fight their patriotic hearts had so often turned, in the days of their strength and their vigor. It was the same flag still; but alas, with what crushing effect did the mournful reflection force itself upon them. "My country has forgotten, has neglected me. Ungrateful country. In my age it thinks not of my youth, and I die in poverty, unhonored by those for whom the strength of my manhood was expended." Sir, this is no fancy sketch; too truly has it been realized by many of those noble men who have now passed away. They have gone—fought their last battle—met their last foe: peace be to their ashes.

But among us there still lingers upon the crumbling brink of the grave, here and there, some of their compatriots—spared, perhaps, by Heaven's unfailing mercy, to reproach us with our cold neglect, and to be the means, possibly, of inducing us, even in this late day—almost too late—to awake to a sense of our duty, and show to a selfish, heartless world, that we cannot, will not, longer shut our ears and bar our hearts against the appeals made by the remnant of this noble band, who, inspired by a lofty spirit of patriotism and devotion to country never yet surpassed, left, in the early days of their manhood, their fond homes, families, and friends, and with unfaltering step, marched to meet their country's foe, enduring hunger and thirst, heat and cold, again and again, with no bed upon which to repose their wearied bodies but their mother earth; no covering save the canopy of heaven. Behold these veterans now: methinks they are left as witnesses, as mementoes of the past! There they stand, as does some tall oak of the forest, spared by the devastating tornado; their fellows have fallen; the blast which felled them, which prostrated them to the earth, almost dismantled these; their foliage is gone; their beauty has passed away. Now, they only spread their branches to the wintry blast; decay has seized upon them, and ere long they will mingle with the mother earth. Oh! sir, shall the bounty of the Government smooth their departure, or will you still neglect them? Sir, I cannot yet realize the idea that you will turn them away empty. Long and earnestly have they implored help—patiently have they waited. They have knocked at your doors for bread. They have asked for those with whom they were acquainted—for Clay, for Jackson, for Harrison, for Johnson, for Shelby, for Davis! These were their associates and compeers! These knew of their toils and hardships, their privations and sufferings! Some of these had seen them not only in the tented field, but amid the clash of arms and the smoke of battle. From them they would not be turned away in their appeal; but when they now knock, strange forms are present; hitherto youth has rejected age, and these old warriors have been suffered to pine, because a new generation had arisen on the stage.

Oh! sir, shall it be said that an American Congress refused a pitiful bounty to veterans who fought our battles, achieved for us our glory, aided in giving us the first place among the nations of the earth, and that, too, while we are spending millions in useless appropriations and for public ornaments? Surely this will not be the case. No; let us be just to the aged, to the valiant. I utter no words of reproach against the magnificence of our public buildings, although many tens of millions have been expended in their construction and adornment. Doubtless this is right. Our Government is great, our people wealthy and prosperous, and these public edifices are but durable exemplars of our glory and power, speaking to other nations. I declaim not against this magnificent Hall, in which we legislate for the people of this great nation. We are their Representatives, and this Hall should reflect their glory. But, sir, while these vast expenditures are making—while in mere ornaments we are expending millions—oh! do not let us refuse that which should be freely given to the needy veteran. While we enjoy here, as Representatives, all the elegant and luxurious comforts that the highest artistic skill and taste can furnish for both the eye and the body—while we are each receiving thousands of dollars annually for our services here, oh! let us not plead poverty when a veteran, war-worn soldier, knocks and asks a boon. Let us come to his aid now, while he is before us—while he needs our help and assistance. Let us not wait until he has passed away before he receives our commiseration, indorsed by evidence of our sincerity. Let us not turn his pleading face, his furrowed cheek, his emaciated frame, his tottering limbs, away by cold indifference to his pressing necessities. Look upon that aged brow, upon which the snows of more than three-score winters have already fallen; behold these men as they approach you with feeble limbs and decaying bodies, hobbling to the tomb, leaning on their staffs, asking this great and mighty nation to smooth their pathway to their final resting-place. Tell me how long, think you, will these old soldiers be a charge upon your bounty if you pass this bill? Soon they will pass away; the lengthening shadows proclaim with them, as with all, the day is fast closing. Soon, alas! too soon, the last of that noble company will have passed from earth. Hasten, oh! hasten, you Representatives of a noble, magnanimous, and patriotic constituency, or your lingering munificence will come too late for them.

You have given pensions to our revolutionary sires; where was the American heart in all this land that did not enthusiastically respond to the noble and patriotic act? You have given pensions to others; to the honor of the nation be it said, no voice is heard to object. Be just, also, to those for whom I plead. Doubtless, there are some of these veterans who, in point of fact, will not starve, even if you do not pass this bill. Friends, children, some one, will look to their well being, even if you give them nothing. But, sir, should that exempt this great Government from the performance of its duties? Were all of these men rich, did each possess an ample competence, still, would this be a sufficient reason why this bill should not pass, and these men be offered a pension? Surely not. Two things are provided for in this bill—one carries the other. The pension is a substantial boon; to many it will be the means of living pleasantly, and dying independently; but beyond this, and with many greatly better and more desirable than this, is the fact that this bill, though long deferred, is nevertheless a valuable recognition of their services to the nation.

Sir, the passage of this bill will throw a bright radiance across the path of many a veteran. He will feel, in his old age, that the country for which he fought in his early manhood has not cast him off neglected and uncared for, when he is old and gray-headed. He will feel that the flag of his country and its protecting folds are around him, as he advances to the house of death. He will gather his children, his grandchildren, around him, and tell them of his joys; he will recount his trials, point to his wounds, and then tell of his gratitude for the boon granted to him. Oh! how will those hearts that hear him swell with patriotic devotion to the country of their sire. And if occasion should ever offer, how ardently and efficiently will they vindicate its rights against any invading foe!

These veterans were, many of them, the pioneers who explored and conquered your great western empire. They drove the savage from his possession; and interposing their manly valor, protected your infant settlements, and aided in their advancement.

Look, sir, at Shelby, at Harrison, at Joe Davis, at Johnson; how much did these, and those they led to battle, contribute, at the Maumee Towns, at Detroit, at the Thames, at Tippecanoe, to the present glory of the great States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Michigan?

Chiefly these troops were from the warlike States of Kentucky and Tennessee; and I call to-day on the Representatives of these States to come up and contribute their united help in doing justice to the men with whom their fathers associated, and doubtless aided in equipping many of them for the field of battle. Come, and give these veterans the recognition of your appreciation of their services. Come, ere they die asking for it. Come, give the aid demanded, that their hearts may bless you and the country. Come, "pity the sorrows of these poor old men, whose trembling limbs have borne them to your door." Take away from their fading minds the terrible dread that their country is ungrateful. Let your bounty cheer them along the dreary pathway of declining life. Let not their sun set in gloom and sorrow. Fill their hearts with gladness, by your justice and liberality, that their dying prayers may fervently ascend to heaven for the perpetuity of our Union, and the continued prosperity of our country.

Sir, let us pass this bill—pass it speedily. Let all vote for it. Let it be proclaimed all through the land that this Congress has thought of, and cared for, the veteran soldiers of the war of 1812; and I doubt not the people will all, with one approving voice, say we have nobly done our duty. In the name and for the honor of the country of Washington and Jackson, I demand the passage of this bill. In the name of justice and patriotism, I demand it. And although some of them may not absolutely need the pecuniary aid, all demand, and very properly, this recognition of their services by the Government for which they have fought and suffered; and because some of them may and do absolutely require this little aid, that they may pass the evening of their days with some degree of comfort.

In conclusion, having promised to divide my time with the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MASON,] permit me to say, that I firmly trust that there is in this House too much of patriotism, of magnanimity of heart, longer to defer this meritorious act. Feeling deeply the necessity and importance of speedy and efficient action on this great subject, I have ventured to obtrude these views, with the sincere hope that they may meet your favorable consideration, and eventuate, in some small degree at least in bringing your judgments to a favorable conclusion.

Mr. QUITMAN. Mr. Chairman, I have sought the floor at this time, not for the purpose of making a speech, but merely for the purpose of presenting, as briefly as may be, my objection to this bill. The grounds upon which I oppose it have been so fully covered by the very able and lucid speech of the honorable gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. CURRY,] that little is left for me to say. I merely desire to explain the position which I hold upon this subject. I have taken that position, sir, not from impulse or personal feeling, but from a high sense of duty to the country.

I beg to say, in the first place, that I am not opposed to an invalid pension system, such as now exists. On the contrary, I think it is the duty of every Government to provide the means of subsistence for the families of those who have been killed in the service of the country, and also to provide for those who have been disabled in its service. These are duties incidental to every Government. But, sir, when we come to a system which is to lay burdens upon one portion of the community for the purpose of giving bounties to another, however meritorious, I am opposed to it in any shape. I think that such a system is demoralizing in its effects, and inconsistent with the essential principles of free government. There as a reason, and perhaps a good reason, to which I might have yielded if the question had arisen in my day, for extending pensions to the soldiers of the Revolution; but I would only have done so in that case, upon the ground that it was a debt due to them which had never been paid.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ANDERSON] has given us a glowing account of the services of the soldiers of the war of 1812. I concur with him entirely in his estimate of the value of those services. But, sir, he has incorrectly represented the soldiers of the war of 1812 as paupers and beggars, petitioning Congress for a little pittance to support them in their declining years! He has addressed solely the commiseration and not the good judgment of the House. Let not the gentleman forget that this bill includes all those who served for three months in the war of 1812; not only the brave soldiers, but even those New York militia, who, during the battle of Queens-town, refused to cross the Niagara river for the relief of their own countrymen, because they took the constitutional ground that they were not obliged to cross the boundary line of our country. These men are included in the bill, and our pity is invoked for the purpose of inducing us to vote for this proposition. Sir, it is a new proposition. The measure giving pensions to the soldiers of the Revolution was strongly contested by some of the ablest men of the day.

The principles upon which they founded their objections were probably correct; but the pensioning of the soldiers of the Revolution was justified upon the ground that they had never been fully paid. If they were paid at all, they were paid in a depreciated currency, so that none of them received in value the full amount of his contract. Now, it is proposed that we should extend the same system to the war of 1812, and to the Indian wars. The reasons assigned by the gentleman who made the opening speech, and who reported this bill, [Mr. SAVAGE,] are precisely those which are applicable to every war in which the country has been, or may be hereafter, engaged.

It is urged that to adopt such a system as the permanent policy of the country would keep up a military spirit in the country. God forbid that we should ever come to that, that American citizens should be influenced by the hope in future of receiving a mere pittance in the shape of bounty from the General Government.

The gentleman is mistaken in attributing such motives to our citizens. He does injustice to those who have been engaged in the volunteer service of the country during the Mexican war. He puts them upon the footing of having been influenced by mercenary considerations. Before the Mexican war it had not been proposed to extend the system beyond the war of the Revolution, or if it had been proposed it had been rejected by Congress; and yet when it was announced that the President was authorized to accept the services of fifty thousand men, to use the language of the President, he was overburdened by the application of more than three hundred thousand men. Yes, three hundred thousand men sprang up upon the first blast of his bugle inviting them to the field of the Mexican war. Were they influenced by the hope hereafter of getting a pension? The country had thus far decided against extending the revolutionary pensions.

I cannot doubt that they were influenced by higher and nobler motives—by patriotism, by honor, and by their desire for military distinction.

Sir, I ask gentlemen who are here advocating this bill, and who occupied prominent stations in the Mexican war—I ask the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. SAVAGE,] the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. CURTIS,] the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL,] including myself, whether we desire any reward for holding the positions which we held during that war? No, sir, not such as is proposed by this bill. We looked to a nobler reward than that of a mere pecuniary compensation. I hope we were actuated by higher motives, and felt some of that proud spirit which distinguished the soldiers of the Revolution, many of whom refused to receive the compensation to which they were entitled by law, and who went to their graves without ever having made application under the revolutionary pension law. I think, therefore, that the public reasons urged by the honorable gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SAVAGE] for establishing the system proposed by this bill as the permanent policy of the country, on the ground that it would keep up the military spirit of the country, are reasons not at all applicable.

It is true, sir, that some of the bravest and best of the officers of the war of 1812, have united in making application to Congress for the passage of this bill, but they united in it, because, like all other men, they desired some public consideration. They wished to know whether their services to the country had been forgotten or not—from a strong disposition to present themselves before the public. They feared that time and an intervening war had caused the people to forget those services. Forget them, we cannot. We cannot forget some of the scenes of that war which shed so much glory upon the American arms. No, sir; I hope we shall never reach that period when it shall be necessary to force upon the consideration of the country the eminent services of men who have fought the battles of the country. For myself, I shall never take any steps to have the memory of my own services perpetuated, if it is to be brought about by exertions of my own. I do not see, Mr. Chairman, the soundness of the reasons urged in the eloquent speech of the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. SAVAGE. I beg that the gentleman will not do injustice to the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions. My honorable friend from Kentucky, [Mr. JEWETT,] as a member of that committee, was, by its indulgence, permitted to report this bill to the House.

Mr. QUITMAN. I of course refer to the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, who reported the bill. I say that the same reasons which the gentleman from Tennessee urged in support of a system which would give a pension to every man engaged in the war of 1812, and in the various Indian wars since that time, are equally applicable to every other war. How is it just that the soldiers of one war should receive the bounty of the Government, and those of another war, who did equally as good service, and who incurred equal dangers, should be excluded?

But if it be admitted that these men entered the service from mercenary motives, I take it for granted that it is to be established as the permanent policy of the country; I take it for granted that it is but the entering wedge for what is to follow; and according to my own calculations which I have made—I will not go into details, for I have not the data before me, I did not expect to speak on this subject to-day—I say that, according to my estimate, it is the beginning of a system which will involve an annual expense of not less than $40,000,000.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CURRY] has well said that in republican governments where the people are influenced by motives such as the passage of a bill like this will create, although they may be in a numerical minority, they will always hold an influence which will control this or any other Congress.

If these applicants have their claim entertained, or a hope is held out to them that this policy will be pursued, then all the surviving soldiers of all the subsequent wars will come here and demand, as an act of justice, that they shall have a like treatment, and those who support this measure will be bound to yield to that demand, for it is just that you should treat one citizen as you do another. I look upon this, then, as extending the system to all the wars in which we have been engaged.

Not to stop there, how long will it be before the widows and orphan children of those who served for a month will come here and ask the reason why they are excluded? Practically those who served for only a month may have done more service than those who served for six months. Will it not be extended, then, to those who served only for fourteen days, as the bounty land law has been extended? And upon what ground can orphan children be refused, who are unable to take care of themselves? While the soldier was living, a pension was granted to him; and now that he is dead, on what ground can his orphan children be refused? This is the introduction of a principle which will not stop until all are embraced. It will, in the end, make up a pension list of between five and six hundred thousand persons, perhaps a million. If gentlemen will examine the bill, they will find that the average pension will be $150 for each pensioner. Look, then, at the fearful burden with which we will oppress the Treasury.

It ought to be a conclusive argument that the Government has not the ability to bear so onerous a burden, if it were constitutional to adopt the principle—which I deny. Where do you find power in the Constitution for granting benevolences? where the power to make presents to our citizens? If we give this pension to the soldier who has served his country, has not the aged statesman an equal right to a pension for his service in his country's behalf? Is not every man who has been engaged in his country's service equally entitled to a pension, whether he served with or without compensation? The soldier received his pay, as it was stipulated when he entered the service. How long will it be before the system will be extended to the aged statesman, the aged officeholder, and those who have, up to their old age, been in the service of the country?

But I must hurry on. I promised not to occupy the time of the House to any great extent. This system carried out, sir, would not stop short of the annual expenditure of from twenty-five to fifty million dollars. But, outside of that, I believe that this Government has not the power, under the Constitution, to grant these pensions. Is it right in a free Government, in which all are equal, for the Government to withdraw one class of citizens from the field of enterprise and labor, where they may secure a subsistence, to place them under its bounty? Ought not the citizen to be left free and untrammelled in his occupation?

Is it not the best policy to encourage the citizen to seek out his own livelihood, that the republican spirit may be preserved for the integrity of our institutions? Induce them to give up their enterprises; leave them with no care for their livelihood; let them be fed from the public crib, and how can we depend upon them to maintain intact the independence and free spirit of our fathers? Is it not, then, an important consideration that we should endeavor to prevent the demoralization of our citizens? Do not let it be known that we will distribute money, but let the policy be that each should, as the other, depend upon his own toil and enterprise for the means of living.

For all these considerations—and I have had time only to state my leading objections to the bill—I will be constrained, with all my respect for those gallant veterans, to vote in the negative.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, there are only a few moments left for the general debate on this measure, and I will occupy them in replying to some of the objections which have been made to it. When I have concluded my remarks I will propose that the committee recommend to the House that the general debate on this bill be extended for a longer period. I presume that there will be no objection in the House to rescinding the order terminating debate. I see several gentlemen here who wish to speak on the subject. I think the bill is deserving of full and faithful consideration.

Mr. Chairman, who have been petitioning Congress for years for this measure? They are the heroes of the war of 1812, who turned out and periled their lives for the country and for our defense, when you and I were helpless infants, unconscious of surrounding peril, and the dangers and sufferings of those who rallied to our standard. These soldiers of the last war with Great Britain have come to Congress to ask for the same consideration that was granted to the heroes of the Revolution; and it seems to me it is but fair that we should consider their claim and determine whether they are entitled to similar regard and distinction.

But, in reply to the argument of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. QUITMAN,] who has just taken his seat, an argument which has been made to this House frequently before, that this bill is going to peril the Treasury of this country, that it is going to involve us in millions of annual expenditure, I would say that it does not seem to me necessary to open the door so wide as it is imagined by those who are opposed to it. It does not follow that because we grant pensions to a class, that all other classes are likely to be added to the expense. I reiterate the question: who are making this application? They are men who, forty-five years ago, left the military service of their country, and returned to their families and civil pursuits. If they were then twenty years of age, they are now sixty-five; and if they were twenty-five years of age, they are seventy years old to-day. They are, therefore, old men, not able to obtain a livelihood by physical labor. We propose by this bill not to give them a sum as a mere gratuity, for those old men would scorn a pension if you place it upon the ground of a gratuity. They are not paupers; they do not come here as trembling supplicants at your doors in the character of beggars before Congress. I denounce and deprecate such an imputation. They come as your sires, as your soldiers and conquerors or your dominions, who fought for and maintained your country, your liberty, and they now ask, and I demand for them, what, by the usage of other nations and countries, and adopted by ours, they justly deserve, a token of gratitude due them for thus periling their lives and exhausting the most precious period of their mature age in the military service of their country.

About twenty-one years of a man's life is devoted in pupillage, and after he becomes sixty-three years of age he is considered no longer a producer. There is then only about forty-two years of a man's life in which he can expect to accumulate wealth and power by his personal exertions. Even though men live to be four score years and ten, there are only forty-two years of that time in which they can regard as positive, the rest is negative, in a mathematical point of view. During forty-two years they are producers, and if they live twelve septennials—eighty-four years—they have been forty-two years consumers. If out of that time they devote a portion to the service of their country, it is taken from the best portion of their productive age of life, and I say it is the custom of all countries to regard those services with special honors, and to compensate them with marked distinction. Those who speak against the custom speak against the custom of the world, and a custom long since, and, I think, wisely adopted by this country. If you dread a perpetual standing Army maintained at a great expense, reward those who turn out to vindicate their country's rights and honor, as did the brave men of the Revolution, and of the war of 1812. Compensate them as is done by the custom of other nations, and thereby avoid the expense of a large standing Army that moves by commands, and not from patriotic emotions.

How will you compensate your soldiers? They were not paid while they were in the service. The men who enter the service of the United States get, in fact, no adequate consideration for their services when they are rendered. What is seven or eight dollars a month? The policy of the country is not to pay at a rate that will give men the means of spending beyond their actual necessities, for it is an incumbrance, and detrimental to the service for men to have more money than will supply their actual physical wants. A surplus in the field is an inducement to dissipation. They are not paid then while in the service, but when they come back to civil life, and in their declining years become unable to accumulate, they must be supported and the State may then do them justice. Is it opening the door too wide to say that men of seventy-five or eighty years of age, who, after serving for nominal or no pay as soldiers, have served society forty-four or forty-five years, shall be taken into consideration, and rewarded for sacrifices, losses, and disparagements sustained in your service? It has been shown by tables presented here that there are but about fifteen thousand of them remaining. It was a policy adopted and published by the Emperor of France during the Crimean war, that the children of those who fell in the service of their country, should be the children of the Empire, and the policy of this country should be that the children of those who serve and fall for their country, shall be the children of this Republic. Such a motive and such a stimulant, I believe, will induce the people of this country to rush to arms when occasion requires, and prevent the necessity of our having the perpetual expense and other inconveniences incident to a large non-producing military class in our country.

Include, then, if you please, only the children of those who fell, or who received wounds while in the service of their country, and those survivors who have attained the age of sixty-five or seventy years, and you will not include such a vast number as to seriously impair the Treasury of the country. Reward those men for their gallantry, who in their youth left home and family, and the opportunity of starting a fortune, for the purpose of serving their country, and you will preserve the military ardor in the State, and thus avoid a greater expense, which is threatening to overbalance all the rest of the national expenses. I therefore put this bill, as I did that of the volunteer bill, on the ground of justice and national economy.

But an argument is made against the bill on account of its discrimination between the common soldiers and the officers—in this: that officers are to be paid a little more than privates. How unfair such an argument is. Did you ever hear of a bill, relating to pay or pensions to soldiers, which did not make that distinction? What is the reason of the discrimination between the pay of a member of Congress and the pay of a common soldier, who serves his country now? Why does not the gentleman propose to cut down his own salary, which is more per diem than was the soldier's per month, who served his country in 1812? Why do gentlemen complain of a discrimination, when they are receiving $300 per month, while the soldier is receiving only ten dollars per month. It ill becomes us members of this branch of service, who are receiving liberal compensation, to complain of a discrimination, which has always existed, between the pay of common soldiers and officers. Is that an argument which goes to the merits, or is it an appeal to prejudice and popular emotions?

Mr. GARTRELL. I ask the gentleman if he alludes to me?

Mr. CURTIS. No, sir; on the contrary, I was going to observe that, to avoid the objection entertained by some, I am going to vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GARTRELL] to the bill, for the purpose of meeting and avoiding the consequence of this argument, unjust and ungenerous as it is. I will yield something due the officers for the sake of securing to them and the poor soldiers of this country, who have long urged Congress to hear and compensate their demands.

The amendment of the gentleman I consider as an amendment made in good faith, calculated to aid in the final passage of the bill. But I am sorry to see gentlemen disposed to defeat this bill by every means, by eloquence, power, and influence, as well as adding irrelevant and extravagant amendments; and by thrusts, scoffs, and indirections, designing to defeat the bill. I am determined, therefore, to yield anything which, while doing only partial justice to the officers, will not do injustice to the soldiers.

But let me say one word more upon this subject of paying more to officers than to soldiers, for the argument goes to pay just as fairly as to pensions. When an officer goes into the service he generally makes greater sacrifices than the common soldier. I say that those gentlemen upon this floor who went as officers to Mexico generally made much greater sacrifices than the young men did, who volunteered and served as privates. Did you not leave your offices, your farms, your professions, your families? Officers were generally of riper years, and had by toil, study, or distinguished service, acquired more and commanded more for their service as civilians, otherwise they would not have been chosen to take upon themselves, not only an equal amount of exposure and toil, but also a vast amount of care, anxiety, and responsibility, that a private does not encounter. And after an officer has left the service he is harassed and taxed during the whole period of his life with explanations and testimony, which he has to furnish without compensation to secure the rights of those who served under him. All who have commanded volunteers will appreciate the service here presented, for most of us have written volumes since we retired from the service for the accommodation of the public. The officer has made greater sacrifices, constantly incurs greater expense of living, and he ought to receive a higher pay or pension; and there is not a common soldier in the United States who would not admit that it is right. Still I am willing to forego that feature of the bill in order to obviate the objection which gentlemen, in good faith, seem to entertain to this bill.

I have endeavored to meet the argument that this measure opens the door too wide, by showing that you need not include all those who served. You can take only those who are seventy-five years of age and over. But gentlemen try to make out that this measure will cost the Government many millions each year. One gentleman said that it would cost the Government at least eleven million dollars a year, when it is shown unquestionably that there are only about fifteen thousand of these men now living. I submit that the pension will not average $100 a man per annum, even if we pension the officers, as this bill proposes, and that will only be one million and a half per annum, according to my figures. I am strengthened in this belief by the result of the revolutionary pension bill. That law of 1832 was made to pension all revolutionary soldiers, and the whole amount appropriated to pensioners under that law in 1836, when the law was fairly in full operation, was $683,024 70. So that this argument of the extraordinary draft upon the Treasury is not well founded. Taking the figures and the results of the revolutionary pension law, everything goes to show that the estimate is too high.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUITMAN] alluded to further encroachments upon the Treasury by the additional claims. I answer that by saying that it is not necessary to bring men in until they are seventy-five years of age. That is the rule we are adopting in this bill, as it will not pass until forty-five years have transpired since the service, and therefore the recipients will be near that age.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Will the gentleman explain in what respect the calculation read by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CURRY] is erroneous.

Mr. CURTIS. The gentleman from Alabama read an estimate which is predicated upon the principle that the pension law and the bounty land law were similar. They are entirely dissimilar. This pension law includes every man who served three months, and the other includes those who only served fourteen days. Now, it is well known, to those familiar with the history of the war of 1812, that hundreds and thousands of men turned out in Ohio, Pennsylvania, and other States, for the purpose of restoring the confidence of the country after the defeat of Hull, and on other extraordinary occasions, serving only a few days, and all those men were included under the bounty land law; but they are not included under this pension bill. The vast numbers of what were denominated "minute men" come under the bounty land law, which this bill excludes, because they did not serve three months.

Another argument urged against this bill, and to which some weight seems to be attached, is, that it is an appeal to mercenary motives; that the motives of our brave volunteers are too exalted to admit of money compensation. Now, that argument would seem to imply that we should never pay our soldiers; that those who fight for their country should never be paid at all, because, per-adventure money would corrupt their morals! It is an old maxim and a very true one, inculcated too in view of exalted benevolence, that "the laborer is worthy of his hire." True, as the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] presented, our soldiers of the last war moved from patriotic motives; but their patriotism is not impeached by patriotic acknowledgments, and their honor is not tarnished by making them the honored guests of a great nation. I trust that a nation's pride, and our national escutcheon is in more danger of reproach by negligence of those soldiers of 1812. Look to your own honor, and what is worse, the reflections that may be cast on your country; for spending $75,000,000 for various extravagant items, and withholding from the aged and infirm soldiers who fought, secured, and transmitted to us a glorious inheritance of freedom, which we now enjoy.

[Here the hammer fell, the hour having arrived at which debate upon the bill was closed, by the order in the House.]

Mr. FOSTER moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BURNETT reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the special order, being House bill (No. 259) granting pensions to the officers and soldiers of the war with Great Britain of 1812, and those engaged in Indian wars during that period, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. FLORENCE asked the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill, of which previous notice had been given, for reference merely.

Mr. HARLAN objected.

And then, on motion of Mr. BURNETT, (at four minutes to five o'clock p. m.,) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, April 23, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. J. C. GRANBERY.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. BROWN. I have a memorial of a large number of citizens and property holders in the city of Washington, residing on or near Pennsylvania avenue, east of the Capitol, in which they represent that that portion of the avenue is now in an exceedingly dilapidated and almost impassable condition, and pray that an appropriation may be made for its improvement. I ask leave to introduce it, and have it referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, hoping that they will take the subject into consideration. I wish to say in this connection that, though I am not willing to make appropriations out of the national Treasury, generally, for the improvement of the avenues and streets of Washington, yet, as this is for the avenue leading directly to the Capitol, the navy-yard, the Congressional Burying Ground, and other points to which members of Congress and others have generally to pass, I am in favor of the memorial, and hope, at the proper time, that Congress will grant a reasonable appropriation to put that portion of the avenue in proper order. I move its reference to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

It was so referred.

Mr. SEWARD presented additional papers in relation to the claim of Martha Brown; which were referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. MASON presented a resolution of the Legislature of Virginia, in favor of the final settlement of half pay to the officers of the revolutionary war promised by resolutions of the Continental Congress; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PAPERS RECOMMITTED.

On motion of Mr. SEWARD, it was Ordered, That the adverse report on the petition of Martha Brown, be recommitted to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. FOSTER. I am instructed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 133) to extend an act approved the 3d day of February, 1853, entitled "An act to continue half pay to certain widows and orphans," to report it back, and recommend that it be indefinitely postponed. The committee at the same time have instructed me, to supply its place, to report a bill (S. No. 297) to extend an act entitled "An act to continue half pay to certain widows and orphans," approved February 3, 1853. The bill was read and passed to a second reading.

Mr. CLARK, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of James Hendebert, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, from the Committee on Military Affairs, and the militia, to whom was referred a resolution of the Legislature of California, in favor of the cession to that State of the Monterey redoubt, for the establishment of a military academy, submitted an adverse report.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Isaac W. Brown, who claims to be the inventor of a new and useful firearm which is used in the United States service, praying for an investigation, reported adversely, having ascertained on inquiry at the Department that they know nothing of any such patent.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Dr. A. S. Wright, praying indemnity for losses sustained by his expulsion from Mexico, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations; which was agreed to.

Mr. IVERSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of O. H. Browne, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of William L. S. Dearling, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

UNITED STATES SHIP SUSQUEHANNA.

Mr. MASON. The Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the report of the Secretary of the Navy, communicating in answer to the resolution of the Senate, information in relation to the condition of the United States ship Susquehanna on her arrival at the Island of Jamaica, and the reception and assistance extended to her officers and crew by the authorities of the island, have instructed me to make a report, accompanied by a joint resolution. The purpose of the joint resolution is to authorize and request the President to return suitable acknowledgments to the naval authorities of Jamaica for the very generous and efficient assistance rendered to that ship in her disabled condition; and as it is desirable and in good taste that these things should be done promptly, I would ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the joint resolution

(S. No. 33) authorizing suitable acknowledgments to be made by the President to the British naval authorities at Jamaica for the relief extended to the officers and crew of the United States ship Susquehanna, disabled by yellow fever, was read twice by its title, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MASON. Let the resolution be read through.

The Clerk read it, as follows:

*Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and requested to cause suitable acknowledgments to be made on the part of this Government to Admiral Sir Houston Stewart, of her Britannic Majesty's navy, and the officers under his command, for their prompt and efficient aid and generous hospitality extended to the disabled officers and crew of the United States ship Susquehanna, on her late arrival at Port Royal, in the Island of Jamaica, with the yellow fever on board; on which occasion, besides placing the naval hospital, with an adequate corps of medical officers, nurses, and attendants at their service, eighty-five of the sick officers and crew of the Susquehanna were safely and promptly conveyed on shore with the aid of the boats of the British squadron, and the lives of the greater portion of them thereby probably saved. And that the President be further requested to cause a gold medal, with appropriate devices, to be presented on behalf of this Government to assistant surgeon Frederick A. Rose, of the British navy, who volunteered, with the permission of his commanding officer, to join the Susquehanna, and, at imminent personal risk, devoted himself, on the voyage from Jamaica to New York, to the care of the sick remaining on board. And that the President cause suitable testimonials to be in like manner presented to the medical officers in the British service in attendance at the hospital, with appropriate rewards to the nurses and other attendants there, whilst occupied by the officers and crew of the Susquehanna.*

Mr. MASON. Mr. President, the incidents connected with the arrival of that ship at Jamaica, I think, will pass into the history of the country as of most impressive character, evincing the humane and generous courtesy that is always extended by humane and generous nations to those who are thrown upon their shores in a distressed condition. This ship arrived at the Island of Jamaica at eight o'clock in the evening, and it was reported to the British admiral in command that there were on board one hundred and three cases of yellow fever, of the most malignant type, the patients in every condition, from those who had just been seized, to those who had died. It so happened, as appears in the correspondence, that at that time, on board the admiral's ship, they were engaged in high festivity. A ball had been given in which they were then participating, but immediately orders were issued and sent on shore that a competent number of officers and men of the British squadron should remove a portion of the sick to the naval hospital. They arranged it immediately for the reception of the American sick, and by six o'clock on the following morning, the hospital was ready, and these men were landed in their disabled condition by the aid of the boats of the British squadron.

In addition to that, the surgeons of the squadron volunteered their attendance at the hospital, in aid of the usual medical staff that was there. They sent to a distance to procure a sufficient number of nurses and medical attendants, and the result was that eighty-five, including six officers and the crew of that ship, were left without any other care than this generous aid of the British authorities at the island. It is in proof, on account of the necessary condition of those sick on board the ship, that but for this humane and timely relief, the lives of a great number of them must have been sacrificed.

The resolution contemplates that the President shall make suitable acknowledgments to the British admiral and his officers, for this very distinguished service, and that he shall at the same time present a gold medal to one, in the opinion of the committee, most eminently deserving of it—a young surgeon of the British squadron, who volunteered under these circumstances to go on board the infected ship, and to attend her home. Captain Paulding states that his own surgeon and his assistant surgeon were sick; and, in the fear that the only remaining one would be taken sick on the voyage, he applied to Admiral Stewart to spare him, if possible, one of his own surgeons. The service was a very dangerous one, for the ship was in such a condition as to render every one on board in imminent risk of his life; but it seems that this young gentleman—I had the pleasure to meet him here the other day—Assistant Surgeon Rose of the British navy, volunteered his services to go on board that ship, the Admiral permitted it, and he attended the ship home. The committee have thought there is something so peculiarly just in distinguishing that officer, that they propose to request the President to give him, in commemoration of that service, a gold medal. I hope the resolution will pass.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there a report accompanying the joint resolution?

Mr. MASON. Yes, sir, there is a report accompanying it, which I ask may be printed.

The report was ordered to be printed.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MASON. I trust the fact will be recorded that the vote was a unanimous one.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be understood to be the sense of the Senate.

CAPTAIN HERNDON.

Mr. HALE. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. No. 32) for the benefit of the widow of Commander William Lewis Herndon, United States Navy, to report the same back to the Senate, and with the recommendation that it pass. I am also instructed by the committee to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider the resolution at once, because, if anything is to be done, it had better be done now.

If the Senate will indulge me for a moment, I will simply remark that the services of Captain Herndon, for which this relief is to be granted to his surviving widow and only child, constitute one of the most illustrious chapters of the history of the American Navy; and it is believed to be no exaggeration to say that, for cool and collected courage, heroic daring, patient and enduring forgetfulness of self, devotion to the welfare of others, absolute self-possession in the presence of danger, Christian fortitude, and self-sacrifice even of life, the conduct of Captain Herndon, if not without a parallel, is not excelled by anything which history or tradition has commemorated, either in ancient or modern times. Captain Herndon presents such a contrast to the course too often pursued by those to whose judgment and skill are committed the fortunes and lives of others, that it is believed to be in consonance with the views and feelings of the whole American people to give some public expression of their appreciation of such traits of character as he exhibited in the trying emergency in which he sacrificed himself. And it is believed that no way can be devised more appropriate than by affording some substantial pecuniary aid to his surviving widow and child, to whom it will be not only grateful, but for whose comfortable support it is necessary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will require the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider the resolution now.

Mr. IVERSON. I am not satisfied with the resolution, and I object to its consideration.

Mr. SEWARD. I ask, as a great favor, that the honorable Senator from Georgia will be pleased to give his attention to this resolution soon, so that we may call it up at an early day?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the joint resolution cannot be considered to-day.

CATHARINE JACOBS.

Mr. THOMSON, of New Jersey, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Catharine Jacobs, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 293) for the relief of Catharine Jacobs, widow of Francis Jacobs, a waiter in the military household of General Washington.

Mr. SEWARD. If the honorable Senator will excuse me, I will ask to have that bill passed at once. It was passed at the last session, but failed in the House for want of time. It speaks for itself.

Mr. THOMSON, of New Jersey. I should be very glad if the Senate would allow it to be taken up and passed now.

Mr. SEWARD. It is only to grant a pension to the widow of a servant of General Washington.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will remark, that the hour for the consideration of the special order having arrived, it will not be in order to take up this bill unless by unanimous consent of the Senate.

Mr. SEWARD. I hope there will be no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate must proceed to the consideration of the report of the committee of conference, unless it is otherwise ordered by the Senate.

Mr. SEWARD. I ask the consent of the chairman of the committee of conference to allow the bill to pass.

Mr. GREEN. If there is to be no debate upon it, I shall have no objection.

Mr. THOMSON, of New Jersey. I think it will not give rise to debate.

There being no objection, the bill (S. No. 298) for the relief of Catharine Jacobs, widow of Francis Jacobs, a waiter in the military household of General Washington, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to pay to the widow of Francis Jacobs, of Albany, New York, a pension of eight dollars a month, commencing on the 1st of January, 1854, and continuing during her natural life.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIS A. GORMAN.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be paid to Hon. Willis A. Gorman, Governor of Minnesota Territory, the sum of $820, as compensation for his services as commissioner to investigate the alleged frauds of Alexander Ramsey, late superintendent of Indian affairs for the northern superintendency, and for reimbursement of his necessary expenses incurred therein.

If there be no objection, I ask for the present consideration of the resolution. I do not think it will lead to debate.

Mr. GREEN. I call for the special order.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. Then of course this resolution will lie over under the rule.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 26) authorizing the arrangement and disposal of public buildings in the city of Philadelphia; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

Also, that the House had passed the following bills of the Senate:

A bill (No. 36) to provide for the issuing, service, and return of original and final process in the circuit and district courts of the United States in certain cases.

A bill (No. 97) to incorporate the Benevolent Christian Association of Washington city.

A bill (No. 111) to alter the times of holding the circuit and district courts of the United States for the district of Vermont.

A joint resolution (No. 22) providing for the payment of certain expenses of holding the United States courts in the Territory of Utah.

Also, that it had passed the bill of the Senate (No. 76) to incorporate Gonzaga College, in the city of Washington and District of Columbia, with an amendment; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

KANSAS—LECOMPTON CONSTITUTION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill (S. No. 161) for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union.

Mr. STUART. Mr. President, the important subject growing out of the admission of Kansas as a State into this Union, is again presented to the consideration of the Senate through the report of the committee of conference. While there are certain preliminary questions respecting the authority of the Senate to consider that matter until the bill has been returned to us by the House of Representatives, I propose for the present to pass over those, and to consider the immediate subject before us.

It seems to me indispensable to a fair understanding of the question now presented that we should recur to the history of this transaction, and see what has been done heretofore. In doing so at this time, I feel it incumbent on me to say that while I shall treat the members of the committee with that respect which I feel for them individually, and which is due to them as members of this body, I shall treat their report according to the rules of interpretation, and I shall insist that they mean by that report precisely what will be, in my judgment, its necessary consequences.

Sir, about two years ago, so far as the action of the majority of the Senate was concerned, we determined that Kansas might be admitted into the Union. We determined at that time that so far as the question of population was concerned, there were such circumstances incident to the existence of this Territory and the character of its people as to make it expedient and proper that they might form a constitution, organize themselves as a State, and at that time be admitted into the Union. When we came here at the commencement of the present Congress, we found that the people of Kansas, acting, as it is said, through a convention, had prepared a constitution, had partially organized a State government, and had demanded admission into the Union as a State under it. Upon the announcement of this fact by the President of the United States, I deemed it my duty to say that, in my judgment, such had been the conduct of that convention, so completely had it set at defiance the provisions of the organic act of the Territory, so completely had it attempted to overturn the principles of self-government, so enormously had it concocted a fraud, and sought to fix that fraud upon the people, that I never could, and never would, agree by my vote to aid in carrying out that effort.

But, sir, at a later day, the constitution was received; was submitted to the Senate. It was referred to the Committee on Territories. When it came back here we found this remarkable fact, which becomes an important consideration in determining upon the question of the report of the committee of conference to-day. The first copy of that constitution which was authentically published, was published in the Washington Union, and was said to have been obtained from the President of the United States; and when that constitution was published, this land ordinance was the first division in order in the instrument, and it appeared to be a component part of it. In connection with that question, let me quote from the certificate attached to the ordinance itself:

The within is a true and perfect copy of the ordinance adopted by the constitutional convention, and submitted as part of the constitution by the convention which assembled at Lecompton on the 5th day of September, A. D. 1857.

JOHN CALHOUN,

President Constitutional Convention.

LECOMPTON, KANSAS TERRITORY, January 14, 1858.

There we have the fact, the only evidence we had, to wit: the certificate of the president of the convention, John Calhoun, that this paper, on which we have been acting, is, in fact, the constitution made by the Lecompton convention, was equally conclusive to show that that convention submitted, as a part of the constitution, the ordinance which accompanied it; and yet we find that the Committee on Territories, in their report, come to this conclusion:

"The committee do not approve the ordinance accompanying the constitution, and report against its allowance; but they do not regard it as any part of the constitution, nor will its approval or disapproval by Congress affect the validity of that constitution if the State be admitted into the Union as recommended."

Now, sir, I call the attention of the Senate to this important posture of affairs. Acting upon the report and judgment of that committee, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill which they reported. They adopted the opinion contained in the report, that the ordinance was no part of the constitution, and that the constitution would be in no wise affected if the State were admitted into the Union under it, though we disapproved and disavowed the ordinance. That bill was sent to the House of Representatives. The House of Representatives refused to pass it. There was ascertained to be a decided, fixed, unalterable majority of the House of Representatives against that bill; but they sent us instead of it a proposition of their own, a plain, just, fair proposition, one which it became Congress to make, and would be becoming the people of Kansas to receive and act upon. It came here. The Senate refused to take it, and sent it back to the House of Representatives; the House adhered to their original position, and a committee of conference was finally agreed to between the two Houses.

Now, what do they say? I ask that question here to-day, and I shall be obliged to any member of the committee, or to any advocate of their report, if they will answer me some of the questions which, in the course of my remarks, I shall ask. I repeat again, Mr. President, what do the committee say? That there is a difference of opinion between the two Houses as to whether the constitution reflects the will of the people or not, as to the propriety of whether it should be submitted to the people in order to determine whether it is their will and their constitution? Not a word of it. Will any member of the committee, or of this body, tell me that there has been any other dispute between the two Houses than that? I beg leave to repeat the question, sir; for I desire it somewhere to be answered: will the committee, or any advocate of its report, tell me that there has been any dispute between the two Houses, except as to the question whether this constitution was fairly made, and whether it really and truly reflected the will of the people of Kansas? That is the only question upon which the two Houses have been differing.

But what says our committee? They say it is important to determine a question upon the ordinance. I would like to ask a member of the committee, I would like to ask an advocate of their proposition, where did you learn that there was a dispute in Congress, or in Kansas, about the ordinance? Where is the information that the people of Kansas are disputing with the proposition of the Committee on Territories of this body, as to the amount of land they shall have? Who has heard it, and from whence did he hear it? Who has heard the question mooted in the Senate? Who has heard it mooted in the Hall of the House of Representatives? Has a man in the broad domain of the United States raised a dispute upon this topic? Not a living man.

Sir, I alluded to it in the first speech I made here for a purpose which is pertinent to-day. I alluded to it as a part of the plan of that convention to bribe the people of Kansas. By this plan, if it was found impossible to seduce a majority of Congress, that convention might hope that the people of Kansas, if they could get $30,000,000 worth of land, might be willing to take this constitution. Before I made my speech in December last, the acting chairman of the Committee on Territories [Mr. GREEN] made a speech in reply to the honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS;] and what did he say? He said:

"The ordinance that accompanies the constitution is held by some to be extravagant in its demands on the Federal Government. It may or may not be so. Whether it be right to accede to the proposition submitted in the shape of an ordinance or not, I shall not now stop to discuss; for I hold that it is no part of the constitution of Kansas. It is a separate proposition presented by the convention of Kansas, and it is a matter of contract with the Federal Government whether we accede to it or not. We may disaffirm that contract. In other words, it is a proposition, and we may make a counter proposition. It is a matter for consideration, for adjustment; and it is no branch or part of the constitution of the State."

I have said that the president of the convention certifies to us that it is; and that the convention at Lecompton made it a part of the constitution; and that we have no better evidence of the constitution itself than we have of this fact. But, sir, I care not which way it is settled. I say again that, from the time this measure was introduced into Congress down to to-day, there has not only not been no dispute between the two Houses, but there has been no dispute between any members of Congress, as to whether we should give one or the other of these land propositions. And yet the conference committee comes here and tells us that they have deemed it desirable to submit to a vote of the people of Kansas, the question whether they will take the same land donations that we made to the State of Minnesota in the bill for the admission of that State into the Union. By what authority, I say, do they tell us that story, and upon what ground is it founded? They tell us that that is the only question submitted. The Senator from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTER;] and the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. GREEN;] both affirmed in their places yesterday that there was no submission of the Lecompton constitution to the people of Kansas. The Senator from Virginia said he never had agreed, and he never would agree, to submit to the people of Kansas the Lecompton constitution by an act of Congress; and yet, both of these Senators tell us, the bill which they have presented tells us, that if the land proposition fails, the constitution fails, and they are not admitted as a State into the Union; but, if the people, by a vote, agree to the land proposition, then the President is to issue his proclamation, and proclaim the State in the Confederacy.

Now, sir, let me state to the Senate a perfect illustration of this doctrine. When the trapper sets his trap to catch the fox, or the angler baits his hook for the fish, he says to the fox, "I do not propose to catch your head in that trap; the question whether you will put your head into it or not is not presented; but the only question is whether you will eat the bait." So of the angler. He says, "I have no idea, Mr. Fish, that you will fasten this hook into your gills—not at all; the proposition that I submit simply is, will you swallow the bait?—that is all." We do not say to the people of Kansas that their votes shall have any effect at all upon the constitution made at Lecompton; we deny that. I would not, says the Senator from Virginia, agree to any such proposition as that at all, but I will say to them that just as you vote on the land ordinance so is the result upon the constitution.

Now, Mr. President, is that a proposition which it becomes a Congress representing thirty million people to make? Is it a proposition that it becomes the descendants of those who fought at Bunker Hill and Yorktown to agree to? Never, sir. It is a despicable proposition. It is a proposition worse than that of the thimble-rigger, for he allows you to bet on which thimble the ball is under. He makes a direct proposition. He does not say to you, "let the thimble which we both know to have nothing under it test the question whether it is under the next one or not." Sir, such a mode of conduct, I repeat, is despicable on the part of the Congress of the United States.

What, then, is the plain object of this proposition? It was ascertained, as I said, that a majority of the House of Representatives could not be obtained for the Senate bill. What was the reason? Because a majority of the House insisted that it should be submitted to a vote of the people of Kansas to say whether this is such a constitution as they wish, and whether it reflects their will. But the Senate of the United States was not willing to come to that doctrine. How, then, was the fact? The dispute, I say, was upon the question of submission, and hence the committee set to work to make a Janus-faced proposition—one which, in the South, by southern Democrats should be declared to be no submission of the constitution to the people of Kansas at all; it should be denied there as it is denied to-day by the Senators from Virginia and Missouri, constituting a majority of the Senate committee; and which, in the North, could be insisted upon as a submission of the constitution to the people of Kansas, and for which you might get the northern anti-Lecompton Democrats in the House to vote because it is a submission; and get the southern Lecompton Democrats to vote for it because it is not a submission. Sir, like that celebrated hunter who aimed to kill the animal if it was a deer, and miss it if a calf, you say to the members constituting the two bodies of Congress to-day, if you are true game, and vote to reject this proposition, it will kill you whether you live North or South; but if you vote for it you will be a living calf all the days of your life. No matter in what section of this country you reside, if you vote for the measure there is no danger; because at the South we insist it is not submitted, and at the North we insist that it is; vote against it, and we will charge you in the South with being false to our interests; we will charge you in the North with voting against the only means provided to ascertain the will of the people upon the constitution itself. That is the English of it.

There will be very few gentlemen in Congress deceived or misled upon this subject; there will be very few persons in the States of the Union who will be misled by it; and there will be none at all in the Territory of Kansas. The people of Kansas, like every other patriotic, honest people, will indignantly set their heel upon it; and let me tell you why. I speak not this, Mr. President, in the spirit of prophecy; I speak it in the face of history. The vote of the 4th of January in Kansas was a vote taken before the question was presented here; it was taken upon the constitution as the Lecompton men made it, with every one of these enormous land grants in it; and the people pronounced against it by a majority of ten thousand and more. After having this banding here in Congress; after kicking it about between the two Houses, and then sending it back with the proposition reduced, as the Senator from Missouri says, from thirty million acres to about four million, do you suppose that you have any better prospect of success? No, sir. I say the people of Kansas will indignantly set their heel upon it.

Let me inquire how Congress stands on this question to-day. I affirm that the bill reported by this committee, by way of amendment, falsifies every argument which the advocates of the Senate bill urged for its passage. They said that the Lecompton convention had a right to say, and nobody had a right to question it, whether the constitution should be submitted to the people or not, and as they said, so it must ever remain; and yet this bill actually places it in the power of the people of Kansas to kill the instrument by a vote at the polls. More than that, sir, this bill provides, that if the people of Kansas reject this proposition, they shall not make another for admission into this Union until they have population sufficient, according to the ratio of representation, to entitle them to a member in the House. But, further, it says that the Legislature of Kansas, when proceeding to take the initiatory steps for a new constitution, shall act "in conformity with the Federal Constitution, subject to such limitations and restrictions as to the mode and manner of its approval or ratification by the people of the proposed State as they may have prescribed by law, and shall be entitled to admission into the Union as a State under such constitution thus fairly and legally made, with or without slavery, as said constitution may prescribe."

Here the very advocates of the Lecompton constitution, upon the ground that the convention had the sole power to determine the question of submission or not, come in, and say that the next convention shall take such directions as the Legislature convening them shall make. What, then, becomes of the ground upon which they advocate this constitution?

Mr. PUGH. I wish to correct the Senator, if he will allow me.

Mr. STUART. Certainly.

Mr. PUGH. The ground taken was, that, inasmuch as the act under which the delegates were elected contained no provision at all on the subject, therefore the question was entirely within the discretion of the convention.

Mr. STUART. I am stating the grounds which the general advocates of this measure presented to the Senate. I know that, if you undertake to analyze all the arguments that were made by the supporters of the Senate bill, you would find no two of them, scarcely, standing upon the same ground. But I proceed now, in connection with this, to another proposition, based upon the great doctrine of non-intervention; and it was this: that you had said to the people of Kansas, in their organic act, that they should proceed to form a constitution and State government in their own way. That was the language of the honorable Senator from Missouri in his first speech—that Congress had no right to provide the way; that they were at liberty to take their own way; yet, sir, in this bill you say that they shall only do it by a law of their Legislature; and that that law shall provide the mode, and manner, and time, of submitting the constitution to the people. I should like to know if that is non-intervention?

What further, Mr. President? The advocates of the Senate bill said that it was not of so much consequence how this thing was settled, as it was that it should be promptly settled. That is the great argument of the President: admit the State, no matter how, and you have ended all controversy about it. This bill says that, if the people of Kansas do not take this Lecompton constitution, they shall make none, shall have none, shall be no State until they have a sufficient population to entitle them to a member of the House of Representatives. What, then, becomes of the "speedy" argument for the settlement of this question?

What next? It was important to take it out of Congress. Well, sir, we have been taking this subject out of Congress ever since I have been in; and the more we have taken it out, the more we have taken it into Congress. What is the result here if the people reject this constitution? Cannot they make another application to Congress the next day, or at any time when they please, and is it not perfectly competent for Congress to repeal this law and admit them? Who denies it? If the very next Congress chooses to admit Kansas under a constitution that she shall make, who can prevent it? No power on earth. Then you will have the question presented to Congress continuously, debated here, the country agitated, until it is finally disposed of.

How beautifully does the House bill compare with this miserable proposition of the committee of conference. That proposition said to the people of Kansas, "vote as you like upon this constitution; if you vote in favor of it, very well, the President proclaims you a State in the Union; if you vote against it, proceed to form the one you do wish, and come immediately and promptly into the Union," and that, too, without the action of Congress. There was a proposition which met the argument of the advocates of the Lecompton constitution. There was a proposition that was fair to every section of the country; and more than that, sir, for the first time in the history of legislation upon the subject of Kansas, it was fair to the people of Kansas.

But, sir, what does this proposition say? Is there a Senator within the hearing of my voice to-day who believes, if this land measure was separately submitted to the people of Kansas, disconnected from any other question, that there is a man in Kansas who would vote against it? Not a man. There is not a Senator, nor a member of the House of Representatives, who supposes that this land donation would receive a negative vote in the whole Territory of Kansas. Look now, sir, at the miserable trick contained in the substitute of the committee. That says to the people, if you vote upon a subject upon which you have no two opinions, a subject which you are all for, we think; there is a better chance of getting you to put the hook into your mouth, or put your head into the trap, than if you voted upon the trap or the hook itself. Yet the Senator from Virginia said, with something of astonishment, not to say indignation, that this was no threat to the people of Kansas. Sir, I affirm, in my place here to-day, that it is, and is a threat of the most objectionable character. It compares unfavorably with the attempt of the Lecompton convention. The attempt of that convention had the merit of boldness, of audacity, of desperation; it spoke in open daylight, and said to the people of Kansas, you shall have no power to reject this constitution, because, if we give you the power to do so, we know you will reject it; but this is an attempt to wheedle, to cajole, first the anti-Lecompton men in Congress, and next the people of Kansas. Not a threat, sir! What is an election? Is it not the free, unembarrassed, and unbiased choice between two distinct propositions? When you vote for a candidate for President, do you not vote against some other candidate? Is not your choice free, untrammelled, to vote for A or to vote for B, as you choose?

What was the House proposition which we rejected, and for which the committee of conference recommend this amendment as a substitute? It was this: if you want the Lecompton constitution, take it; if you reject it, you have the liberty to make one for yourselves which will be satisfactory, and you are to proceed to do it. But this amendment says if you will take this constitution, which is known to be obnoxious, we will grant you so much land. I say, Mr. President, it is known by every form of procedure that becomes a free people, by the resolutions of conventions, by the memorials and resolutions of their Legislature, by the memorials of their civil officers, by a vote of the people at the polls; by every means, I repeat, which becomes a free people, Congress is historically advised to-day that the people of Kansas are uncompromisingly opposed to this instrument. Knowing that—yes, sir, there ought to be emphasis upon these words—knowing that, this committee amendment submits a land proposition which no man in Kansas, or here, disputes; and says, if thus induced you vote for the land, you are under a constitution which you hate and despise.

Sir, it was noble, it was patriotic, it was becoming the great name and fame of the honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] when he asked the Senate yesterday, what would southern Senators say with this proposition reversed? If this were a free-State constitution, and had been rejected by the people of Kansas in all the forms in which this has been, and it should be now proposed to submit it to them in this mode, this despicable, trickish mode, is there a southern man in Congress who would vote for it? Not a man. I can say in the sincerity of my heart I wish to God that were the fact this day. If it were, I would stand here as I stand to-day; and so long as I am permitted to represent that intelligent and noble people living in the State of Michigan, I never will agree that there shall be one mode of proposing to a people for a slave-State, and another for a free-State constitution—never, sir, never. Is this self-government? Is this leaving the people of Kansas, in the language of the organic act, perfectly free to form and regulate their own domestic institutions in their own way? Is this perfect freedom? What, then, I ask, would be perfect oppression? Sir, no man dare assert it. It is not pretended to be.

When that House bill was sent here, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BIGLER] made a speech against it. Speaking of the doctrine that Congress has always advocated, he said:

"An essential element in that doctrine, is that Congress will not interfere with the domestic affairs of the Territories; that as to the mode and manner of making a government, the people of the Territories should be unrestrained; that Congress would decide only upon the question of admission under the obligations of the Constitution, and that would be on the single point whether the government presented was republican in its form, and not as to the mode of making the constitution—leaving that work with the people."

He objected to this House proposition because it undertook to provide how the people of Kansas should make the next constitution if they rejected this one. Does not that objection apply with equal, and with greater force to this proposition? Speaking of this doctrine further, he says:

"Sir, that is the doctrine of the Democratic party, held by them because it is consistent with the Constitution, consistent with the true interests of this great country, and with the rights of all classes of the people and all sections of the Union."

"Now, sir, I regard the House proposition as direct and violent intervention, because it proposes to discard what the people have done, and to institute a new mode of proceeding. It proposes to set aside what the people of Kansas have done in the way of changing their government from a territorial to a State form, and to prescribe to them how they shall proceed hereafter in making a government."

That was the Senator's notion of intervention, and that was the basis of his objection to the House bill. He objects to the bill further because it does not present the issue which he says exists in the State of Kansas. He says the issue in Kansas is the slavery issue; and that by the House bill they are not at liberty to vote upon it. Are they at liberty to vote upon it in this proposition? Hear his argument, sir. He quotes from the House amendment this clause:

"At the said election the vote shall be by ballot, and by indorsing on his ballot, as each voter may please, 'for the constitution,' or 'against the constitution.'"

He then says:

"That form you perceive, sir, would not present to the people of Kansas the great question at issue there, the question which has agitated the country from one extremity to the other, to wit: whether Kansas shall be a free or a slave State. Slavery is in the constitution as it stands, and the question thus presented would be, whether they would have a slave State or no State at all."

Those words, to make them emphatic in the Senator's speech, are italicized. He objects to the bill because it presents the question whether they will have a slave State or no State at all. Does not the proposition of the conference committee do that too? He did not state the House proposition correctly, because the question presented there was, would they have the Lecompton constitution or have a new one made by themselves? but this proposition is the exact case stated by the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania. The question here presented to the people of Kansas is, will you have a constitution making a slave State, or no State at all? because Congress says in its bill that if you do not accept this proposition you shall have no State at all for an indefinite period of time.

Now he reasons:

"Those who desire it to be a free State would have no fair opportunity of carrying out their will. They are to be disfranchised on this vote."

Is not that this case, so far as human language can perfect it?

"They can have no voice. Now, sir, if this measure is to be adopted, the form of voting ought to be such as would give those people the opportunity of deciding, unembarrassed, the question of slavery which has harassed them from the first hour of their organization."

Is it not remarkable, Mr. President, that an honorable Senator who objected to the House proposition for these reasons, should be so suddenly transformed into an advocate for the proposition of this committee? On this occasion my honorable friend from Ohio [Mr. PUGH] also said something. He said:

"According to my apprehension of what is due to this case, the House amendment is utterly inadmissible. It is a violation, as I understand it, of every principle on which Congress can admit a new State; of every safe precedent; and a violation of every principle heretofore professed by the Democratic party of the United States. It is an unfair bill. It cannot make peace. It can make nothing but disturbance in Kansas, and everywhere else. I shall endeavor to sustain these propositions as the reason why, certainly to my own entire and perfect satisfaction, I shall vote against that bill at every hazard."

"The main idea of this proposition, or rather its pretension, is that the Congress of the United States remands the constitution of Kansas to a vote of the people; and what for? Who authorized us to remand that constitution to a vote of the people?"

That is the question. Does the honorable Senator from Ohio say to-day, that this question is not remanded to Kansas for a vote of the people, which is to determine its fate?

Mr. PUGH. By this bill?

Mr. STUART. Yes, sir.

Mr. PUGH. I say it is not.

Mr. STUART. Very well, sir; that is precisely what I desire.

Mr. PUGH. I not only say it is not remanded, but I would not vote for the bill if it did remand it.

Mr. STUART. Precisely so. The Senator could not vote for it and make this speech. Now, sir, what was his objection? He asks in this most emphatic language: where do you get the authority to remand that constitution to Kansas for a vote of the people? Suppose the honorable Senator, as a member of this body, should be told to-day that here is a bill for the relief of John Jones, and the order of the Senate is, that as you vote upon that bill, so is your vote upon the deficiency bill, and it will be counted at the desk as such: will the honorable Senator tell me that that is no submission at all for the action of this Senate upon the deficiency bill?

Mr. PUGH. I say it would be.

Mr. STUART. You do not count it as it affects John Jones, but you count it as it affects the deficiency bill, or you count it for both. If you pass John Jones's bill, you pass the deficiency bill; if you reject John Jones's bill, you reject the deficiency bill. The Senator says that would be action upon the deficiency bill. Now, sir, you say to the people of Kansas, if you vote for this land, the President will proclaim you in the Union under the constitution made at Lecompton; if you vote against this land, it is to be taken as an expression of your will that you do not wish admission into the Union under the Lecompton constitution. That is the language of the bill, that that is to be taken as an expression at the polls that you do not wish to be admitted into the Union under the Lecompton constitution.

Mr. PUGH. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator more than a moment, as I intend to reply at some length to him, but I only wish to put in a caveat. That is not my interpretation of this bill at all.

Mr. STUART. Well, Mr. President, fortunately that is one thing which the committee of conference has not left us to interpret. The amendment they propose states:

"But should a majority of the votes cast be for 'proposition rejected,' it shall be deemed and held that the people of Kansas do not desire admission into the Union with said constitution under the conditions set forth in said proposition."

Now, I say there is no room for interpretation; and it is a little curious, Mr. President, to see what the effect of voting the other way is:

"Should a majority of the votes cast be for 'proposition accepted,' the President of the United States, as soon as the fact is duly made known to him, shall announce the same by proclamation, and thereafter, and without any further proceedings on the part of Congress, the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever shall be complete and absolute."

Mark you, sir, to vote for the "proposition accepted," does not say it shall then be deemed and held that you want to come in under this constitution—not at all, because that might stick in the throat of somebody there. It is carefully worded, therefore, to say that there is not the most indirect approval of the constitution, if you vote for the proposition; but if you vote against it, then it is to be deemed, and taken and held, that you do want to come in under the Lecompton constitution, with the land attached. What further objection did my honorable friend make to that bill? He said:

"But, sir, that is not the worst of it. This House amendment does not, in truth, refer the constitution of Kansas back to the people of Kansas."

He says the House amendment does not do that. The Senator asks:

"Who are the people of Kansas—I mean the people authorized to vote for or against this constitution? The constitution defines them. One part of the constitution was submitted to the people; one part was ratified by every argument which men can receive; I mean the seventh article. That not only passed the convention, but it passed the vote of the people; and who were they? The constitution tells us:

"At which election the constitution framed by this convention shall be submitted to all the white male inhabitants of the Territory of Kansas in the said Territory upon that day, and over the age of twenty-one years, for ratification or rejection."

"They are the people of Kansas; they are the people defined by the constitution of Kansas; they are the body of electors to ratify or reject the constitution; and we have no right to substitute any other body of electors greater or less than that. Is the seventh article to be overturned by the vote of a larger or a smaller number than provided there? If so, we might as well unmake the whole constitution of Kansas. To whom does this amendment remit it? It provides"— now quoting from the amendment—

"Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That, in the election hereby authorized, all white male inhabitants of said Territory, over the age of twenty-one years, who are legal voters, under the laws of the Territory of Kansas, and none others, shall be allowed to vote."

"What is the qualification for a voter under the territorial laws of Kansas? That he shall be a citizen of the United States, and shall have resided six months in the Territory."

My honorable friend objected to the House proposition because it submitted the fate of the constitution to a different body of electors than the constitution itself provided for.

Mr. PUGH. Not submitted the fate of the constitution, but the constitution itself.

Mr. STUART. Is not that the fate of the constitution?

Mr. PUGH. The Senator must not interpolate words.

Mr. STUART. I am very willing to say "submit the constitution," if there is any distinction between the phrases.

Mr. PUGH. There is a vital distinction.

Mr. STUART. Then, because they submitted the constitution to a different body of electors—and the Senator affirmed that—they had no right to submit that constitution to a different body of voters from that body provided for in the constitution itself.

Mr. PUGH. I say so still.

Mr. STUART. Let me compare that with this case. The Senator concedes that the vote of the people, under this committee's amendment, on the land ordinance will determine the existence or non-existence of the constitution.

Mr. PUGH. Because it determines the question whether the State is admitted into the Union or not.

Mr. STUART. Precisely; I agree with him. It determines the fate of the question, whether Kansas comes into the Union with the Lecompton constitution or not. Now, what is the difference between saying that the vote shall be upon the constitution, and that it shall be upon the land; and as you vote on the land, so is the result counted on the constitution? Why, sir, it brings you back to my illustration. You do not tell the fish that you want him to agree to take the hook in his mouth. You only tell him you want him to swallow the bait; that is all.

There was another reason urged for passing this original Senate bill, which was entirely a political reason. It was said that it was all-important that this Kansas controversy should not be permitted to go into the next presidential election. Sir, the very effect of this bill is to carry it there, irresistibly and inevitably. What do you say? If you reject this constitution—and I have shown you, sir, that it is rejected already by the people of Kansas—you shall not make another until you have the requisite population for one member of the House; and that is to be ascertained by a census legally taken. How is a census legally taken? What is the law about taking the census? It is to be taken once in ten years. The next census will be taken in 1860, two years hence.

Mr. PUGH. Does the Senator mean to say that by the census spoken of in this bill is meant the decennial census?

Mr. STUART. I mean to say that it is a census legally taken.

Mr. PUGH. It can be taken by an act of the Territorial Legislature at any time.

Mr. STUART. I do not think that is so.

Mr. PUGH. Certainly it is; and that is a legal census.

Mr. STUART. That is not the bill.

Mr. PUGH. It is the bill.

Mr. STUART. I am perfectly willing to concede, for the sake of the argument, that it is the bill, though I say it is not. I say that if the Senator lives to see Kansas come back and ask admittance into the Union, he will find that those who are urging Leecompton to-day will contend that the language of this amendment means a census taken according to the existing laws. If he shall live to see that day, and I shall hold a seat in Congress at the time—

Mr. PUGH. I tell the Senator that it is utterly impossible, from the language of the amendment, that that could be so. If he will only read it he will see it himself. The ratio of representation is fixed once in ten years.

Mr. STUART. I understand that perfectly well. It is conceded on all hands, that in Kansas there is not the necessary ratio now. It is conceded on all hands that there is not a population of ninety-three thousand four hundred there; nobody denies it. Then, when are you going to take another census? and when you get another census, will you not have another ratio? and is it not probable the next ratio will reach one hundred and twenty thousand?

But, sir, I am willing to take the Senator on the argument that it is a census to be taken by the authority of the Territorial Legislature; and then is he any better off? Has he got this question out of the presidential election? Does the Senator suppose that during the coming summer there will be the necessary population there? Not at all. If this question comes into the next Congress, it will be in the midst of the presidential canvass and controversy. The very business of the next Congress will be speech-making upon the subject of who shall be the President in 1860. So that you neither get it out of Congress nor out of the canvass of 1860; but you inevitably carry it into both.

One word more, sir, upon this doctrine of intervention. The Kansas act, says the President of the United States, is an enabling act; that that is a proposition too plain to be argued. It enables the people, says the Senator from Missouri, to proceed, in their own way and at their own time, to form a State constitution and be admitted into the Union. When you provide in this bill that they shall not proceed until they have the ratio of inhabitants; that they shall then proceed by an act of their Legislature, which act shall define how and when the constitution shall be submitted to the people; to that extent you repeal the organic act of Kansas, if the advocates of this measure are right. That is intervention, then, in its most obnoxious form; for you take from the people, according to the interpretation the President gives of the organic act, and the interpretation of most of his supporters on this question, the right that they now hold under that act.

Now, Mr. President, I desire to turn the attention of the Senate, for one moment, to what the Committee on Territories, when they reported the Senate bill, said on this question of population:

"Believing that the paper presented is the legal constitution of Kansas, that it is republican in its form, that the boundaries proposed by it are admissible, and conceding the sufficiency of the population, the committee recommend the admission of Kansas into the Union upon the constitution presented, and report a bill accordingly."

"Conceding the sufficiency of the population," said the Committee on Territories of the Senate. What do they say now? What does the Senator who acted as the chairman of that committee, and made that report in which he conceded the sufficiency of the population, say now? He says, inferentially, that it is very clear there is not a sufficient population in that Territory, and therefore you shall not proceed again to form a constitution until that is an ascertained fact.

One word, Mr. President, as to the argument of the Senator from Virginia in respect to his analogous cases. He quoted Iowa and Michigan as being cases analogous in principle to this one. Why, sir, in the first place, it never was pretended, by any man that I know of, that Congress had not full and unqualified power to fix the boundaries of a new State which is to be carved out of our territory. I say that has never been a disputed question in Congress. The case of Michigan stood under the ordinance of 1787; and some of our people in Michigan contended that, by the ordinance of 1787, we had a right to the boundaries described in our territorial organization, and that, on account of the ordinance, Congress could not change it. I made an examination into that subject at that day, and I came to the conclusion, in an hour, that the ordinance of 1787 did not constitute an exception; that Congress had the sole and unlimited power to describe the boundaries of the new State carved out of our own territory when asking to be admitted into this Union.

But, sir, even if that is disputable, there was in the case of Iowa and in the case of Michigan, an actual dispute existing. We were in a dispute with the State of Ohio, and Ohio and Michigan had their citizens under arms on this disputed boundary. In that condition of things, Michigan asking to be admitted into the Union, what did Congress do? Why sensibly, wisely, patriotically, they said: "We will not admit a new State into the Union, and at that instant create a bloody war between that State and Ohio as to where the actual boundary is; we have the power, and we will settle it now." Therefore, they said to us in Michigan: "You must, by a convention of your people, agree to this boundary, and thereupon you shall be admitted." We did agree to it and were admitted. But I say again, there was an actual dispute as to boundary, but no objection to our constitution. Is there any dispute about this land donation of Kansas? Who is disputing it? Where does the man live? What is his name? There is no controversy about the land grant, but the people do object to the constitution. Then what becomes of the analogy? I have asked, and I beg leave to repeat the question, is it believed if this donation of land were submitted as a distinct, separate proposition to the people of Kansas that there would be a vote against it? Not one. What then ought to be the preamble to this amendment? In the first place, let us see what it is:

"Whereas, the people of the Territory of Kansas did, by a convention of delegates assembled at Leecompton on the 7th day of November, 1857, for that purpose, form for themselves a constitution and State government, which constitution is republican; and whereas, at the same time and place, said convention did adopt an ordinance, which said ordinance asserts that Kansas, when admitted as a State, will have an undoubted right to tax the lands within her limits belonging to the United States, and proposes to relinquish said asserted rights if certain conditions, set forth in said ordinance be accepted and agreed to by the Congress of the United States; and whereas, the said constitution and ordinance have been presented to Congress by order of said convention, and admission of said Territory into the Union thereon as a State requested; and whereas, said ordinance is not acceptable to Congress, and it is desirable to ascertain whether the people of Kansas concur in the changes in said ordinance hereinafter stated, and desire admission into the Union as a State as herein proposed: Therefore, Be it enacted," &c.

Now, sir, is it desirable to ascertain that fact? The language of the preamble is:

"Whereas, it is desirable to ascertain whether the people of Kansas concur in the changes."

Have you any doubt about it? No man has. Sir, this ought to have been the preamble to this bill: "Whereas, the Leecompton convention formed a constitution which they knew was repugnant to the will and wishes of the people of Kansas, and knowing that, refused to submit it to them for ratification or rejection in fact, though they professed to, in form; whereas, that constitution has been presented to Congress, and whereas, the Senate has passed a bill to carry out the project of the Leecompton convention, and whereas, a majority to aid in that purpose cannot be obtained in the House of Representatives, and whereas, the House insists that the will of the people shall be ascertained through a submission of this constitution to them, and whereas, the minority in the House can never be made to vote for a bill that does directly submit it, and it being therefore indispensable so to frame a bill that it may be called submission in one section of the Union, and non-submission in the other: Therefore, Be it enacted," &c.

That is this case, and that ought to be the preamble to this proposition, because it is the living truth to-day. Do you tell me, sir, that, if a majority of votes could have been obtained in the House of Representatives to the Senate bill, that you would have ever troubled yourself to ascertain whether the people would consent to modify this ordinance? What did your bill say? The second section said:

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the State of Kansas is admitted into the Union upon the express condition that said State shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the public lands, or with any regulations which Congress may find necessary for securing the title in said lands to the bona fide purchaser and grantees thereof, or impose or levy any tax, assessment, or imposition of any description whatever, upon them or other property of the United States within the limits of said State; and nothing in this act shall be construed as an assent by Congress to all or to any of the propositions or claims contained in the ordinance of the said constitution of the people of Kansas, nor to deprive the said State of Kansas of the same grants which were contained in the act of Congress entitled 'An act to authorize the people of the Territory of Minnesota to form a constitution and State government,'" &c.

And we amended that, on my motion, so as to refer to land grants hereafter to be made by Congress. Do you suppose, sir, that there is any man in Congress or in this broad Union so weak, so imbecile, so idiotic—who is out of an asylum—as to suppose that there is a reality in this preamble to the amendment of the conference committee, that that committee really doubted whether the people of Kansas would be willing to modify that claim? Why, sir, the people of Kansas never made it. I tell you again, that it was a trick of this Leecompton convention to ask for such an enormous grant, and to make the people believe that it might be obtained, as would keep them quiet under the fraud they were seeking to practice by the constitution they promulgated. That is it, and it is nothing else.

One word upon the general subject alluded to by the honorable Senator from Missouri, and I shall have done. He said, on introducing this report into the Senate, that it was not an amendment which was entirely satisfactory to anybody. Well, sir, I agree to that—it is not, and it ought not to be. But he says that he offers it as a measure of peace to the country on this distracting subject. Sir, upon the question of giving peace to the country upon this slavery question, I will go as far to-day or any day, while I am honored with a seat here, as any other living man; I will go as far as he who goes farthest. But, Mr. President, peace, either in Kansas or among the States of this Union, can never be obtained except by straightforward, honest, fair legislation to all sections of the country. If Congress seeks to play a trick upon Kansas, the honest heart of the whole Republic will, involuntarily, revolt at it. That Congress in this amendment does seek by this device, this trick, to slide Kansas into the Union is too clear for dispute; for, as I said, without impugning, and with a design not to impugn, the motives of any man, this bill must be intended to mean what are the natural consequences of its language. It is, therefore, a bill framed to enable certain men to vote for it upon the ground that it is not submission of the constitution of Kansas, and to enable certain other men to vote for it upon the ground that it is submission; and to cut men down in one section of the Union who vote against it because it is no submission, and to cut men down in another section of the Union who vote against it because it is submission.

Now, sir, it may be asked of me—if not here, it may be asked elsewhere—if I believe that this bill puts the subject of this constitution within the power of the people of Kansas, so that they can, as I believe they will, indignantly put their heel upon it, and thus destroy the monster—why do I oppose the measure? I oppose it upon the same ground that I would oppose an accumulation of property in a dishonorable way; I oppose it as I would oppose the reception of stolen property, knowing it to be stolen; I oppose it because it is unbecoming the magnanimity and generosity of a great people, and a Congress representing a great people; because, while in effect the people may destroy this constitution, those who report it here to-day in their places have said that the constitution is not submitted; I oppose it, sir, upon higher principles than any possible personal consequences; I oppose it because it seeks to lay down in the admission of States into this Union one set of propositions for one character of States, and another set of propositions for a different character of States; I oppose it because, instead of giving peace to the country, which I most fervently desire, it will inevitably increase and promote excitement and discord throughout the Confederacy; and because it is in plain violation of the letter and spirit of the organic law of Kansas, and the true principles of self-government.

I have said, sir, and I beg leave to repeat it again from the very bottom of my heart, I wish to-day, in the settlement of this principle, that this Lecompton constitution was a free-State constitution, that it might be seen how indignantly the representatives of the North would despise and condemn and deride and trample under foot such a proposition as this. Sir, I will never agree to any such unjust, despicable discrimination as is contained in this bill.

Sir, we are called upon to say to the people of Kansas, "if you will take this obnoxious constitution, you may come in now, at once, by the proclamation of the President—a constitution which we know is obnoxious to every impulse of your nature; but if you insist upon framing a constitution that is agreeable to your judgment and your wishes, you shall not come in until you have doubled your population;" and yet I am asked to vote for it. Why, sir, if it were submitted to me as the only alternative, if I were so borne down by oppression or under duress, that I was compelled to falsify all my opinions of constitutional authority, and take the naked Senate bill or take this thing, infinitely would I prefer the original Senate bill, because that does stand and can stand upon technical legal authority, if you choose to use that in opposition to the known will of the people. This can stand on nothing either human or divine. If you were to set it up and apply the commandment to it, you could not make it out heresy to worship it, for it is not like anything in the heavens above or in the earth beneath, or the waters under the earth. It is an anomaly, a miserable, ingeniously-concocted pretense to smuggle through Congress, and fasten upon the necks of the people of Kansas, an obnoxious organic law.

There is a necessity for conciliation, for fair treatment, for peace among the States of the Union; and that course of policy is the easiest and simplest that man can devise. It is so plain, that the wayfaring man as he runs may read and understand. It is simply to deal honestly, deal justly, deal fairly. Do unto the people of Kansas as you would, under similar circumstances, be done by—that is all. Do that; peace will reign throughout all your borders; every man in this broad land, under his own vine and fig-tree, can entertain such opinions as he chooses. But, sir, you continue to practice such frauds as the Lecompton convention inaugurated, such frauds as this bill is a bad imitation of, and you will spread danger and conflagration throughout this Union. If you will insist, as a Congress, upon being dishonest, partial, trickish, the time will not be far distant when a civil war will spread over this land, when you may be compelled, at midnight, to light your wife and your children into some possible place of safety by the flames of your dwelling. If, however, you will pursue the path of wisdom, of patriotism, this Union will cover the continent and the adjacent islands; it will be the mightiest Government that ever existed, or that ever can exist on the face of the earth. Under all its broad and benign influences, peace and happiness will be secured to the humblest individual, as well as to the remotest State. This is true, because it is the great moral law of the Creator of all things; no human power can ever change its action.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. President, I have already stated to the Senate that, in my judgment, the regular and orderly method of taking a vote on this question, so as to aid in passing a law, would be after we had received a message from the House of Representatives inclosing the bill itself. Still, I have no objection to voting for the report of the committee of conference; because it will be, as the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BENJAMIN] expressed it on the day before yesterday, an expression of my individual opinion. Nor do I mean to say that, if the Senate take a contrary course, the bill will not be legally passed; for I suppose we have a right to prescribe our own forms of proceeding, although, as I have said, I think the regular form hitherto has been to vote on such a report only when the bill is in our possession. But, sir, as I intend, in some shape and at some time, to vote in favor of the proposition reported by the committee of conference, I design to give the reasons for that vote, in answer to several allegations which have been made by Senators on this floor, and particularly by the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. STUART,] who has just taken his seat.

I shall pass over two considerations in a very few words. My colleague [Mr. WADE] yesterday arraigned the course of what he called the Senators from the slave States—I suppose meaning the slaveholding States—and he imputed a great many motives to them. I shall engage in no crimination of that sort. If I believed what my colleague said, if those were my opinions and sentiments, instead of standing in the Senate of the United States to beat the air and indulge myself in those expressions, I would go home to the people of Ohio and tell them to take arms in their hands to redress all those injuries. The fact that gentlemen bottle up all their wrath to be poured out in the Senate, satisfies me there is no great sincerity in all these complaints.

So with the Senator from Michigan. If I believed a thousandth part of what he has stated here to-day; if I believed that an overwhelming majority of the representatives in Congress of the political party to which I belong were scoundrels and knaves and tricksters, that they would practice fraud and deceit and deception in every shape and form; if I believed all that or any of it, instead of standing up here like the Senator from Michigan, to insist that I still belonged to that party and that no test should be applied to me, I would walk out of it with flying colors, and be glad to be rid of every association of that character.

Mr. STUART. Allow me to say to the Senator that I have said nothing of the kind. I have not said one word about any man in Congress being a scoundrel; nor have I said one word about any test being applied to me. I have never touched that subject, and never mean to do so.

Mr. PUGH. Let us see. The Senator coined a new word for the occasion, not to be found in any dictionary that I know of, or any book on English grammar: he said it was a scoundrelly proposition. He said it was a trick. He said Congress was behaving in a trickish manner. He said Congress was practicing frauds—a system of fraud and outrage inaugurated in the first place by the Lecompton convention. Sir, there is no word of abuse, there is no harsh adjective or adverb in the English language which the Senator could apply to this proposition, that he did not apply to it. Then he turns round and says to a man, "I slap you in the face, but I do not mean to insult you;" he says to thirty or more of us sitting here, acting according to the best lights of our judgments and our consciences, who have determined to give our votes for this measure, that he imputes nothing personal to us, but that this, nevertheless, is his opinion of what we propose to do.

So on the subject of tests. When the Senator stood up here in December last, and again on a later occasion, he was begging his political friends, as he called them, for conciliation. After listening to him and doing all we felt authorized to do to conciliate him and those who act with him on this floor, we yet hear, not alone from him, but from others here and throughout the country, one continued tirade that there has been an attempt made by the Administration and by the majority of the Democratic party in both Houses of Congress to establish a test. I agree with the very celebrated man in this country who said the Democratic party is a pure free-love association. A man can get himself out of it, but nobody else can get him out; and I say again, that whenever it is my opinion that a majority of the Democratic Senators on this floor give their adhesion to a proposition that is a fraud and an outrage, that includes villainy and all the acts that base men commit, I give them notice that I shall not wait to be put out of the party: I shall go out of it. That is all I have to say on that matter.

I come now to the proposition. Of course every bill reported by a committee of conference is a compromise. Nearly every bill that passes the two Houses of Congress is a compromise. Each of us cannot get exactly that which he thinks best; we must give up matters of detail; we must surrender, if necessary, everything but the great principle involved in a question; and so the Senate has acted; and so, I imagine, the House of Representatives has acted. In my judgment the best measure would have been the admission of Kansas into the Union by a bill in the ordinary form. That would have silenced everything. That would let the people of Kansas settle all their own affairs; let them revise and amend their constitution, or make a new one when they choose; let them do whatever they please when clothed with the sovereignty of a State. We found that could not pass. It was denied that, when admitted as a State under this constitution, they could proceed to revise and amend it; and when that was answered, it was asserted that if admitted under it, Congress and the President would prevent any amendment. Then we said, put a provision into the act to the effect that Congress and the President never shall prevent it. That was not considered sufficient. But the bill passed this body, and went to the House of Representatives. The House, in lieu of our bill, sent to us a proposition requiring us to submit the constitution of Kansas to a vote of the people. I have said to the Senator from Michigan to-day, and I say again, I never will vote for any such bill in any case—neither for a slaveholding nor a non-slaveholding State. I consider it a gross usurpation of power, a breaking down of the barriers between the Federal and State governments, ten times more disastrous, in its consequences, to the peace of the country and to the liberties of the people than all the civil wars that have ever raged in Kansas. This was my objection to that proposition—my great objection. I believe I can say it was the objection in the minds certainly of a very large majority of those with whom I have heretofore acted on this floor.

What was to be done, then? The House of Representatives adhered to their amendment. They had different views from us. A committee of conference was appointed by each House, and we have now before us the agreement of that committee. What is it? I do not yet understand how the Senator from Michigan means to interpret the proposition. If he says that he understands this proposition as submitting the constitution of Kansas to a vote of the people by act of Congress, I tell him I do not so understand it; and if I did, I would not vote for it. But what is it? We have not the power to make a constitution for Kansas; we have not the power to unmake it; and if we cannot alter the constitution itself, how can we prescribe, after the people have acted, the manner in which the constitution shall be ratified? How can we change the method of its ratification? That is as much the act of the people as the constitution itself; and when we insist that Congress shall change the method of ratification, we assume to ourselves the right to make the constitution. That, therefore, we cannot do. But over what question have we ample and complete authority? Over the question of admission. That is our question; that is reposed in us by the Constitution of the United States. And, consequently, when it was stated, at an early period of this debate, that Kansas came here with a petition in her hands, I put the question, what is the petition for? Not to approve her constitution, not to ratify her constitution, not to amend her constitution. That is not the prayer of her petition. What is it? She petitions to be admitted into the Union as a State: that is her petition—nothing else. We can grant her petition, or we can refuse it. We can refuse it without any reference to her constitution. We may refuse it because she has not the population which we deem requisite. We may refuse it because we think the boundaries she proposes are improper. We may refuse it because we believe that the admission into the Union of this Territory as a State will disturb the peaceable relations of the other States, or shock the public sense of morals and decency. Why, sir, you have on your table a proposed constitution from Utah, and if it were on its face entirely unobjectionable, I would not vote to admit that Territory into the Union as a State. I would vote on that question wholly regardless of what her constitution contained or omitted. I would vote against it because I do not wish to admit into the Union as a sovereign community a people who, in my judgment, have debased themselves to the level of the brutes. I would reject her without reference to her constitution, or what it contains. The right of admission, or the power of admission, is a question reposed in Congress. It is a power not to be abused. It is a power to be used rightly, to be used with due discretion; and, therefore, although I claim that the power is an absolute power reposed in us, I agree that to set up any test which would make an unjust discrimination between the States already in the Union, would be a gross abuse of power. At the formation of the Federal Constitution, some of the States of this Union were slaveholding and some non-slaveholding States; and I believe that to reject a new State because she is either slaveholding or non-slaveholding, would be a gross abuse of the power vested in Congress by the Constitution.

That, however, is not alone my distinction. That is the distinction of the Senator from Michigan himself, made on this floor, insisted upon to-day at great length. I have before me an interesting little document—"Speech of Hon. C. E. Stuart, of Michigan, on Kansas affairs, delivered in the Senate of the United States, December 23, 1857," from which I propose to read a paragraph:

"The power of Congress to admit States into the Union is the question which, in my judgment, lies at the very foundation of this discussion. The Constitution of the United States, in the third section of the fourth article, provides that 'new States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union.' The only limitations to the exercise of the power are found in the language that follows: 'but no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State; nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States, or parts of States, without the consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned, as well as of the Congress.' It was well said by Mr. Attorney General Butler, in the Arkansas case, that the power of Congress over this question is plenary. From the very nature of the question, it must be. It is subject only to the limitations provided in that article; and whenever a question is presented as to the admission of a State into this Union, it must necessarily be determined by the circumstances which surround and govern that particular case. Why, sir, it is a power which authorizes the admission of foreign States, as well as those carved out of our own dominion; and this single statement will show to the mind of any gentleman, at a glance, that precedents, former laws of Congress, never can, and never ought to be, resorted to for the purpose of determining the power or the propriety in a particular case. I use the term 'propriety' with a purpose. The power to admit a State necessarily carries with it the power to decline to admit; and when I hear gentlemen talking about the necessity, the imperative obligation that rests upon Congress to admit a State under a particular specified set of circumstances, I confess, sir, it is a doctrine that is not in accordance with my views of the Constitution. It may be very proper, for instance, to refuse to admit a State to-day, and it may be quite the reverse one year from to-day. Congress, and Congress alone, under the power conferred upon it by the Constitution, is to determine, not only the question whether a State shall be admitted at all, but it is equally clothed with authority to determine when it shall be admitted."

That is not all; there is another paragraph:

"The power of Congress is to 'admit' a State into the Union, not to coerce it. Congress would be the very tyrant that ever existed on the face of the globe if it had a power to coerce a State into the Union contrary to the will of the people comprising that State. It lies, then, at the foundation of the question, as it does at the foundation of personal liberty, that Congress shall be satisfied—satisfied beyond a reasonable dispute—that the people composing the State ask to be admitted. It should never be forgotten that it is a mere consent on our part—nothing more. The State proposes admission and Congress gives its consent."

There is not a word about constitutions from the beginning to the end of all that. That is not all; here is another paragraph from the same speech:

"That we have the power to admit, or refuse to admit, a State, according to our sound discretion, cannot be denied. Having that power, if there be a doubt as to whether you are proposing to admit a State into the Union, or to coerce it into the Union; nothing can be lost by taking time to ask the people in a plain, safe, unmistakable manner, whether they desire it or not. The people of a Territory, which is about to be formed into a State, have a right—and, so far as my examination has gone, Congress has never violated this right—to say, in the first place, whether they desire to form a State constitution now, or not. They have a right to say whether they will take upon themselves the burdens and expenses of a State government. Where Congress has passed enabling acts, as in the cases of Ohio, Indiana, and other States, and in the celebrated Toombs bill, which has been so much talked of, an express provision was incorporated, that when the convention was assembled, it should vote, in the first instance, whether it is expedient and proper to proceed to form a State constitution at this time. The people of Kansas have never had a chance to say this, and although they might say 'we are willing to live under this Lecompton constitution, when we get ready to be a State, we are not ready to become a State now.' That is a right, a sacred and inviolable right, which belongs to the people of a Territory when they are invited to become a State."

Now, I say that is my opinion. It was so before the Senator spoke, and he aided to deepen the impression in my mind. I have said from the beginning, in this debate, that we pass no judgment upon the constitution of Kansas except to say that it is republican in form. Our vote is to admit the State; and I have said before, and I say again, we may admit her without any constitution if she only has the powers of government in actual operation. But what did the Senator say it was our duty to do? If there was any dispute as to the desire of the people of Kansas to be admitted into the Union, to be admitted now; to be admitted under the Lecompton constitution, or without any constitution, he said it was our duty to refer that question—the question of admission now—to an unmistakable, plain manner of decision by the people of Kansas themselves. It answers the Senator's own demands when he stood on this floor on the 23d of December last. The question of fact disputed, the only question of fact is, whether the people of Kansas desire to be admitted now. That is the question referred to them by this bill.

In a very able argument made by one of my colleagues in the other House, [Mr. GROESBECK,] he took the ground that the people of Kansas might have been willing, at the time they formed the Lecompton constitution, to come into the Union, but might have changed their minds, and voted against it on the 4th of January. He said that, as they had a right to propose to us a petition, they had a right to withdraw it up to the time of our acceptance. That was the ground on which he stood.

Well, sir, I agree to that. Admission is the act of both parties. They ask, and we grant, and when we were about to grant, the Senator from Michigan himself stood up and said we ought to make sure that the people desired admission now. He put it as strongly as I have said. He declared that although the people "might say we are willing to live under this Lecompton constitution when we get ready to be a State, we are not ready to become a State now." The House bill goes on the same idea. It provides that when the new convention for which it calls shall be assembled in Kansas, the first question to be submitted shall be whether they will come into the Union at that time. Let me read it:

"When so assembled, the convention shall first determine by a vote whether it is the wish of the proposed State to be admitted into the Union at that time; and if so, shall proceed to form a constitution, and take all necessary steps for the establishment of a State government," &c.

I relate this to show that the question of the admission of the State, at this time, has no necessary connection, so far as Congress is concerned, with anything relating to her constitution, and to show that the Senator from Michigan himself drew this distinction; that he himself insisted upon it; that he warned us to take it for truth; that that was the burden of his objection to the Senate bill.

Now, in the case of Kansas, the constitution had been formed before she applied for admission. In the case of an enabling act we specify the terms on which admission shall come before the constitution is made; but, in the present case, the constitution had been made. The constitution was brought to us, and the Senator, by the very terms of his argument from which I have read, admitted that the constitution might be perfectly acceptable, and yet they might not desire to be admitted; and, therefore, he insisted, and I agreed with him, that the question of admitting the State was a proper one for Congress, and the question of referring the constitution to the people was a question which he thought we had power to grant, and I thought we had not.

Now, I say the bill reported by the committee of conference is nothing in the world but a bill to ascertain, in a plain and unmistakable manner, according to the Senator's own words, whether the people of Kansas desire to come into the Union now. Let us see if it is not; let us see if I misrepresent it. I read from the first part of the first section:

"That the question of admission, with the following propositions in lieu of the ordinance framed at Lecompton, be submitted to a vote of the people of Kansas, and assented to by them, or a majority of the voters, voting at an election to be held for that purpose."

That the question of submission be submitted to the people of Kansas. Again, let us take the vote upon this submission. It is:

"At the said election the voting shall be by ballot, and by indorsing on his ballot, as each voter may please, 'proposition accepted,' or 'proposition rejected.' Should a majority of the votes cast be for 'proposition accepted,' the President of the United States, as soon as the fact is duly made known to him, shall announce the same by proclamation, and thereafter and without any further proceedings on the part of Congress, the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever, shall be complete and absolute."

That is the question submitted. And again:

"But should a majority of the votes cast be for 'proposition rejected,' it shall be deemed and held that the people of Kansas do not desire admission into the Union with said constitution under the conditions set forth in said proposition, and in that event the people of said Territory are hereby authorized and empowered to form for themselves a constitution and State government."

And so as to the convention that is to be called hereafter under the conference bill. That convention, when it is assembled, is first to determine by a vote whether it is the wish of the people of the proposed State to be admitted into the Union at that time. So in the preamble:

"Whereas, the said constitution and ordinance have been presented to Congress by order of said convention, and admission of said Territory into the Union thereon, as a State, requested; and whereas, said ordinance is not acceptable to Congress, and it is desirable to ascertain whether the people of Kansas concur in the changes in said ordinance hereinafter stated, and desire admission into the Union as a State as herein proposed."

That is what it is. It is no submission of the constitution—no submission of any part of it. We have no power to submit it; but we have the right to pass on the question of admission, and to pass on it without any reference to the constitution, as the Senator claimed, and has been demonstrated time and again on this floor; and inasmuch as it is denied, as the Senator himself denied, that the people of Kansas desired to be admitted now, we remit that question, and that only, to the vote of the people of Kansas. To be sure, the question of admission thus submitted will necessarily involve, in the mind of every voter, the question whether he approves or disapproves the constitution. No doubt of that, and nobody ever objected to that. I never heard of a man in this Congress, or anywhere in the country, who objected to the people of Kansas voting for or against their own constitution, if they wished to do it; but the ground we stood upon was that, speaking by their representatives in the Legislature, in the passage of the convention act, and speaking by their delegates in convention elected by themselves, they had solemnly forborne to vote upon anything but the seventh article. We said that was the expressed will of the people through all their Representatives in the Legislature, and in the convention, and that we could not alter it; that if these delegates or Representatives had not expressed the will of the people, it was very unfortunate; but it was a case for which we could apply no remedy, because we had no power. We never objected—certainly, at least, I never did, for a moment—to any such proposition as that these people might vote for or against their constitution. We denied that Congress had the power to require it. That was our proposition; and it is so plain that he who runs may read.

Although we cannot, and do not, and will not, remit this constitution to a vote of the people, because that is to violate its own terms, I never heard it objected to, that in voting upon the question of admission, which we had a right to remit, they might, or might not, be governed by the terms of the constitution itself. That is their own question; that is not our question; and therefore it is no objection that they can themselves, if they choose, pass upon the whole of that constitution, whilst they are at the same time voting upon a question which we have the power to submit, and absolutely. That is the reason why I say that this bill is a fair and honest compromise between the Senate bill and the House bill; that it preserves intact that which each of them claims as a fundamental right, the majority of the Senate declaring that Congress had no power to remit the constitution to a direct vote, and a portion at least, if not a majority of the House of Representatives, insisting that Congress had a right to remit the constitution, and that the people ought to be enabled to vote for, or against it, in some form. Now the people get the benefit of that right, though we do not give it to them. We give them the right to vote whether they will be admitted or not. I say, then, this proposition, while it saves the great constitutional objection to the House bill, gives to every sincere supporter of that bill all that is material in it.

Nor is the question relative to the grants of land more than one element, and that very insignificant, in the question actually submitted? We reject the ordinance passed at Lecompton, November 7, 1857; we might have left the matter thus, and admitted the State, retaining all the public lands, and allowing her, when admitted, to assert her power of taxation over them. I say we might have done that, and we did it in the Senate bill. But here we have proposed, not a bribe of any sort, but the usual grants in the case of every new State—the same which were made to Minnesota—as a mere incident, a collateral element in the question of admission; and that is the very language of the proposed bill. That, however, says my colleague, is no part of the controversy; and so says the Senator from Michigan. Well, if it be no part of the controversy, it will exercise no influence in determining the question. I agree to that. It is wholly immaterial. Wherefore, then, do these Senators declare that it is a bribe? Was it a bribe in the case of Minnesota? Did we not provide in the Minnesota enabling act that if her convention of delegates would vote to come into the Union, she should have these very same grants; but if they did not vote to come in, she should not have them. That is the very language of the Minnesota bill. Was that a bribe? I imagine no man ever thought so. This certainly cannot be a bribe; for it is much less than the convention at Lecompton asked, and much less than the late convention at Leavenworth asked.

Of course, sir, if the people vote in favor of admission at this time on the question now submitted; if they vote "proposition accepted," the constitution framed at Lecompton will be the constitution of the State of Kansas. Undoubtedly that will be the case; and why not? It was framed by a convention of delegates of the people, chosen in due form of law, delegates chosen fairly, delegates chosen unanimously; and its seventh article was ratified by an almost unanimous vote of the people—all who chose to vote. Is that not a sufficient ratification? Why, sir, let us see how circumstances alter cases. On the 9th of April, 1856, the Senator from New York [Mr. SEWARD] was urging us to admit this very Territory of Kansas as a State under the Topeka constitution; and what did he tell us then? Here is what he said:

"The President objects that the past proceedings by which the new State of Kansas was organized, were irregular in three respects: first, that they were instituted, conducted, and completed, without a previous permission by Congress, or by the local authorities within the Territory. Secondly, that they were instituted, conducted, and completed by a party, and not by the whole people of Kansas; and thirdly, that the new State holds an attitude of defiance and insubordination towards the territorial authorities, and the Federal Union. I reply, first, that if the proceedings in question were irregular and partisan-like and factious, the exigencies of the case would at least excuse the faults, and Congress has unlimited discretion to waive them. Secondly, the proceedings were not thus irregular, partisan-like, and factious, because no act of Congress forbade them; no act of the Territorial Legislature forbade them, directly, or by implication; nor had the Territorial Legislature power either to authorize or to prohibit them. The proceedings were, indeed, instituted by a party who favored them; but they were prosecuted and consummated in the customary forms of popular elections, which were open to all the inhabitants of the Territory qualified to vote by the organic law, and to no others; and they have in no case come into conflict, nor does the new State now act or assume to engage in conflict with either the territorial authorities, or the Government of the Union. Thirdly, there can be no irregularity where there is no law prescribing what shall be regular. Congress has passed no law establishing regulations for the organization or admission of new States. Precedents in such cases, being without foundation in law, are without authority. This is a country whose Government is regulated, not by precedents, but by constitutions."

Every word of that applies to every objection that has been urged here by the Senator from New York, and others, to the Lecompton constitution, with this further addition: that this election, in which everybody could have participated, was called in due form of law, and had an authority which this rebellious Topeka movement never had. But, in addition, the people of Kansas by voting for admission, will have voted that the Lecompton constitution shall be ratified, not because that is the question which is submitted, but because it is a question necessarily involved; and if they ratify with their eyes open, by what right does the Senator from Michigan or anybody else protest against it? What more does popular sovereignty require? And the whole of this side of the House are foreclosed forever and a day, as to the objection that this may be a slaveholding State; forever foreclosed from making the allegation that we have submitted this constitution to the people of Kansas as a slaveholding State, for they voted for exactly the same thing in the House bill—every man of them. If the constitution is objectionable in any of its features, if it requires revision or perfection, let the people amend it in their own way. They might vote for the admission knowing that would be their constitution, with the express purpose of altering it afterwards. They might say, "Here is an opportunity for us to enter the Union; we desire to enter the Union; we do not admire all the features of our constitution, but when we are once enfranchised as a State we shall have absolute power over our constitution, and, therefore, we will vote in the affirmative." If they choose to do it, whose business is it to call them to account? They have a right to amend it. I shall not debate that question; a majority of the Senate has said so; almost all or more than four fifths of the House of Representatives have said so in their votes on this very bill; the President of the United States has said so. So far at least as the Federal Government is concerned, in both branches of the Legislature, and in the executive department, there can be no obstacle to any amendment which the people of Kansas may desire.

The Senator from Vermont, [Mr. COLLAMER,] however, said the Supreme Court of the United States might interfere. I say, as I said before, the Supreme Court of the United States has solemnly determined that it has no power to decide which of two instruments is the constitution of a State; and it has no such power. Why, sir, it does not even undertake to decide whether a treaty has been ratified. It has decided that it cannot look to that question; but that, if a treaty is in force by permission of the Executive and the Senate, it will not look into the question whether it was, or was not, ratified in due form.

Now, sir, Kansas has no other constitution; and when Senators talk about approving the Lecompton constitution, they fall into the old blunder. They forget that Kansas has no other. She must have a constitution or a form of government. All that is absolutely required is, that she shall have a republican form of government; that is the phrase of the Federal Constitution. That form of government may be expressed in a constitution or an ordinance, or what they call in Mexico a plan, or it may rest in usage; but to rest in usage, requires, perforce, that it must be in practice; it must be in force, in operation, as was the case of Rhode Island. Her government was in actual operation; and, although it stood entirely upon usage, yet that was a sufficient form of government, and we admitted her into the Union; but Kansas has no State government in operation; we cannot stand on usage in her case; and, therefore, she must present us a constitution, or a fundamental law, or a plan, or something of that sort, containing her form of government; and she has presented none to us but the constitution framed at Lecompton. That is the only application to admit the State. There is no other application from the people of Kansas, except to be admitted with the distinct understanding that this is their form of government; and, therefore, it is a mere perversion of language—for there can be no mistake in such a distinction—to say that Congress, in admitting the State of Kansas, approves or ratifies the constitution framed at Lecompton, or forces it upon the people of Kansas, in any sense or to any extent. She has no other constitution; she asks admission knowing the fact that she has no other; and, therefore, if you admit her, you admit her with that; and if you reject her, that falls, of course, for there can be no constitution without a State.

But my colleague asks, why not submit the Topeka constitution in the same manner? Why not remit the question of the admission of the people of Kansas into the Union to their own votes, with the understanding that Topeka may be their constitution? The answer is, that Topeka is no constitution; it is a mere fraud—I take that word back for fear it might hurt somebody's feelings—it is a mere pretense; it is illegal; it is revolutionary; it is made by the authority of no law at any stage, neither in the election of delegates, nor in the alleged various submissions to the vote of the people. There is nothing to distinguish the delegate; nothing to distinguish the voter. It is a baseless, unsubstantial vision that rests nowhere. And it is given up; it is dead and buried; or at least its ghost stalks. There is nobody but my colleague so poor to do it reverence.

Mr. WADE. The Topeka constitution received the unqualified acceptance of one branch of Congress, and was rejected by the other, in the same way that Lecompton has been admitted by one and rejected by the other.

Mr. PUGH. I say if Lecompton be rejected, and does not pass both Houses, it will be dead, too.

Mr. WADE. The Senator did not understand me. I did not ask the question, why not accept the Topeka constitution? I merely asked the question why, when both these constitutions had been acted upon and received equal countenance from Congress and there was a dispute about the validity of them, did not this committee, meeting with full power to make a just conclusion of the whole matter that should be satisfactory to everybody, agree to submit them all, or to lay both aside and do what was right?

Mr. PUGH. I do not wish to misrepresent my colleague. I attach no importance to the fact that Lecompton passed one House or the other. I am willing to treat it as an offer to-day to which neither House had ever agreed. I attach no importance to the fact that one House passed a bill and the other did not. That does not make a law; nor do I admit that Congress could give any validity to one or the other. My objection to Topeka is that it was never formed by the people of Kansas; that there was no law authorizing the election of the delegates framing it; that there was no law authorizing the convention to be assembled; that there was no law authorizing anybody to vote for it; that there was no law throwing protection about the ballot-box—no protection of the right of voting. It is all idle to talk about that being a constitution. It is no more a constitution than if my colleague had sat in his seat and written it with his own hand, and offered it to Congress—not a whit.

So as to this last: we hear nobody say anything about that; but we might as well look at all. I allude to the one said to have been framed by the convention at Leavenworth. I say that was an illegal body. The bill calling that convention never passed the Legislature of Kansas. Legislatures must pass bills according to the form prescribed in the organic act; and yet this alleged Legislature, which is said to have been the representative of the friends of peace, sat sixty whole days, and took mighty good care not to pass the most important bill which they said was before them—to do just enough to make a fuss under it, and just enough to lose it. The law requires, for the protection of the Legislature and the protection of the people themselves, to secure deliberation in the Legislature, that every bill which has passed both Houses shall be presented to the Governor for approval or rejection, and that the Governor shall have three days to consider it; to consider it before he approves it, to consider it before he rejects it, and return it, with his objections, to the Legislature. Well, sir, they took good care to send it to the Governor at such a late period of the session that the Legislature was dissolved, and expired, and dead by the provisions of the organic act before the expiration of the period during which the Governor could examine it. He is allowed three days by the organic act. I know it is pretended that by counting the day on which the bill was presented to the Governor, they could eke out something in the way of three days; but it is too late to raise that question. It has been settled from the first Administration of this Government, in the most solemn and decisive manner, that the day on which a bill is presented to the President of the United States shall not be counted. The question arose, above all cases in the world, in the case of the first Bank of the United States. I have the proof; and as it is a matter of some interest, I ask the Secretary to relieve me by reading the two letters I have marked in the correspondence which I send to the desk.

The Secretary read the following letters:

WEDNESDAY NOON, February 23, 1791.

SIR: I have this moment received your sentiments with respect to the constitutionality of the bill "to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States."

This bill was presented to me by the joint committee of Congress, at twelve o'clock on Monday, the 14th instant. To what precise period, by legal interpretation of the Constitution, can the President retain it in his possession, before it becomes a law by the lapse of ten days?

GEORGE WASHINGTON.

To the Secretary of the Treasury.

FEBRUARY 23, 1791.

SIR: In answer to your note of this morning, just delivered to me, I give it as my opinion that you have ten days, exclusive of that on which the bill was delivered to you, and Sundays; hence, in the present case, if it is returned on Friday, at any time while Congress are sitting, it will be in time.

It might be a question, if returned after their adjournment on Friday.

I have the honor to be, with perfect respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

A. HAMILTON.

To the President of the United States.

Mr. PUGH. It appears by the book containing this correspondence that the bill to incorporate the Bank of the United States was presented to General Washington on the 14th day of February. It was approved on the 25th day of February, as the statute-book will show—ten days after its presentation, excluding the day of presentation, and excluding a Sunday that intervened. Is that a precedent of any authority? The first President of the United States, himself the president of the convention that framed the Constitution of the United States; Mr. Hamilton, then Secretary of the Treasury, and one of the chief men in framing the Constitution; James Madison, a very prominent member of the Federal Convention, who was at that time the leading opponent of the Bank of the United States in the House of Representatives; John Jay, who was the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court; (the latter three were the authors of the Federalist;) and thus at the earliest stage at which the Constitution could receive an interpretation, here is the correspondence showing that this idea was carried into effect, for General Washington retained that bill the full term of eleven days, one of them being a Sunday, exclusive of the day on which it was presented. It is all idle to talk about the bill calling the late convention ever having passed the Legislature. It was not a law. There was no authority to prescribe the alleged vote that is to be given upon it by the people. It is all void—no more respectable than Topeka itself. I say, then, there is no constitution from Kansas but Lecompton.

But even if this new affair were proper, it is worse than any of the others. Suppose that even the bill had passed properly: let me examine it. It expressly requires that this new constitution, as they call it, shall not go into effect until it has been ratified by the people. Those delegates have not been elected, as the Lecompton delegates were, with authority to form a constitution themselves. They were only elected with authority to propose one to the people; and the law itself requires that it shall be submitted to the people, and be voted on by the people. But, sir, to whom is it submitted? To the people? Not at all. It is submitted to the negroes of the Territory.

I admit that any State of this Union can authorize negro suffrage. If the constitution of Kansas had been once legally formed, and she had become a State, indubitably her people, by an amendment of the constitution, or in any other proper form, might enfranchise the negro, the woman, the alien, or the idiot. Once admitted, once elevated to the dignity of sovereignty, they have the right to define the elective franchise for themselves; but they cannot make people citizens of the United States. That was the distinction made in the Dred Scott case.

Mr. WILSON. Will the Senator allow me a word?

Mr. PUGH. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator from Ohio is altogether mistaken in regard to this matter. The Leavenworth constitution, in this respect, is exactly like the Lecompton constitution, word for word, and comma for comma.

Mr. PUGH. Except the whites.

Mr. WILSON. The word "whites" is not there. It is a precise and exact copy of the Lecompton constitution in this respect—nothing more, nothing less.

Mr. PUGH. Does the Senator from Massachusetts mean to say that under this new constitution negro suffrage is not to be admitted?

Mr. WILSON. I mean to say that so far as negroes are concerned, the Lecompton and Leavenworth constitutions are, word for word, comma for comma, precisely, exactly alike, Leavenworth being a copy of Lecompton.

Mr. PUGH. I will show that the Senator is not right about that, but I propose to come to that point after a while. Whatever may be the language of one particular clause, the other clauses of the Lecompton constitution exclude slaves and free negroes—exclude free negroes from the State; but this one, as I shall show, makes express provision for them to become voters; it does not stand on one clause. I wish, however, to dispose of the other question first. I say, I admit that a State once formed and erected into a sovereignty may enfranchise the negro; but this is a question of taste for themselves. I am no enemy of the negro. I would not abuse him. I have always voted for what I thought would benefit him. I voted to repeal the black laws of my State, and have always been proud of the vote. I would not abuse him; but I never intend that he shall be elevated to the rank of citizenship, with my assistance, in the State where I reside; and more than one hundred thousand majority of the people of my State are opposed to anything of that sort.

But, sir, the main point is, that when you come to gather a body of people from the various States into the Territories, and they come to form a political community for the first time, the negro finds no entrance. I said that was decided in the Dred Scott case; and here it is:

"The words 'people of the United States' and 'citizens' are synonymous terms, and mean the same thing. They both describe the political body who, according to our republican institutions, form the sovereignty, and who hold the power and conduct the Government through their representatives. They are what we familiarly call the 'sovereign people,' and every citizen is one of this people, and a constituent member of this sovereignty. The question before us is, whether the class of persons described in the plea in abatement compose a portion of this people, and are constituent members of this sovereignty? We think they are not, and that they are not included, and were not intended to be included, under the word 'citizens' in the Constitution, and can therefore claim none of the rights and privileges which that instrument provides for and secures to citizens of the United States. On the contrary, they were at that time considered as a subordinate and inferior class of beings, who had been subjugated by the dominant race, and, whether emancipated or not, yet remained subject to their authority, and had no rights or privileges but such as those who held the power and the Government might choose to grant them."

"It is not the province of this court to decide upon the justice or injustice, the policy or impolicy, of these laws. The decision of that question belonged to the political or law-making power; to those who formed the sovereignty and framed the Constitution. The duty of the court is, to interpret the instrument they have framed, with the best lights we can obtain on the subject, and to administer it as we find it, according to its true intent and meaning when it was adopted."

"In discussing this question, we must not confound the rights of citizenship which a State may confer within its own limits and the rights of citizenship as a member of the Union. It does not by any means follow, because he has all the rights and privileges of a citizen of a State, that he must be a citizen of the United States. He may have all of the rights and privileges of the citizen of a State, and yet not be entitled to the rights and privileges of a citizen in any other State. For, previous to the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, every State had the undoubted right to confer on whomsoever it pleased the character of citizen, and to endow him with all its rights. But this character of course was confined to the boundaries of the State, and gave him no rights or privileges in other States beyond those secured to him by the laws of nations and the comity of States. Nor have the several States surrendered the power of conferring these rights and privileges by adopting the Constitution of the United States. Each State may still confer them upon an alien, or any one it thinks proper, or upon any class or description of persons; yet he would not be a citizen in the sense in which that word is used in the Constitution of the United States, nor entitled to sue as such in one of its courts, nor to the privileges and immunities of a citizen in the other States. The rights which he would acquire would be restricted to the State which gave them. The Constitution has conferred on Congress the right to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and this right is evidently exclusive, and has always been held by this court to be so. Consequently no State, since the adoption of the Constitution, can by naturalizing a citizen invest him with the rights and privileges secured to a citizen of a State alone the Federal Government, although, so far as the State alone was concerned, he would undoubtedly be entitled to the rights of a citizen, and clothed with all the rights and immunities which the constitution and laws of the State attached to that character."

"It is very clear, therefore, that no State can, by any act or law of its own, passed since the adoption of the Constitution, introduce a new member into the political community created by the Constitution of the United States. It cannot make him a member of this community by making him a member of its own. And for the same reason it cannot introduce any person, or description of persons, who were not intended to be embraced in this new political family, which the Constitution brought into existence, but were intended to be excluded from it."

The court draws the distinction that the State may make him a voter; but he cannot be made a voter otherwise, nor do his rights of citizenship and voting extend beyond the limits of that State.

The Senator from Massachusetts wanted to contradict me in regard to the Leavenworth constitution. I say the constitution formed at Leavenworth is not submitted to the people. It is submitted to the ordeal of the ballot-box stuffed with negro votes. It is not even required that they shall be free negroes; they may be slaves. It submits the question to the slave whether he will emancipate himself by his own vote, by adopting the constitution; and to the free negro the question whether he will raise himself to the rank of citizenship; and all this contrary to the good old rule that no man shall be allowed to judge in his own case. Thus the white citizens, the white men of Kansas, are to have a government made for them, not through popular sovereignty, but through negro sovereignty. That is the last thing.

Now, did I tell the truth about this Leavenworth constitution? I do not see the Senator from Massachusetts here any longer. If he were here, I should like to inquire of him as to the authenticity of this document. I find it in what is called "The Quindaro Chindowan." Who can tell me what sort of a paper that is?

Mr. WILSON. It is a free-State paper in the Territory of Kansas.

Mr. PUGH. The editor appears to have been one of the delegates, and chairman of the committee that drafted the address of the convention; and that address is here, but I shall not read it. Let us see how this Leavenworth constitution is to be ratified. The second section of the schedule provides:

"Sec. 2. This constitution shall be submitted to a vote of the people for approval or rejection, on the third Tuesday of May, 1855. The vote shall be by ballot; and those in favor of the constitution shall write or print upon their ballots the words: 'For the constitution;' and those opposed to the constitution, shall write or print upon their ballots the words: 'Against the constitution.'"

You observe there is no definition of the right of franchise there. They call everybody "the people." But, in the first section of article second, on the elective franchise, they provide:

"Sec. 1. In all elections not otherwise provided for by the constitution, every male citizen of the United States, of the age of twenty-one years or upwards, who shall have resided in the State six months next preceding such election, and ten days in the precinct in which he may offer to vote, and every male person of foreign birth, of the age of twenty-one years or upwards, and who shall have resided in the United States one year, in this State six months, and in the precinct in which he may offer to vote ten days next preceding such election, and who shall have declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States conformably to the laws of the United States, ten days preceding such election, shall be deemed a qualified elector."

Here are negro suffrage and alien suffrage together.

Mr. HARLAN. It seems to me that provision excludes negro suffrage.

Mr. PUGH. Wherein?

Mr. HARLAN. Under the Dred Scott decision negroes are decided not to be citizens of the United States. As I understand this provision in the Leavenworth constitution, it is that all male citizens of the United States over the age of twenty-one years may vote. Then, if negroes are not citizens of the United States they are not enfranchised by this provision.

Mr. PUGH. I say with the Senator they are not citizens of the United States; but the question which I am putting is, whether it is intended that they shall vote on the proposed acceptance of this constitution; and to determine that it is necessary to inquire whether the convention recognized or overruled the Dred Scott decision. I say they determined to overrule it. I find under the editorial head of this paper—

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. PUGH. Certainly.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I beg leave to read from the Lecompton constitution precisely the same words:

"Every male citizen of the United States above the age of twenty-one years, having resided in this State one year, and in the county, city, or town, in which he may offer to vote, three months, next preceding any election, shall have the qualifications of an elector, and be entitled to vote at all elections."

Mr. PUGH. Where does the Senator find that?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. In the Lecompton constitution.

Mr. PUGH. What article and section?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. In section one of article eight, the title of which is, "elections and rights of suffrage."

Mr. PUGH. That is the definition of suffrage after the State shall be in the Union.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. You read from the same provision in the Leavenworth constitution.

Mr. PUGH. No, sir; the schedule in the Lecompton constitution defines the qualification of a voter at the election for the adoption or rejection of the constitution. This does not; this refers to the other article. But that, as I said, is proper enough in the Lecompton constitution, because that excludes free negroes from the State.

But, sir, I ask the question, in what form was this Leavenworth constitution adopted? I ask, did they mean, in point of fact, to have negro suffrage at the pretended election for or against the constitution? My allegation is, that, instead of relying upon the people, they, knowing themselves to be repudiated and factious minority; knowing that the great body of the free-State people of Kansas abhorred them just as much as the pro-slavery men did, fixed up this scheme by which they intended to deceive Congress by stuffing the ballot-box with negro votes. Did they mean negro suffrage by the words of the section I have read? I said that the editor of the paper from which I read this constitution was not only one of the delegates, but chairman of the committee that drafted the address. I find in his paper this article, headed "Last Days of the Convention:"

"The constitutional convention closed its labors at six o'clock, p. m., Saturday, April 3d. Friday and Saturday were busy days, although the main part of the work had been previously performed. The morning session of Friday was spent in discussing the amendment to the article on elective franchise, offered by Dr. Davis. The matter was disposed of by the following, introduced by Mr. Thacher, being adopted:

"Whereas, the law calling this convention prescribes the qualification of voters at the first election: Therefore, be it Resolved, That the committee on schedule be instructed to report a clause instructing the first General Assembly to submit the question of negro suffrage to the people at the second general election for members of the General Assembly: Provided, that, at the said election, the qualification of voters shall be the same as upon the vote of the constitution.

"The vote on this stood—yeas 50, nays 28."

Now, you will observe that, at the same time that they take a vote upon the constitution with this ballot-box stuffing, they vote for the officers and the Legislature. If we were to grant all that has been alleged against the territorial proceedings in Kansas, I do not know the difference in principle between this proposition and allowing people to go over from Missouri in a body to impose a constitution, and impose State officers upon Kansas. I confess, for one, as a matter of personal taste, I would rather have a constitution imposed on me, and officers elected by my white brethren, than by a parcel of negroes, as this proposes to do; and, accordingly, the last section of this schedule provides:

"Sec. 12. The first General Assembly shall provide by law for the submission of the question of universal suffrage"—that is what they call it—

"to a vote of the people at the first general election of the members of the General Assembly: Provided, That the qualifications of voters at that election shall be the same as at the vote on the submission of the constitution."

Sir, it is all a sham; they have not even obeyed their own pretended convention act; they have not remitted this constitution to the people; and after all that has been alleged in private, after all that has been alleged in public, against the stuffing of ballot-boxes by Missouri votes, under the Lecompton constitution, it does not begin to approach this deliberate attempt to palm a constitution on the people of Kansas by the aid of negro suffrage.

Therefore, we are brought, as I say again, to the proposition that, although we remit the question of the admission of Kansas to the people of Kansas, as she has no other constitution than Lecompton, her admission, per force, recognizes that as her organic law. We are not responsible for this juxtaposition and intimate connection between the questions. We, as I have said, cannot remit the constitution to the people, but we do submit the question of admission by this bill, as we have a right to submit it. That does involve in the mind of every voter, and in a manner wholly unobjectionable, so far as we are concerned, the question whether he is or is not satisfied with the organic act of the new State.

But the honorable Senator from Vermont, and my colleague, complained that there would be fraud practiced upon this allegation: they said there would be false returns, there would be false votes, and there would be a return made that the people voted in favor of admission.

Mr. COLLAMER. I hope the Senator will do me the justice to say that I spoke entirely from history. Having been done before, and encouraged, have we not a right to suppose that it may be done again?

Mr. PUGH. Let us take the Senator where he stands. We have the best excuse for all that, so far as this bill is concerned, in the history of past elections in Kansas: Did not the Senator from Vermont think that some more stringent provision was necessary, in order to prevent false votes and false returns? Where did his wisdom culminate? It culminated in the fourth section of the House amendment, and that section we have copied into this bill. We have adopted his own remedy.

Mr. COLLAMER. I said on that occasion that our security was found in the appointment of the board who were to conduct the election, being composed of an equal number of officers chosen by the people and by the President.

Mr. PUGH. I shall come to the board directly. I say the Senator's wisdom and the wisdom of those who voted for the House amendment, is expressed in its fourth section. That section is in these words:

"Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That in the elections hereby authorized, all white male inhabitants of said Territory over the age of twenty-one years, who are legal voters under the laws of the Territory of Kansas, and none others, shall be allowed to vote; and this shall be the only qualification required to entitle the voter to the right of suffrage in said elections. And if any person not so qualified shall vote or offer to vote, or if any person shall vote more than once at either of said elections, or shall make or cause to be made any false, fictitious, or fraudulent returns, or shall alter or change any returns of either of said elections, such person shall, upon conviction thereof before any court of competent jurisdiction, be kept at hard labor not less than six months, and not more than three years."

We have copied that section literally into this bill. We have taken their own safeguard in their own words to define and to punish illegal voting and false returns.

Mr. COLLAMER. Did I not state that our great security was founded on the construction of the board?

Mr. PUGH. Yes, sir, I understand that. I have become very much acquainted of late years with the tactics of the party to which the honorable Senator belongs. Whenever they are beaten at any election, they are sure it was done by fraud. They think their luck is perfectly inexorable, and account for every defeat by some allegation of fraud. Now, let us see about the board. What is the difference between this board and the other one—between the board constituted by this bill and the board constituted by the House bill, for which the gentleman voted? By the House bill the Governor and Secretary of the Territory, and the President of the Council, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Territorial Legislature, were constituted the board. This bill provides for the same officers, with the addition of the district attorney. How does that make any difference? They must have relied on the Governor and Secretary before, because they could not have a majority of the board unless they relied on them. The utmost they could have claimed was an equal division of the board, and then nothing would be decided. They must have relied on the Governor and Secretary before, and they still have the Governor and Secretary; but they have, in addition, the district attorney—an officer confirmed by our votes, and whose successor must needs be confirmed by our votes. It is too late to pretend that, merely because he is nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate, he cannot be trusted. You have already agreed to trust two officers nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate, to wit: the Governor and Secretary, so that this is a mere pretext for the occasion. Why is the district attorney introduced? asks my colleague. Simply to enable a majority to be one way or another. If there is division of opinion, the board is powerless. This was an error in the House bill. In a board so constituted you could never arrive at any decision. To decide anything you must have provision for a majority.

But my colleague says that the Governor and Secretary are appointed by the President, whereas the President of the Council and the Speaker of the House represent the people. Indeed! Do they represent the people? They can be trusted, because they represent the people! How much do they represent the people? Each of them is chosen Councillor or Representative, as the case may be, by the people of his county—nothing more; and his associates in the Council or House, as the case may be, choose him to the chair; and my colleague thinks that a man who derives his title in that way can be trusted; that a man who has been elected by the people to represent a district of country, and then by the body to which he is chosen has been elevated to the chair, represents the people, and can be trusted to receive and count the votes and declare the result. Why, sir, that is the case of John Calhoun. He was elected almost unanimously a delegate to the Lecompton convention from the county of Douglas; he was created president of the convention by a large majority of that body; and yet, from the first day of the session to this hour, this Chamber has rung with denunciations against reposing in him the power to receive the returns and declare the results of elections; and now we are at last told that the great safeguard of the House bill was in two more John Calhouns. Was ever anything more preposterous?

Well, sir, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HALE] made a suggestion yesterday which has been repeated to-day in a diluted form by the Senator from Michigan. He says if Kansas has a population sufficient to be admitted as a slaveholding State now, she has a population sufficient to be admitted as a non-slaveholding State. Undoubtedly; nobody denies that; but the difficulty is that she has only applied for admission as a slaveholding State; she has not applied as a non-slaveholding State; and these Senators have affirmed it, every man of them, for they have agreed to remit that slaveholding constitution, by the House bill, to a vote of the people, and agreed to stand by it as a slaveholding State just as much as this provision does.

So, sir, they have effectually answered themselves at every stage, in regard to every complaint, every pretense set up against this measure of peace, this measure which, while it preserves the constitutional limits of the Federal Government from invading the reserved rights of the States, does, in an unobjectionable manner, by submitting the question of admission to the people, enable them, if they do not like the Lecompton constitution, to overturn it—as against this measure, which, whilst it respects principle on all sides, accomplishes the great points which all desire; every pretext set up by the Senators is answered by their own vote for the House bill.

But it is asked if the people of Kansas vote in the negative, why not offer them the alternative of another constitution? Well, sir, she has no other, and until she has another you cannot admit her. What is it that you submit now? What is the question submitted? As I stated, under this bill the question put to the people of Kansas is, "will you come into the Union now?" If they say yea, well; if they say nay, one answer is as good as fifty. Why turn round and put it to them again? If they say they will not come in now, and they have no other constitution, perforce they must make another before they can even have a question of their admission, or can petition for it.

But the Senator from Michigan, and the rest of these Senators, say if the people of Kansas do not accept this proposition, if they do not vote to come into the Union now, they are to be kept out an indefinite time. Well, sir, how long? They are to be kept out until they have a population sufficient, according to the ratio, for a Representative in Congress. The Senator from Michigan says they have not it now. I believe the Senator from New Hampshire said so yesterday; and all these Senators are now rising here to proclaim that the great iniquity of this proposition consists in the fact that they know Kansas has not sufficient population for a Representative. I suspect that is the truth; and I think we made a great mistake in that regard when we so far yielded to their clamor as to pass the Toombs bill. Having, however, yielded to that (with my protest against the insufficiency of the population then) on the false reports of these Senators, and having agreed that one constitution formed under its provisions might be received without any question of population, I stand here to-day to redeem my promise, and to vote to admit her, notwithstanding her insufficient population, under a constitution which is the legitimate offspring of the Toombs bill. But that is as far as I have ever agreed to go, and that is as far as I intend to go. If, as the Senator from Michigan says, Kansas has but forty thousand people, it is bad enough for me, by my vote, to seat two Senators on this floor representing a community with a less population than six or seven wards of the city in which I reside.

But, sir, what I desire now to say to my republican friends is this: do you honestly believe that Kansas has not ninety-three thousand people at this time? Is that what the Senator from New York [Mr. SEWARD] thinks? Is that what all the rest of them think? If so, it ought to admonish the country; it ought to admonish those who sit in the same Chamber with them, that literally no dependence is to be put in any of the statements of fact usually made by these Senators in relation to Kansas. Now, I intend to prove what I have just asserted. On the 9th of April, 1856, the Senator from New York addressed the Senate in support of the Topeka constitution; and on that occasion he said:

"The constitution does not prescribe ninety-three thousand seven hundred, or any other number of people, as necessary to constitute a State. Besides, under the present ratio of increase, Kansas, whose population now is forty thousand, will number one hundred thousand in a few months. The point made concerning numbers is, therefore, practically unimportant and frivolous."

This was on the 9th of April, 1856, two years ago. Where are the one hundred thousand people who were to be in Kansas in a few months from that day? Where is your Free-Soil prophecy? I have another one—a prophecy and an assertion of fact. The Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] on the 20th of May, 1856, delivered a speech on the same subject; and here is his statement:

"It is objected that the population of Kansas is not sufficient for a State; and this objection is sustained by under-estimating their numbers there, and exaggerating the numbers required by precedent. In the absence of any recent census, it is impossible to do more than approximate to the actual population: but, from careful inquiry of the best sources, I am led to place it now at fifty thousand"—it was only forty thousand on the 9th of April, 1856; on the 20th of May, it got up to fifty thousand—

"though I observe that a prudent authority, the Boston Daily Advertiser, puts it as high as sixty thousand; and while I speak, this remarkable population, fed by fresh immigration, is outstripping even these calculations. Nor can there be a doubt that, before the assent of Congress can be perfected in the ordinary course of legislation, this population will swell to the large number of ninety-three thousand four hundred and twenty, required in the bill of the Senator from Illinois."

That was said nearly two years ago. Well, sir, has all this population got to Kansas? This was the pretext made for forcing the Topeka constitution through the Congress of the United States. When they wanted Topeka carried, there was no limit to their assertions of fact, or to their imagination and their prophecies. Then Kansas had forty, fifty, or sixty thousand; and she was to have ninety-three thousand before the bill passed the two Houses, and one hundred thousand in a few months. When it comes to Leocompton, whenever somebody else's bill comes up, they object, because Kansas, two years after all these statements and prophecies, has only forty thousand people. Had she forty thousand then? Had she those magnificent numbers promised us by the Senators from Massachusetts and New York two years ago? If she had, she has been decreasing in population ever since. I think we had better admit her very quickly, for after a while there will not be anybody there at this enormous rate of decrease.

This shows that when it comes to any assertion of fact that it is necessary for a political purpose, there will be somebody to manufacture it, and that even Senators representing the sovereign constituencies of this Union will stand up here to assert as true that which turns out to be a great perversion. If Kansas has but forty thousand people, she ought not to come into this Union; but I will vote for anything which is the legitimate deduction of the Toombs bill, because I consider myself self committed to that proposition just as I consider the Senator from Michigan committed to it. We agreed to stand on the provisions of that bill. It was no question whether that bill should pass Congress or pass the Legislature. The question was whether, if, under the safeguards and upon the principles developed in that bill, a convention of delegates should be chosen by the people, we would abide by the result? I said I would abide by it. I made no proviso to the effect that my action would depend on the fact whether anybody stayed away from the polls. You will look in vain for that; but I supposed that if anybody stayed away, of course the rule of law must apply that those who do vote act for all. I will follow that bill to the end; but I will follow no other. If it be true, in spite of these magnificent promises made here in April and May, 1856, on the faith of which I voted for the Toombs bill, as others did, that they were all delusive and false, and that Kansas has not now the population they then stated she had, I think she may well stay out of the Union, and not be disturbing the whole of us by the noise of a few thousand people out there who are not able to sustain the burdens of a State government.

I shall not detain the Senate much longer. Who is to complain of this? I say that the question submitted to Kansas is, "will you come into the Union now?" Suppose she says, "no; I will not come in. I will not come in because I do not like the constitution;" or "because I want the whole thirty millions of public lands which I have claimed in my ordinance;" or "because I have not enough population to bear the expenses of a State government;" or for any reason, I do not care what it is: then the question is, shall we authorize her at once to form a constitution with a view to admission into the Union? I say I will authorize her to do it when she has a sufficient population. That is what we ought to have done in the first place. That, in my judgment, is at the bottom of all these troubles in Kansas. I said here two years ago that I did not believe the question of slavery or no slavery was the matter that agitated most of the people in Kansas. They have had land speculators and candidates for office who have been anxious to stimulate a small community into the gigantic proportions of a State, and force her into the Union with a view to speculate in the rise of land. If they are in earnest, they will be glad to come in. It is a remarkable fact that those who were called by the Senator from Massachusetts the oppressed people of Kansas, are as industrious as can be in voting whenever there is an election for officers. They could vote at the election for members of the Territorial Legislature, in October, 1857; they could vote for members of the Legislature and State officers in January, 1858; but whenever it comes to a question that involves the matter of slavery, whether it be an election of delegates to the constitutional convention, or whether it be the vote upon the seventh article, in December last, they are very industriously absent.

But, sir, who is to complain of this requisite as to population? Shall it be my honorable friend, the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS?] That is his own proposition. I have before me a bill:

"In the Senate of the United States, March 17, 1856:
"Mr. DOUGLAS, from the Committee on Territories, reported the following bill: A bill to authorize the people of the Territory of Kansas to form a constitution and State government, preparatory to their admission into the Union when they have the requisite population."

This bill of the Senator from Illinois provides "That whenever it shall appear, by a census to be taken under the direction of the Governor, by the authority of the Legislature, that there shall be ninety-three thousand four hundred and twenty inhabitants (that being the number required by the present ratio of representation for a member of Congress) within the limits hereinafter described in the Territory of Kansas, the Legislature of said Territory shall be, and is hereby, authorized to provide by law for the election of delegates by the people of said Territory to assemble in convention and form a constitution and State government, preparatory to their admission into the Union on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatsoever."

That is the very provision of this bill. The only objection is that we have taken his own bill, reported by him from the Committee on Territories. If it be said that that is too far back, or too long ago, two years, let us come to a later period. I have before me an amendment presented to this body on the 8th of April, 1858, by the Senator from Illinois, from the Committee on Territories, to the Arizona bill. The fourth section of that amendment or substitute is:

"Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That whenever said Territories [New Mexico and Arizona] shall contain a sufficient population to constitute a State—to wit: the number required by the then ratio or representation for a member of Congress, to be ascertained by a census taken in pursuance of law—the Legislature of said Territory may proceed to call a convention for the purpose of forming a constitution of State government; which constitution shall be submitted to the people for ratification or rejection; and if ratified by a majority of the legal voters in the limits of the proposed State, but not otherwise, may be sent to Congress in the form of an application for admission into the Union on an equal footing with the other States, with such boundaries as Congress shall prescribe. This section shall be, and is hereby, incorporated into and made a part of the organic law of each of the Territories of the United States, except the Territory of Utah."

So that if you were to strike out the whole of this very proposition of the committee of conference except so much of it as submits the question of present admission to the people of Kansas, and pass the Senator's Arizona bill, the effect would be the same.

Mr. DOUGLAS. My friend from Ohio is under some slight misapprehension in regard to my views upon that question. I say to him now that if he will strike out all about the Leocompton constitution, and provide that neither Kansas nor any other Territory of the United States shall form a constitution and State government and come into the Union until it has the requisite population for a Representative to Congress, I will vote for it. My objection is to saying to Kansas, "you may come in with forty thousand if you take a constitution you do not like; but you shall wait until you have one hundred thousand unless you vote for that particular constitution." If you will make the rule general, apply it to Kansas and all other Territories, I will vote for it to-day or any other day.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. President, I have said before there is no such proposition made. There is no proposition made to force them to come in or stay out. Every Senator here knows that these grants of public lands, which are said to be bribes, are grants made in the case of every new State, and that they will as certainly be made when Kansas comes into the Union as if it were so provided now. She must be a State before you can give them to her, and that is the only reason why we do not give them to her now in any event; and hence I say that is an immaterial element in the question. The real question is as the Senator from Michigan stated it at the beginning of the session. He said the people of Kansas might not desire to come into the Union, and that they might not desire to come in without the least reference to the Leocompton constitution. I say that question I will put to the people: do you desire to come in? If you come, you come in with a constitution, and if you have any other constitution than Leocompton, in God's name take it; but if they have no other, and if they do not like it, they will not come in; and if they do like it, they will come in. That is the whole of it.

I bound myself—my friend from Illinois as well as I—by voting for the Toombs bill, that in any constitution framed under the provisions of that bill, I would waive the question of population, and I never agreed to waive it for anything else; and now, that the Toombs bill is expended, all its force gone—now that it has failed, by reason of the fact that some of the people of Kansas would not vote at an election where they could have fairly and truly expressed their wishes; now that every argument of peace and conciliation and compromise has been made to them, and not accepted; now when a fair opportunity to become a State, with full power and authority to rectify and amend all their institutions in their own way as a sovereign State, is offered; if they refuse that I fall back where I was before the Toombs bill, following the lead of my honorable friend from Illinois in his bill to authorize them to form a constitution and State government when they have the requisite population. That is my position; and I state it to the Senate in defense of the report of the committee of conference. I stated, as my objection to the House bill, that I was willing to give the people of Kansas, in any form in which I constitutionally could do it, a right to vote for or against Leocompton. I cannot remit the constitution to them directly; I had no such power; but I was willing to give them a right to speak by any form in which I could do it consistent with the constitutional duties and limitations on the power of Congress; but if they reject it, then let them wait until they have a right to admission and a right to demand it. Then I say, having failed to themselves of the benefits of the Toombs bill, I would give them back to the tender mercies of my friend, the Senator from Illinois, under his bill of March, 1856.

The Senator from Michigan says that will not settle the question, and all these Senators have prophesied civil war. Mr. President, I should think they would have got tired of these prophecies; I am sure I am tired of them, and I do not mean to make any myself. So far as I am concerned in my vote on this proposition, I can only say I believe it to be a fair and honest proposition; that if the people of Kansas consult their own interests, they will at once silence all this agitation; and if they are sufficiently numerous to take upon themselves the burdens of a State government, they will at once come into the Union, and, if there be anything amiss in their constitution, proceed, in a regular, orderly manner, to reform it; and that if they have not the numbers sufficient to justify admission, they will silence this whole controversy, and peaceably go about their business, occupying the soil, tilling their farms, until they have a population sufficient to bear these great burdens.

But, sir, how much are the tones changed on this side of the House in this regard! When the Topeka constitution was before us, we were urged to admit Kansas at any hazard, in any manner, no matter what the constitution, no matter how irregular, no matter how formed. We were told that her case was so urgent, her distress so great, that the mere admission of her, the mere raising her to the dignity of a sovereign State, without anything else, would heal all her wounds and infirmities. The Senator from New York said so. Here it is, in his speech of April 9th, 1856, from which I before quoted:

"Congress has power to admit the new State thus organized. The favorable exercise of that power will terminate and crown the revolution. Once a State, the people of Kansas can preserve internal order, and defend themselves against invasion. Thus, the constitutional remedy is as effectual as it is peaceful and simple.

"This is the remedy for the evils existing in the Territory of Kansas, which I propose. Happily, there is no need to prove it to be either a lawful one or a proper one, or the only possible one."

He urged the immediate admission of Kansas upon a constitution acknowledged by him in this agreement to be irregular. He contended that the urgency was so great that we should overlook all the requisites of the law. He said that, once a State, Kansas would instantly be relieved from all her troubles. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] took up the wondrous tale. In his speech of May 20, 1856, he said:

"Next, and lastly, comes the remedy of justice and peace, proposed by the Senator from New York. [Mr. SEWARD] and embodied in his bill for the immediate admission of Kansas as a State of this Union, now pending as a substitute for the bill of the Senator from Illinois."

Not the admission of Kansas as a free State—not the admission of Kansas with any particular constitution—but the mere admission of the State in any way, in any form: this was "the remedy of peace and justice." What else?

"Rarely has any proposition, so simple in character, so entirely practicable, so absolutely within your power, been presented, which promised at once such beneficial results. In its adoption, the crime against Kansas will all be happily absolved, the usurpation which it established will be peacefully suppressed, and order will be permanently secured. By a joyful metamorphosis, this fair Territory may be saved from outrage."

Sir, the Senator ascended into rhyme, and I will give you his poetry on the occasion:

"Oh, help," she cries, "in this extremest need,
If you who hear are deities indeed;
Gape, earth, and make for this dread foe a tomb,
Or change my form, whence all my sorrows come."

What is the illustration of all this? Two years ago admission, in any form, under any circumstances, upon any argument, as the last plank to the shipwrecked mariner; the admission of Kansas as a State, no matter what her constitution; was the great remedy that was to heal all things there. It was a mere form that was the matter with her; if she could merely change her form from a territorial to a State government, everything would be healed. Well, sir, we offered it. If that be the great boon, if that be the balm in

Gilead, which will lift her pale and bleeding form from the earth, and hide all her wounds and nakedness, cover her infirmities, and enthrone her with honor, we offer it to her; and we say to her at the same breath, as the President and both Houses of Congress have expressed their opinions already, "from the moment we bring you into the Union as a State, we clothe you with the highest attributes of sovereignty; you are your own masters; you can make and unmake constitutions at will; if you do not like Lecompton, you may take any other; if you like Topeka, set it up."

We give them this in the form which they have themselves prescribed in their own bill; and yet the Senator from Michigan warns us—perhaps in behalf of his new allies—that this question is to go into the next presidential election. Be it so. It must be decided at some time. If the people of the United States, the people of the northern States and the people of the southern States, have not the virtue, the self-command, the patriotism, to see on what bald pretenses this continual disturbance is kept up, merely ministering to the aggrandizement of individuals by elevating them to place and power, they have not the patriotism and the intelligence any longer to maintain a republican form of government; it makes no difference when, or in what form, the overthrow of public liberty comes; it has become a mere question of time. Here is a Government, formed by wise and patriotic statesmen, who established its foundations on eternal principles of truth and justice and equality as between the States and the people of the States. They saw no difficulty in non-slaveholding and slaveholding States remaining in the same Union on terms of equality, peace, and justice, under the protection of a common Government. From a few feeble colonies on the Atlantic, we have risen to be the mightiest empire in the history of time. Our population has crossed the Alleghanies, and new communities, new sovereignties, are gathered along the Mississippi, from its sources in the lakes to its mouth at the Gulf of Mexico. This has been a good Government to us all. It has protected us all in the days of our youth. It has been full of blessing to us and to all of our constituents. If it is to be sacrificed, if we are to bring Kansas in as a foot-ball to be kicked backwards and forwards every four years, not with any eye to our own peace and safety, but simply as a means whereby this man or that man or the other man shall be elevated to the presidential chair and have the disposition of office and patronage, then your Government has lost its life, and it makes no difference when it loses its form.

But, sir, that is not the feeling of the people of my State. The people of Kansas may act, and act unwisely, as they have done before. I hope they will not. I believe that experience is a bitter school, and they have passed through that school. I hope, at all events, they will have the justice, the desire for peace, the patriotism, to amend all their wrongs in this peaceable manner; but if not, if they persist in keeping up this disturbance, if they persist in making the whole business of this Government and all the vital necessities of thirty millions of people subordinate to their miserable, petty squabbles and quarrels, then I think the people of the United States, outside of the limits of Kansas, have sense enough and wisdom enough to close the controversy by telling them they may remain a community to themselves until they reach some degree of quiet and peace. Sir, I am sorry to have detained the Senate so long.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PUGH] in my judgment, has raised an issue which neither exists in this case, nor is at all material to the determination of the question which is now before the Senate. The issue which he raises is an issue upon the Leavenworth constitution, as it is called—a constitution which is not here, a constitution which has never been presented either to the President or to Congress; a constitution which has not yet been voted upon by the people of Kansas. If it were here, it would be impossible that that constitution should be moved as an amendment to the present proposition pending before the Senate; for to this report of the committee of conference no amendment whatever can be proposed. No such issue is raised here. But, sir, if there were such an issue, it is a false one —false in fact, false in inference, false as raising a mere clamor without the slightest foundation under heaven.

Sir, the honorable Senator from Ohio would say, by way of prejudicing the action of the free-State men of Kansas, that in the constitution which they have formed lately at Leavenworth, they have adopted universal negro suffrage. The language of the constitution which they have framed, in that respect, is quoted, word for word, letter for letter, comma for comma, from this very Lecompton constitution now before the Senate; and, sir, if the Leavenworth constitution, in the article upon suffrage, provides that all the negroes of the Territory may vote, the Lecompton constitution does precisely the same thing. The language of both is identical in this particular; both mean the same thing. Does the honorable Senator from Ohio pretend that the same language does not mean the same thing? that precisely the same terms of expression, when used in one constitution, do not mean exactly the same when used in another?

Mr. PUGH. The Senator certainly is not able, in point of fact, to misunderstand me. I said before, that the Lecompton constitution excluded free negroes, which this one does not. Now they could not vote if they were not there, and I see them excluded in language so plain that it is not possible to misunderstand it. That is the Lecompton constitution.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Does the Senator from Ohio claim that free negroes are citizens of the United States?

Mr. PUGH. I have said that I do not.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will read the language of this so called Leavenworth constitution:

"In all elections not otherwise provided for by this constitution, every male citizen of the United States of the age of twenty-one years or upwards, who shall have resided in the State six months next preceding such election, &c., shall be entitled to vote."

Sir, upon the gentleman's own ground, if negroes are not citizens of the United States, the charge is a false one, if charge it be, against the Leavenworth constitution. Precisely the same language is used in the Lecompton constitution:

"Every male citizen of the United States, above the age of twenty-one years, having resided in the State one year, and in the county, city, or town in which he may offer to vote, three months next preceding any election, shall have the qualifications of an elector, and be entitled to vote at all elections."

How, then, does it stand upon the schedule?

The schedule of the Leavenworth constitution provides that it shall be submitted to the people of Kansas for ratification or rejection, and that "said election shall be conducted according to the provisions of section thirteen of an act of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Kansas, passed February, 1853, entitled 'An act to provide for the election of delegates to a convention to frame a State constitution.'" This act is not before me, but I am informed upon authority on which I rely that the provision in that act is precisely the provision existing under the territorial laws, that every citizen of the United States who had resided six months in the Territory before offering his vote, should be entitled to vote at the election.

Mr. President, I have said this, not because it is material to be said, not because there is any such issue before the Senate, but simply to put an end to this clamor, which is raised for no other purpose than to prejudice the action of the free-State people of Kansas in the estimation of a large portion of the members of both Houses of Congress. It might appeal to the prejudices of men residing in the slaveholding States, if the fact could be assumed that negroes were to be permitted to vote; and yet it is not true that in many of the slaveholding States negroes are, under certain qualifications, permitted to vote? Is it not true in North Carolina, the State which you represent, sir?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. BIGGS in the chair.) Not now.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If not now, it has been at some period of her history. Was it not true in Tennessee and in Virginia? But, sir, I have only referred to this to show that it is a false clamor raised to prejudice.

Mr. PUGH. I wish the Senator would explain that language, for I really think it is time!

should understand what he means. He has used the expression "false" several times. Does the Senator mean to apply it to me?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not mean to apply it to the honorable Senator from Ohio that he intends to state what is false; but I do say that he has misconceived the law, and given a false inference and a false interpretation to it; and the whole effect of what he says is to raise a false clamor and a false prejudice against the action of the free-State people of Kansas; and I feel called upon to repel it, not because it is material to the question now before the Senate, but to put an end to this clamor.

Mr. President, there is one other remark that fell from the honorable Senator from Ohio which I feel called upon to notice. It is a remark which was made in the absence of the honorable Senator from New York, [Mr. SEWARD,] and in the absence of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] who has, for reasons which I do not feel called upon now to name, been compelled to remain away most of the session. The Senator from Ohio spoke of a prediction which was made by the honorable Senator from New York, in his speech in the spring of 1856, in which he stated, in substance, that as near as he could estimate the amount of population in the Territory of Kansas then, there were forty thousand; and that, probably, in the course of a short period, there would be a population sufficient to entitle them to a Representative in Congress. He said, also, that the Senator from Massachusetts, in a speech which he made in the spring of 1856, estimated the population to be nearly fifty thousand, and said it was fast increasing, and that, perhaps, by the time the Topeka bill could pass Congress, there would be a population there sufficient to entitle them to a Representative in the other House of Congress. The honorable Senator asks where are these false statements of fact and of prophecy which we constantly hear on this side of the Chamber? Where is all this population which was to have been in Kansas, and the large emigration which was immediately to have followed in the spring and summer of 1856?

Mr. President, has the honorable Senator from Ohio forgotten that it was after these speeches were made, and in the spring and summer of 1856, that Lawrence was sacked and burned? Has the Senator forgotten that it was during the summer and fall and winter of 1856 that the irregular border-ruffian army which was marched into Kansas was devastating that Territory, and driving the people from it, hunting them down like bloodhounds on their track? Has the Senator forgotten that in the summer and fall and winter of 1856 all the highways through Missouri were closed against all northern emigration, blockaded by armed men upon the banks of its rivers, armed with cannon?

Mr. PUGH. I recollect that these allegations were made; I believed they never did occur. That was my opinion; but I know they were asserted on the floor as existing here just about the time of these predictions—the very time.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Has the Senator forgotten that the troubles which were existing during the summer and fall and winter of 1856 drove hundreds and hundreds of the people of Kansas out of that Territory?

Mr. PUGH. I will tell the Senator, as he asks the question. These things were all alleged to have happened about the time of these very speeches. We all recollect when they were stated in the Senate—the debates will show. They did not happen afterwards. I do not think a great many of them happened at all; but they were not pretended to have happened until afterwards.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. But, Mr. President, at the most, those statements which were made by the honorable Senator from New York, and the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, were but approximations. They said expressly that no census had been taken; they were but approximating to the number of inhabitants of Kansas at the time the speeches were made; and they were but venturing to give a prediction, based upon the causes then in operation, that in a very short period of time there would be a population in Kansas sufficient to entitle them to one Representative in the other House of Congress.

But, sir, I shall not dwell on these topics. The relations which we bear to each other as the sovereign States of this Confederacy, and the relations which the various States bear to the United States Government, are very analogous to the relations of a family. This is, indeed, a sisterhood of States; and a glorious sisterhood it is; and, as younger sisters growing up into the same family, are these new Territories springing into existence from time to time in the different portions of our great Confederacy. One after another are they planted, colonized, organized, and brought into the Union. One after another, passing through all the periods of helpless infancy, growing childhood, and vigorous youth, they reach that period in their growth and development to take position as new but equal members of this great and glorious family of ours. The relations which are borne by them to the Government of the United States during their territorial condition are very much like the relations which a child bears towards a parent during its infancy and minority. In more respects than one does this analogy hold good. Upon the one side is government, protection, and education; upon the other, helplessness, dependence, and obedience.

There are those who maintain the sovereignty of a people in a territorial condition from the moment of its organization. You may say that there are all the elements of sovereignty in a newly-organized Territory. So, too, there are all the elements of manhood in a child; but, in my judgment, it would be just as unwise to speak of the independent sovereignty of a few hundreds or thousands of people sparsely scattered throughout a vast territory, as to speak of the manhood of a babe nestling in its mother's bosom. Nor is it always easy to determine the exact line between youth and manhood, nor between the territorial dependence of a people and their independent sovereignty—to see exactly where the one ends and the other begins. It is a thing of growth and of time. But I will not dwell on this subject.

The point we are now considering is simply whether the proposition of the committee of conference does of itself present any improper inducement to bring Kansas into the Confederacy under the Lecompton constitution; and if she refuses to come in, does it impose upon her any improper penalties—anything by way of punishment? Is Kansas left perfectly free to make her own choice in this matter? Sir, it is very easy to illustrate this by resuming once more the analogy. Imagine the case of a parent with large possessions, having a large family of highly educated and accomplished daughters. As they grow up and arrive at the age of maturity and marriageability, one after another they are settled and established in life, and a portion of his vast inheritance is set off to them. A younger daughter, not yet arrived at the age of perfect maturity, hardly marriageable as yet, at that tender and interesting period when the artlessness of childhood adds to the charms of womanhood, is sought in marriage by two rival suitors; the parent's consent is asked. One presents himself, an intelligent, frank, honest, noble youth, who has wrought out his own fortunes by his own strong hands; and he has sought, received, and secured her affections. Another presents himself who claims to be of noble blood—to belong to the first families of the land; too proud to labor himself, but ever willing to live upon the labor of others—like too many, greedy of other's goods and prodigal of his own—and he seeks her hand in marriage also. He plies every art, attempting sometimes by force and sometimes by fraud to obtain her consent. She rejects his suit again and again. Her elder sisters take a deep interest and an active part in the controversy, are about equally divided, and the result even threatens to sunder their family relations. She comes to her parent for advice. She fully avows her affection for the one, and her detestation for the other; and what does he propose? He says to her, "my daughter, if you will marry this man of family and pretensions I will give you houses and lands; I will endow you with a large and independent fortune, as I have all your sisters that have settled before you; I will establish you at once in a high rank in society; you shall have all the deference and consideration which grow out of that establishment, on a footing of perfect equality with your elder sisters; but if you refuse to marry him, you shall not marry at all, so long as I live, or at all events so long as I keep you under my control; and until you arrive at the full age of majority you shall not marry any other; and though you do not choose to marry him, you shall continue to associate with him and receive his attentions."

Mr. President, is that leaving her perfectly free to follow the dictates of her own heart, to make her own selection, or is that what you would call parental intervention? Is it leaving her perfectly free, or is it endeavoring to force her choice, to say to her in plain English, "if you will marry this suitor, you are old enough to marry now; but if you desire to marry anybody else, you are not old enough to marry at all; if you will marry this one, you shall have houses and land; you shall be endowed richly, as all your sisters have been endowed before you; but if you will not marry him, you shall marry no other for an indefinite length of time, and you may have to pass that certain age which no female desires to pass unmarried; and whether you like him or dislike him, you shall continue to associate with him?"

I ask you if this is leaving her perfectly free in her choice to choose her own domestic institutions, and to form and regulate them in her own way? or is it parental intervention to overcome her free will, to tempt her, to smother and crucify her affections, and to join in alliance with one whom, instead of loving, she detests?

Mr. President, I do not intend to take up the time of the Senate; but it seems to me, in plain language, the proposition which is now put by Congress to Kansas, is this: not that they will give Kansas now more lands than they have given to some other States when they were admitted into the Confederacy, but the proposition is to give them to her now, if she will come into the Union under this constitution; but if she will not come into the Union under this constitution, she is not to have them for an indefinite period of time. It is also saying to Kansas, "if you will come into the Union now, you shall have all the political consideration, consequence, power, and influence, of an independent and sovereign State in this Confederacy; but if you will not take this constitution, you shall not come into the Confederacy for an indefinite period of time; it may be five years, or it may be ten years before you will have population enough to entitle you to come in under this proposition."

But, Mr. President, the more important question, in my judgment, is not whether the people of Kansas will have virtue enough to reject this proposition, rather than to come into the Union under a constitution which they detest—for I believe they will—but the important question with me is, who shall count the votes which the people cast when that proposition is submitted to them? From all that has transpired in the Territory of Kansas, that is a question which comes home to me with more force than any other; for I believe if the votes could be fairly counted, the people of Kansas would reject and spurn this proposition if it should be offered by Congress. If you go back into the history of Kansas and its affairs, what strikes you as the most prominent of all things in its history? Governor Geary was compelled to resign. Why? Because he was determined that the constitution should be submitted entire to the people of Kansas, and that the laws should be fairly administered, and that murder should not go unpunished. Governor Walker and Governor Stanton were removed from office, substantially. And why? Because they would not count the fraudulent votes which were cast at Oxford and Shawnee. Governor Denver has been appointed to fill their place. Their history is before him.

John Calhoun, notwithstanding all that has been proved in relation to the returns which were made to him and to his office, notwithstanding the place where they were found hid in a candle-box was in his wood pile, is still kept in office as the surveyor general of the Territory of Kansas. Mr. Walker and Mr. Stanton were put out of office because they would not count the fraudulent returns. John Calhoun is kept in office, notwithstanding the candle-box returns and the frauds which have been practiced in that Territory. What are we to expect now? One question has not been answered by any gentleman who has spoken on the other side—I allude to the question which was put by the honorable Senator from Kentucky, and which was repeated by the honorable Senator from Michigan: why is another person put upon the commission to count the votes? For no reason under heaven but to put the board in the control of that power which has from the beginning, and from before the beginning, intended no other result than to take slavery into Kansas, with or without law, with or without force, fairly if they could, but to take it there anyhow. It is to put the control of that board which is to count the votes in the hands of that power which led Atchison to invade Kansas, which has led to all the fraudulent transactions which have disgraced that Territory from the beginning to this hour.

Is not this district attorney the very person who gave his written opinion that no person in Kansas could vote at the last October election unless he had paid a tax, under the territorial laws, which cost Governor Walker such an immense labor to overcome? What may we expect from him?

Mr. President, we have heretofore heard from the Administration, the President in his message and his friends on this floor, but one thing, and that was, "it is necessary to give peace to Kansas and peace to the country." Is there anything in this proposition which is calculated to give peace? If we can judge by what has transpired among the people of Kansas, we have every reason to believe that upon a vote that people will reject this constitution by a majority of thousands upon thousands. We have every reason to expect it. Take that proposition, and if they do reject it, what follows? You propose to keep Kansas out of the Union until she has a population which would entitle her to admission as having people enough for one Representative in the other House. It may be six years before she will have what would then be required—probably one hundred and twenty thousand people. What do you propose to do in the mean time? Why, sir, you propose to let Kansas bleed. That is what you propose. If she rejects this proposition, let her bleed, is the present language of the Administration. Instead of giving peace, and closing up this controversy, it is proposing to let Kansas bleed, and let agitation go on. Instead of peace it will be a sword.

Mr. President, the proposition that was offered by the honorable Senator from Kentucky was one which would close up the whole difficulty in Kansas. If she was not satisfied with the Lecompton constitution, let her form a constitution with which she would be satisfied, and then be admitted into the Union, and that would close up the whole question. But now, if the people voted this down, and if the votes are counted fairly and honestly, (which I fear cannot be, from the history which has transpired in Kansas,) this whole agitation is to remain for years to come. Sir, I desire, for one, to see this agitation brought to an end. We have had it long enough, and the only way to end it is to submit this question fairly to the people of Kansas. If they do not like this constitution, accompany it by a bill which provides that they may call a convention and form a constitution to suit them, and admit them into the Union, and let that be the end of this whole controversy. But it cannot be ended, it will not be ended by this proposition. If, as I have reason to fear, the same frauds which were practiced at Oxford and Shawnee and Kickapoo are to be repeated, if Cincinnati Directories and candle-box returns are to be made use of in that Territory, for the purpose of having it counted into the Union, right or wrong, I tell you, Mr. President, it will be the last proposition which would be likely to give peace to Kansas or peace to this country. There will be an agitation if it shall be falsely counted into the Union, compared with which, all that we have yet seen would be a very small and trifling affair, in my opinion.

Mr. President, I had not intended to detain the Senate as long as I have. I shall therefore not occupy its attention any longer.

Mr. WILSON. I rise, Mr. President, for the purpose of moving an adjournment. Before doing so, however, I will say that, upon consultation with some gentlemen on the other side, they have expressed a willingness that we shall now adjourn until to-morrow. The Senator from New York, [Mr. SEWARD,] and the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] desire to address the Senate. I desire to say a very few words upon the matter; but I think to-day the hour of adjournment has arrived, and we had better adjourn. The Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL,] I understand, also wants to speak.

Mr. GREEN. Before an adjournment, I will move the postponement of this subject until half past twelve o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, April 28, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. C. C. MEADOR.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER stated that reports were in order from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

PATENT OFFICE REPORT.

Mr. NICHOLS. I rise to make a privileged report from the Committee on Printing.

The report was read, as follows:

The Joint Committee on Printing, to whom it was referred to inquire into the expediency of printing extra copies of the mechanical portion of the Patent Office report for the year 1857, report the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be printed, for the use of the members of the present House of Representatives, twenty thousand extra copies of the mechanical portion of the Patent Office report for the year 1857.

Mr. NICHOLS. I desire to say but one word upon that resolution. The House will understand, from the reading of the resolution, that it contemplates a considerable reduction on the number of copies of this work usually printed. The committee have had the subject under consideration for some time, and are impelled, by the inevitable force of necessity, to recommend this reduction. The number provided for is sufficient to supply the necessary wants of the country in this regard. A general distribution cannot be had, unless this system be carried to excess. It is the desire of the committee that its recommendation in this respect shall be complied with; and I am instructed by the committee to say, that if there be opposition to this report in any way, they would rather that the resolution should be withdrawn, and the whole thing crushed, than that the number of copies should be increased. The report is founded upon the necessity of the case; and I call the previous question upon it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Will the gentleman inform the House what number of extra copies of this work was printed for the use of the members of the last House of Representatives?

Mr. NICHOLS. The reduction in the number is forty thousand. The number printed last year was sixty thousand.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Ohio how many copies have already been ordered to be printed.

Mr. NICHOLS. The report was submitted some two months ago to the House, and, as a matter of course, one thousand five hundred and thirty copies have been printed. That provides only for the public Departments, and for the one copy that each member has a right to.

There is no provision made in the one thousand five hundred and thirty copies ordered to be printed, for distribution to any institution outside the Departments here, and to the members themselves.

Mr. MORGAN. How many copies of those provided for in this resolution are assigned to the Patent Office proper?

Mr. NICHOLS. None at all. The distribution is placed within the hands of those who represent the various congressional districts in Congress. I have again to say, in answer to an interrogatory which was propounded to me, that the reduction is forty thousand copies. I appeal to the good sense of the House to allow this resolution to pass in the shape in which it is reported, well assured as I am that if any attempt is made to change it, no copies at all will be printed for distribution. I believe the number provided for in the resolution is large enough; and I call the previous question upon the passage of the resolution.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I wish to ask what distribution the Committee on Printing propose to make of the part of the Patent Office report usually denominated agricultural?

Mr. NICHOLS. There has been no agricultural report submitted to the House at all.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. NICHOLS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COMMODORE PAULDING.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. I rise to what I consider to be a question of privilege. I am not sure whether it is or not. The most important national question which has been presented to the House during the present Congress, was some three months ago referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. That committee has not yet made its report to the House; but some time ago it did permit its report to be published. I wish to ask the Chair whether the committee has the right to permit its report to be published before it has been made to the House?

Mr. SEWARD. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. RITCHIE. Do I understand the gentleman from Georgia to say that any report on the subject to which he refers has been published by the Committee on Foreign Affairs? If so, I wish to correct that statement. No such report has been published by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, or with the knowledge of the committee. The publication of a report by a committee in advance of its being made to the House, is in my opinion a breach of privilege, and I, as a member of that committee, certainly never should have consented to any such publication.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. Then, as this report has been published for some months, and as the House has had no opportunity of action upon it, I ask the consent of the House that this report may be made now to the House, and printed, without taking any action upon it, and that it be fixed as a special order for some day.

Mr. SEWARD. I object. I have reports which I want to make from the Committee on Naval Affairs. Let the committees be called in their order, and the report may be made when the Committee on Foreign Affairs is called.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. Has the gentleman the right to object to the report being made?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman [Mr. SEWARD] has the right to object.

Mr. SEWARD. I do not wish to place any obstacle in the way of the views of the gentleman from Georgia, but if the committees are called in their regular order the Committee on Foreign Affairs will be reached, and the report may be made in order.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. If the gentleman objects, there is no way of getting at it.

Mr. SEWARD. I only do it on that ground, that the committee will be called at all events. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the call of committees for reports, beginning with the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS IN PHILADELPHIA.

Mr. ENGLISH, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a joint resolution authorizing the arrangement and disposal of public buildings in the city of Philadelphia; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. FLORENCE. There is a difference of opinion as to the proper arrangement of the several United States offices in the city of Philadelphia. Various petitions have been presented by the various members from that city, which have been referred to the Post Office Committee. After consultation with the entire delegation from the city, and after full investigation, the committee have agreed upon the resolution which has been reported, as the most feasible plan of being relieved from the difficulty. It will not, as my colleague suggests, cost the Government a farthing, and it will settle the difficulties existing in the city. I call the previous question upon the engrossment of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported at length. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury, the Postmaster General, and the Attorney General, to arrange and dispose of the public buildings in the city of Philadelphia, so as to best accommodate the several United States offices in that city.

Mr. ENGLISH. It will be seen, from the reading of the resolution, that it directly prohibits the incurring of any expense beyond the appropriation already made. It simply authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury, the Postmaster General, and the Attorney General, to arrange the public buildings in Philadelphia, so as best to conduce to the public service. There can be no objection to the passage of the joint resolution. I understand that it meets the approval of every member from that city; and unless some member from that city desires to speak, I hope the previous question will be seconded.

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania. There has been some difficulty in Philadelphia in regard to the proper location of the post office, and various expedients have been resorted to for its equitable adjustment. After trying every other expedient, this expedient has been adopted. It meets with the unanimous concurrence of the whole delegation; and, I believe, it is the only just, effectual, and proper means to settle this question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and, under the operation thereof, the resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and, being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. ENGLISH called for the previous question on the passage of the resolution.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and, under the operation thereof, the resolution was passed.

Mr. FLORENCE moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

POST OFFICE BUILDINGS.

Mr. ENGLISH, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a bill providing for certain public buildings for post office and other Government purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

LIGHTING THE WASHINGTON MALL.

Mr. GOODE, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported a bill for lighting, with gas, certain streets across the Mall; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

EXTENSION OF PUBLIC GROUNDS.

On motion of Mr. GOODE, it was Ordered, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of W. Hickey and others, asking that certain questions relative to the extension of the Capitol grounds be decided, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

BENEVOLENT CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

Mr. GOODE, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back Senate bill No. 97 to incorporate the Benevolent Christian Association of Washington city.

Mr. LETCHER. Let us hear that bill.

Mr. GOODE. It has all the restrictive clauses which are usually contained in acts of incorporation passed by Congress. The committee are of the opinion that the Senate bill should be passed, and I now ask that it be put on its passage.

The bill was read in extenso.

Mr. SEWARD. Does the bill allow this association to hold real estate?

Mr. GOODE. It does to a limited extent. It provides merely for the incorporation of a charitable institution.

Mr. SEWARD. I desire to ask this other question, whether the real estate acquired is to be held in perpetuity? Is this association permitted to hold the property they may acquire ad infinitum?

Mr. GOODE. This bill proposes merely to incorporate this association, and it will be an association of the religious institutions of the town. It is the incorporation of a charitable society with the usual restrictive provisions, and with the right in Congress to repeal the act in its discretion.

Mr. SEWARD. I understand that. But this real estate is to be vested in the corporation, and there is no provision as to the extent of time for which it shall be held. It is a perpetuation in this corporation of real estate to the amount of $200,000, and personal property to an indefinite amount. I think that the principle is a bad one.

Mr. GOODE. The charter is subject to repeal at the discretion of Congress. It is a mere charitable institution, and nothing more.

Mr. POTTLE. Have the churches of this city petitioned for this bill? What petitions are on file asking for it?

Mr. GOODE. They were furnished to the Senate, and these religious societies had a representative before the committees of the two Houses in the person of a distinguished individual, who asked for this bill.

Mr. POTTLE. From each of the churches?

Mr. GOODE. No, sir; one gentleman representing the several churches.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

R. R. RICHARDS.

Mr. GOODE, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that it do not pass, a joint resolution (S. No. 9) for the compensation of R. R. Richards, late chaplain of the United States penitentiary, for his salary to the 30th of June, 1857; which was laid on the table, and the bill and report ordered to be printed.

GONZAGA COLLEGE.

Mr. GOODE, from the same committee, reported back, with an amendment, an act (S. No. 76) to incorporate Gonzaga College, in the city of Washington, and District of Columbia.

Mr. GOODE. The amendment reported by the committee is to strike out "$500,000," and insert "$200,000."

The Clerk commenced the reading of the bill.

Mr. GOODE, (interrupting.) I would state to the House that this is an ordinary bill for the incorporation of a college with a capital stock of $200,000, as recommended by the amendment, with the usual restrictive clauses as to stock, and the responsibility of corporators for debts of the corporation. I move that the further reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. MORGAN objected.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

The amendment recommended by the Committee for the District of Columbia was agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

PROVIDENT ASSOCIATION OF CLERKS.

Mr. SCALES, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, with a recommendation that it do not pass, an act (S. No. 151) further to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Provident Association of Clerks in the civil Departments of the Government of the United States in the District of Columbia;" and moved that the bill be laid upon the table, and that the report be printed.

The report was read.

Mr. CHAFFEE. I would inquire of the gentleman from North Carolina, whether the Senate did not pass this bill unanimously and without a division; and whether the same facts were not before the Senate as were before the committee of this House? I would inquire, further, whether the section of the charter referred to in the report as containing vested rights, was not altered by a subsequent act of Congress—the act of 1836?

Mr. SCALES. I know nothing of the circumstances under which the bill passed the Senate; nor is it material here.

With regard to the section of the charter which we think gives these vested rights, it simply says that if this charter shall expire otherwise than by its own limitation, then the children of deceased parents shall be entitled to all the proceeds of the association; there shall be a general division of the proceeds.

Now, I do not know what course the Senate took in reference to this bill, and I do not think it material. Nor can I answer the gentleman as to whether that clause has ever been amended. I do not know that it ever has been. All I do know is, that the clause is there, and we acted accordingly.

Mr. CHAFFEE. I wish to ask the gentleman whether that clause has not been superseded by subsequent legislation?

Mr. SCALES. Not as we understood it.

Mr. CHAFFEE. I understand it has, and I simply wanted to get at that fact.

The bill was then laid upon the table; and the report was ordered to be printed.

LAMP-POSTS IN GEORGETOWN, D. C.

Mr. SCALES, from the same committee, reported a joint resolution relative to the erection of lamp-posts in Georgetown, District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

COLUMBIA INSTITUTION.

Mr. BURNETT, from the same committee, reported back, with a unanimous recommendation that it do pass, an act (S. No. 99) to amend the act to incorporate the Columbia Institution for the instruction of the deaf and dumb and the blind, approved February 16, 1857; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PENNSYLVANIA AVENUE.

Mr. WARD, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, to whom was referred a memorial in favor of the repavement of Pennsylvania avenue and of a railroad through that avenue, made an adverse report on the first prayer of the memorial, but recommending the laying down of a specimen of iron pavement, and, in reference to the latter prayer of the memorial, reported a bill in relation to a railway through Pennsylvania avenue, in the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WASHINGTON CEMETERY.

Mr. BOWIE, from the same committee, reported a bill to authorize the vestry of Washington parish to take and inclose certain parts of streets in Washington city for the purpose of extending the Washington cemetery, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. BOWIE. I move that the bill be put on its passage.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and, being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

UNITED STATES COURTS IN VERMONT.

Mr. HOUSTON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, without amendment, Senate bill (No. 111) to alter the times of holding the circuit and district courts of the United States for the district of Vermont.

Mr. HOUSTON. I propose to put that bill on its passage. It provides for nothing but to change the time for holding the United States courts in Vermont. It meets, as I understand, the approval of the judiciary and the bar there.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

COURTS IN UTAH.

Mr. HOUSTON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back joint resolution (S. No. 23) providing for the payment of certain expenses of holding the United States courts in the Territory of Utah.

Mr. HOUSTON. I propose also to put that joint resolution on its passage. Gentlemen will see, on its reading, the importance of its immediate passage.

The joint resolution was read at length. It provides that all the expenses of the courts in Utah during the continuance of the disturbance in that Territory, shall be paid out of the judiciary fund, subject to the present limitations of law in respect to fees, &c.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

PROCESSES IN THE COURTS.

Mr. HOUSTON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back Senate bill (No. 36) to

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

FRIDAY, APRIL 30, 1858.

NEW SERIES.....No. 117.

provide for the issuing, service, and return of original and final process in the circuit and district courts of the United States, in certain cases, without amendment, and asked that it be put upon its passage.

The bill was read in extenso.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

COLLECTION OF DUTIES, ETC.

Mr. HOUSTON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported adversely upon House bill (No. 372) to repeal the twenty-fourth section of the judiciary act of September 27, 1789, and the seventh section of the act further to provide for the collection of duties, passed March 2, 1833; which bill was laid on the table.

Mr. HOUSTON moved that the vote last taken, by which the bill was laid on the table, be reconsidered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ANDREW GLASSEL.

Mr. READY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back Senate bill No. 225, for the relief of Andrew Glassell, with the recommendation that it be rejected; which was laid upon the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ADMISSION OF KANSAS.

The SPEAKER. The report of the conference committee on Senate bill No. 16, for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union, was postponed until one o'clock to-day. That time has now arrived, and that question is now the business in order before the House.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I have no disposition to detain the House by any extended remarks on this question at this time; and but for the fact that I was on the committee which reported this proposition, I would have preferred to have been silent altogether. But when the majority of the committee adopt a report, submitting a substitute from which I withhold my assent, I become, for the time, the only representative of the position of the House as it was when the committee of conference was appointed; and for that reason, sir, I will state as briefly as I can some of the reasons which induce me to withhold my assent from the report. A contest has arisen in this and in the other branch of Congress touching the Lecompton constitution and the admission of Kansas into the Union as a State under it. On the one hand, it was contended that although a submission to the people was not always absolutely necessary, that it might be waived if there were no substantial disagreement or opposition, yet if the people denied that the constitution was their act and deed, or reflected their will, the matter of submission involved all that was sacred in self-government. It may be waived just as we sometimes pass a bill in this House with a single vote. But if the instrument be challenged, then it is the consent of the people that breathes, and that must breathe, the first principle of life into it.

It was contended that this Lecompton constitution was not the act of the people of Kansas, and therefore that their consent must be obtained to give it life. On the other side, it was contended with great force and consistency, at least, on the part of the men who urged it, that the Kansas-Nebraska act was an enabling act, and that in fact the Lecompton constitution was organized under it; that the proceedings of the convention were legal, regular, binding and conclusive; that the people of Kansas were estopped from denying it; and that Congress had no power to intervene. I do not say that they all took that ground—that the Kansas-Nebraska act was an enabling act—but they all insisted that it was legal, binding, and conclusive, and that there was no power to intervene.

Now, sir, in my judgment, the committee instead of meeting this issue fairly, and grappling with it like men, we have neither the position of the one or the other maintained, nor does this substitute rise to the dignity of a compromise. I do not say that I would assent to a compromise where such questions were involved, but I say that if it is to be taken as a compromise, I ask for the privilege for myself at least, of standing fairly upon it as a compromise. If we are to compromise, then we should come forward and say that we will yield so much, and you shall yield so much, and we will stand or fall upon it as a compromise. But this does no such thing. It is not a compromise, but a species of dodge. Instead of grappling with the issue presented, the committee, some way or other, got up a sort of tow-boat by which this Lecompton craft is to be brought into port or else stranded. If the position of the South were right, then we could do nothing by which it could be stranded.

It may be said that the Lecompton constitution is not submitted to the people; that the principles contended for by extreme men of the South are sustained; that the question submitted is the land ordinance, and not the constitution. Very well. Suppose that we concede it; but if the people vote down that ordinance, then, by the terms of the conference proposition, Lecompton is dead. If it be dead, who killed it? If the proceedings of that convention were legal, if they were binding and conclusive upon the people, and they were estopped from denying it, and if Congress have no power to interfere, how and of what process will Lecompton be dead, if this ordinance be voted down? And yet it proves upon its face that that will be its effect. It reminds me of the fellow that went to pray pardon of his sovereign. He prostrated himself before his majesty, and asked pardon for having knocked off the hat of a fellow-subject. The pardon was readily granted. He then informed his majesty that the fellow's head was in his hat, and that that was knocked off too. Now, gentlemen, you decline to submit the Lecompton constitution, but you do submit the ordinance, and if the ordinance be voted down, the head of Lecompton is knocked off, and who did it? Will it amount to a substantial yielding of the principle, as contended for, or not? If the ordinance be adopted, the South might waive all further discussion of the principle; but if it be voted down, and Lecompton be thereby lost, then what follows? Why, it simply follows that we have done by indirection what it was alleged we had no power to do, either directly or indirectly, or the people themselves.

But I do not stand here to take care of other gentlemen. They can speak for themselves. Now, how is it with the North? Why, if I should concede—and I will not detain the House with discussing it at length, for if the House should see fit to refuse to sanction the demand for the previous question, there are other gentlemen who wish to discuss, and will discuss it, more ably than I can—but, as I said, if we concede that the whole principle claimed by the North is yielded, yet it is offensive still to the North, for it attaches conditions to the admission which never can, in my judgment, be submitted to. While I do not profess to speak for the whole North, I speak without hesitation for my own constituents; and I believe, and I assert, that they will regard this proposition as an insult, even if they conceive that they have the best of it over the South so far as the yielding of the principle is concerned. If the South yield the most of principle, the North are to be the most cheated in the details, and the most insulted by the conditions of it. It will be, therefore, in my judgment, very far from a peace measure. The North, I know, will not accept it; and I do not see how the South can.

I say that this proposition is offensive to the North in its details. It provides one set of conditions for the admission of a State under this particular constitution, and another set of conditions under another constitution. Now, if I should vote for this proposition, if I had given my assent to it in committee, if I should record my vote for it here, when I go home I should expect that my constituents at least should wish to know this.

If the population of Kansas at the present time is sufficient to admit her under a constitution she loathes, is not that same population sufficient to admit her under a constitution she approves? And how could I answer it? How shall any northern man answer it to his constituents? Sir, there is no answer to it. It needs no comment.

But again, if Congress may intervene to bring in Kansas as a slave State, ought not Kansas, if she rejects the proposition, be permitted to apply quietly to come in as a free State? Why not? Does not the very form and substance of the bill impose degrading conditions upon the North? Is not the whole doctrine of equality of States thereby overthrown? If the population of Kansas, again I repeat, be sufficient for her to come in under this particular constitution, surely it is enough for her to come in under any other constitution.

Again, sir, if the whole country may be convulsed, the public business neglected for months, the whole power and patronage of the Government brought to bear to force her in under this constitution, got up by fraud and violence, why should she not have the privilege of quietly applying under a constitution gotten up without fraud, without violence, and expressive of her will? Why should not the conditions be the same, whatever may be the constitution; and, if you impose these conditions and these restrictions, which are unfair and unequal, and degrading to the North, do you not intervene to do it?

Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a word or two upon the reasons urged by a majority of the committee for making this report. My colleague from Indiana [Mr. ENGLISH] submitted some remarks which he stated were by the authority of the majority of the managers. I will not go into the subject-matter of the speech in detail, but I will state that the whole argument is based upon two things; first, the quantity of land saved in the proposed ordinance; and secondly, the great peace and quietness which is to flow from the adoption of this substitute. They tell us that twenty million acres of land are saved, worth $25,000,000. That may be true in one sense, but it is hardly true in any sense. The twenty million acres of land had not been granted by Congress; it had only been grabbed at by Calhoun & Co. But the only reason we did not save, in that sense, ten times as much, was because of the great modesty of Mr. Calhoun and his associates in not including it in their grab. What a pity it is that their modesty should have so interfered with your committee in gaining immortality by saving land to the Government. Who does not know that land was never granted to any State in such quantities as the Lecompton constitution claimed? I may here remark that no State has ever been admitted to which such liberal grants have been made as are here proposed. I believe the grant is the same as that proposed to Minnesota, but no State has yet come in with so large a grant.

Mr. ENGLISH. I should be glad to ask the gentleman whether he is not advised of the fact that the amount of land proposed to be granted in the bill of the committee of conference is precisely the same as that proposed in the Crittenden amendment for which the gentleman voted?

Mr. HOWARD. I believe, sir, that is precisely the same remark that I was making. I was saying that up to this time, I believed, no State had been admitted with so large a grant of land as is proposed in this ordinance. The grant I think is about the same as that offered to Minnesota, and I think, as the gentleman from Indiana says, it is just the same as that embraced in the Crittenden-Montgomery bill. So far as the grant of land is concerned, this bill and the Crittenden-Montgomery bill are identical, but the grant in the latter bill is offered to Kansas under any constitution she may choose to adopt. The grant there was general, and therefore, it was fair. But this grant hinges on the adoption of this particular constitution, and is, therefore, unfair. It may be considered as a bribe. She is to have these lands if she will adopt this particular constitution, but the Crittenden-Montgomery bill proposed to give her the land, let her adopt what constitution she might.

It may be said, sir, that she would probably get the same grant any way, whenever she did come in; but it is a remarkable fact, that in case she shall vote down this land grant, this bill goes on to provide regulations touching the amount of population that shall be necessary before she shall come in under any other constitution, but does not intimate that she can have any land at all unless she will take it with this particular constitution.

Now, sir, a word as to the peace that is to flow from such a measure as this. Sir, I do not believe that a better title could be given to this bill than to call it a measure to keep open the quarrel and keep up the strife; for I am sure, as I have already said, the North will reject it with scorn, for it imposes one set of conditions if the Territory shall apply for admission as a slave State, and another set of conditions if she applies as a free State; and I do not see how the South can accept or justify it, especially if the ordinance should be voted down. Again, sir, the North, looking to the history of Kansas, may well object to this board which is to control the election. It is changed from what it was in the Crittenden-Montgomery bill. The number of the board is increased to five, and three of them are direct appointees of the Administration. Now, sir, I have nothing to say about the men; but if you look to the history of the Oxford and McGee frauds, if we take into consideration the fact that a Walker and a Stanton lost their heads about the time these fraudulent votes were rejected, I ask if it would not have been fairer to let the board remain as it was in the Crittenden-Montgomery bill? Besides, sir, what could have been the object of the change, unless it looks to a state of things in which these outrages may be repeated?

But again, sir, the qualifications of voters under this bill are not regulated by the laws of the Territory as they exist at the present time, but it goes back and takes the qualifications of voters as they were when the Territorial Legislature was elected in October, under what is called the "border-ruffian code." Why ignore the existing law and go back to that code about which there has been so much strife all over the country—to the very laws under which all these frauds have been perpetrated? It is true that this bill contains some provisions for the punishment of fraud; but the qualifications of electors are fixed by this old code, that was in existence previous to the election of the present Territorial Legislature.

But again, sir, the very man who has been added to this board to make up the five, is the attorney general of the Territory—the very man who has given an opinion, as I understand, under these very laws, to the effect that no man could vote under those laws unless he had paid taxes under these territorial laws. Why this change in the board? Why this change in the qualifications of voters?

Sir, I know not what the result may be; but this I do know: I know that if the people of Kansas have a fair election, this contrivance will be voted down four to one. It cannot be otherwise. Ten thousand votes have been polled against this constitution with the enormous grants attached to it, which have been cut off by the conference committee. Six thousand votes were polled in favor of it; but of those six thousand, it has been demonstrated that half of them were fraudulent, and that there were not three thousand legal votes in the whole Territory in favor of this Lecompton constitution. Now, sir, if they have a fair election, they will vote down the constitution four to one. It cannot be prevented without a renewal of the frauds that have marked the past; and let me tell you that it will take more than one Cincinnati Directory to do it. They will need at least a dozen before it can be done. And if, under all these circumstances, after the board has been changed, and the qualifications of voters have been referred back to the old laws, any frauds should be perpetrated in this election, which shall be apparent, it will produce a strife throughout this country such as we have never witnessed. In every point of view, this measure is calculated only to produce mischief to all sections of the country. Instead of quieting the disturbance and guiding the ship of State through the breakers into the smooth sea, as my colleague on the committee [Mr. EXLISU] an-icipates, I assert that it will but inflame the strife. If we would settle this question, why not fall back on the Crittenden-Montgomery bill, under which the people are to be allowed to decide whether they will adopt this constitution? And if they determine not to do it, the question is to be settled in some other way, and is never to show itself here again.

If the conservative men desire peace, why adopt a measure that can by no possibility settle the strife on either side, let it go as it will, but will increase the strife? Gentlemen must not flatter themselves that this will be the end of it, for these propositions are very degrading to the North; and I tell gentlemen that in every congressional district in all the northern States the issue will be distinctly put, whether one set of conditions shall be applied to a Territory applying for admission as a free State, and another to a Territory applying as a slave State. Every election held in the whole hundred and forty-four districts will turn upon this issue, distinctly made.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to see the end of all this. I would be willing to consent to any fair settlement of this question; but, sir, I do not see how men can, upon a question of this importance, yield the principle and substance, and evade it by this attempt to dodge around it; for, as I have already said, if the ordinance be voted down, Lecompton is dead. How, and why? Truly, according to the theory of gentlemen upon the other side of the House, the people have no right to vote down the constitution; but, nevertheless, if they reject the ordinance, Lecompton is dead. Perhaps, like the calf which a man had, which he said had not died, but "somehow kind a'gin out;" so it is in this case. The people do not kill Lecompton directly, but, by indirect means, they do that which may result in killing it. They will certainly kill it if the vote is taken fairly. If the opposite result is accomplished by fraud, in the present excited state of the country on this subject, it will lead to disturbance, if not to bloodshed; and no man can tell where will be the end.

Why, then, seek to daub with this untempered mortar? Why keep this side issue—this towboat, with which you expect to tow Lecompton into port? Can it be said, if the plan succeeds, that the principle has been maintained inviolate? Principle or no principle, if the whole principle were yielded, I, as a northern man, would never consent to it while it fastens upon the North the badge of inferiority. It, in fact, offers to Kansas a premium to become a State of a particular kind. I tell you that I never will submit to it. Never! And I predict again that this issue will go directly before all the people of the northern States. Every candidate in the northern States will be elected or beaten directly upon this issue. And I shall be surprised if, out of the hundred and forty-four members to be returned from that section of the country, one hundred and twenty-five of them do not come here repudiating our decision; if they do not come here directly and distinctly pledged to receive, consider, and act upon any application that Kansas may make to come into the Union, notwithstanding this arrangement. We never mean to submit to it. We never can acquiesce in conditions so unequal, so unjust, and so unfair. I will not detain the House longer.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, it is with great reluctance that I feel myself compelled to trespass upon the attention of the House today. I thought that I had said everything that I should ever feel called upon to say in reference to this complicated Kansas difficulty. I had hoped that I had bid farewell to the subject forever; that every new phase had been exhausted, and that we were finally brought to a direct and final vote upon a question of principle made and argued deliberately through the whole session, with eminent ability on the Administration side of the House, and met as best we might with such arguments as we could devise on this side of the House. I did not suppose, Mr. Speaker, that at this late day in this controversy a new question would have arisen. I did not suppose that we should be called upon to consider and vote upon a question which has never been alluded to from beginning to end of this controversy, though at one time in the history of the Republic it came near shattering to pieces the Confederacy. It was settled, on great consideration, by the greatest minds that have ever cast their light upon the Constitution of the United States, thirty years ago; and it has remained unquestioned from that day to this, when the conference committee, without even a passing allusion to it, have distinctly raised it, and they now require us this day to decide it.

My difficulties are not that the bill does not submit the constitution to a vote of the people. It is my habit, here and everywhere, to state distinctly what I feel to be my difficulties. Sir, I shall raise no question about the distinct and absolute submission of everything that is material to be submitted, by the act brought in by the committee of conference. I shall enter into no sharp legal argumentation with gentlemen as to whether the vote is to be upon the proposition, or upon the constitution itself, or upon the question of admission. If legal minds can draw distinctions between these various questions, I shall moot no question on these points with them. There is here all that I have ever contended for. The people of Kansas have, by this bill, interposed between them and the forcing of a constitution upon the majority, an opportunity for the majority to say that this shall not be their law. It is to me absolutely immaterial whether it is to be by a vote upon the proposition submitted, on which the adoption or rejection of the constitution, as a legal, living instrument, shall depend, or whether it shall be in the shape in which the bill of my honorable friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MONTGOMERY] presented it, by a direct vote of the people on the adoption or rejection of the constitution.

In either mode, we give them opportunity and power to say—under whatever form, with whatever conditions, in whatever way—that "we do not choose to accept this form of government as our State government," and it is to me immaterial whether they are called to vote upon the adoption or rejection of the constitution, upon the adoption or rejection of the land grant, upon their consent to be admitted on other terms than they proposed. It is absolutely immaterial. There has been distinctly and in words granted to this people, by this bill, the right of the majority to say whether they will or will not allow this State government to go into active legal operation; and that is all that any reasonable man ought to demand on that subject.

And I desire to say, with all candor, to gentlemen on both sides of this House, that had that been the only contents of this bill; it should have had my sanction. I would not have stickled over the question whether the vote was to be in the form of the words "proposition accepted," or "proposition rejected," or whether we had directed black shells and white shells to be cast into the box. I profess to be a practical man, and I look to practical results. I believe that a minority of the people of Kansas alone had formed the Lecompton constitution. To that constitution I had no objection. If the majority in any form, directly or indirectly, allow it to become the law of the land, it does not lie in my mouth to object, and I say, therefore, that so far as the question of submission or rejection is concerned, everything we have been contending over this session is distinctly, in law if not in language, conceded in this bill; and those who raised their voice here during this session to defend the rights of the people against the power of Congress to force upon them the work of a minority, have a right to go now before the country and say, with whatever conditions it may be hampered, over whatever broken fragments of the Constitution they may carry this bill, still it does bear upon its face a great and glorious triumph of the right of the people to have a final and conclusive negative upon the law which shall govern them. Nor do I now rise to urge the flagrant insult to the free States, nor the provision for false certificates apparent in the addition of the district attorney to the commission, nor the shallow attempt to change the question in contest, as the reasons of my opposition to this bill. Plain and irresistible as they are, my opposition rests on grounds more profound and radical.

That, sir, is not my difficulty. I have some very strong States rights notions implanted in my head from having studied at the school of Henry Clay of Kentucky, and William Pinkney of Maryland. I have not forgotten what I learned from Mr. Madison's report with you, sir, at the University of Virginia; I have not forgotten what I have heard upon every southern hustings since, as a boy, I attended debates, and since, as a man,

I have taken my humble share in them. Is there any gentleman on the southern side of the House who has ever attended a meeting where topics kindred to this have been discussed, where the right of every new State to be admitted upon equal terms with every other State has not been asserted upon the one side and conceded upon the other? Is there any gentleman from any slaveholding State that has not himself, again and again, asserted that as the fundamental principle which lies at the very basis of the Confederacy? Was it not the ground for repealing the Missouri compromise, that that in its effect, if not directly and in point of law, did invade that great principle? Has not every southern constituency been taught, day after day, and year after year, that Kansas had a right to enter the Union upon an equal footing with the original States; and that if her power was limited in any particular, then she was not upon an equal footing? If there is any gentleman here who can contradict me, I will yield the floor for him. Is it not the concession of southern politics that there can be no condition appended to the admission of a State which ties and binds any, the smallest portion, of her constitutional authority? If there be any gentleman that doubts, let him rise and state his doubts; if there be not, I assume it to be the unanimous opinion of every gentleman here from the South that that is the law of the South on that question.

If so, then, while the bill which is here proposed for our assent does, in its terms, and directly, impose, as a condition of admission, that one of the sovereign powers of the State shall be yielded by an ordinance, then, I say, no southern gentleman here can, with consistency, vote for this bill.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman asked for the statement of an exception to the doctrine which he has alluded to. The gentleman, and those with whom he acted, opposed the repeal of the Missouri restriction, and therefore they were in favor of imposing restrictions upon the admission of States north of the line of the Missouri compromise.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I am very glad that the gentleman from Texas has called my attention to that point. His statement involves what has been involved in all the controversy of the last four years—a historical error as to what the Missouri compromise was. The Missouri compromise did not admit any such principle as that there could be any limitation upon the sovereign power of a State, whether with reference to slavery or any other subject. It did proceed upon the assumption that there could be a restriction upon a Territory while it remained a Territory, and no longer than it remained a Territory. And it was only after consulting his Cabinet as to whether the law of 1820 extended in its terms and legal meaning beyond the existence of the Territory, and obtaining their opinion that the law was limited to the territorial condition, that Mr. Monroe gave that bill his sanction.

The thing which was in controversy was not whether Congress had the power to control the question of slavery during the territorial condition; that question is one of later date. That question was not mooted during that whole controversy. Gentlemen will find scarcely any argument on that point; they will find nothing but a passing allusion from that most eminent man, Mr. Pinckney, of South Carolina. He alluded, in passing, to his difficulty as to the power of Congress to restrict slavery even in the Territories. The point in controversy in the Missouri contest was whether Congress had a right to impose a condition upon a State—to tie a State's hands—not merely upon the subject of slavery, but upon any subject.

The argument of William Pinckney was, that the States must come into this Confederacy all with the same power; that, if you could impose one limit upon a State, you could impose any limit upon a State; that, if you could take away from them the power to regulate slavery in their limits, you could tie their hands on the relations of husband and wife, guardian and ward, and upon the manner in which their lands should descend; the power of taxation; that the power to impose one restriction carried the power to impose another restriction. If you could make it by compact, you could then tie up the hands of an infant State when it had not the power to resist; and, unless the whole system was to go into confusion, and all its beauty and symmetry was to be utterly destroyed; unless, as Pinckney said, the comely and beautiful proportions of a State of this Union should be crippled, shriveled, and maimed, until it became a mere pigmy, instead of a full grown man; unless you could destroy the power of a State wholly, you could impose upon it no limitation of any kind. Whether you choose to admit it or not, is with you an absolute right; but you could impose no conditions upon it which will follow it when it comes into the Union; and the mere fact of admission entitles it, and ought to entitle it, to all the rights possessed by any, the strongest of the original States. That is the meaning and purport of the Missouri compromise and the Missouri controversy; and it is an error, in point of history, when gentlemen say the Missouri compromise related to a contest about the power over the territory, and not a power of imposing conditions upon a State.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee. I only want to call the attention of the gentleman from Maryland to the language of the Missouri compromise, as it is called. It says that "north of 36° 30' slavery or involuntary servitude shall be forever prohibited" without reference to Territory or State.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I do not design to enter into a controversy as to the legal meaning of the act. It was settled by Mr. Monroe before he signed it; and I simply say my legal judgment is, that his legal interpretation was right. That is an answer, as to my opinion. I am not here to argue it.

If, then, I am right in the principle that Congress can constitutionally impose no condition restricting a State's sovereignty, we come now to the great question on which I resist the adoption of this act. In the first clause of the act are these words:

"That the State of Kansas be, and is hereby, admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever, but upon this fundamental condition precedent, namely: That the question of admission with the following proposition, in lieu of the ordinance framed at Lecompton, be submitted to a vote of the people of Kansas and assented to by them, or a majority of the voters voting at an election to be held for that purpose, namely: That the following propositions be, and the same are hereby, offered to the people of Kansas for acceptance or rejection, which, if accepted, shall be obligatory on the United States and upon the said State of Kansas, to wit:

And then it goes on to say that they shall vote ballots inscribed with the words: "Proposition accepted," or, "proposition rejected." If the majority be "proposition accepted," then they become a State and have the lands; if the majority be "proposition rejected," then they do not become a State; but at some subsequent period they are to have the power to call a convention to form another constitution. A vote, therefore, for the "proposition rejected" decides the question that this constitution from that day becomes a nullity, that they are not to be admitted now, but postponed until a future period, and then only to be admitted upon other terms, and by a new arrangement then to be made.

I submit, then, there is but one question submitted to the people of Kansas—whether they will, as a condition of admission into this Union, accept the proposition which is to be voted on with the constitution, or whether they will reject it. The only question they have to pass on is, whether they will come into the Union by accepting the terms of this proposition, or stay out of the Union by rejecting it. They cannot come into the Union unless they accept that proposition, and agree it shall be binding upon them forever. They can come into the Union by accepting it.

The distinction between that proposition and every other which has been proposed to any State in the history of the Union is, that here its acceptance is made a condition upon which alone this State is allowed to come into the Union. From the time of the Missouri controversy to this day, no such condition has been ever submitted for the consideration of a State. Prior to the admission of Missouri, conditions of various kinds had been incorporated into acts authorizing Territories to form constitutions. Until that great controversy, the rights of the States, and the right of Congress to impose conditions, had never been fully discussed; and we find, therefore, in the Louisiana enabling act, and in the Mississippi enabling act, there are certain conditions laid down; as, for instance, that none but the English language should be used in public proceedings in Louisiana, and others, which now no one would regard for a moment as admissible. But the Missouri controversy brought the power of the Government to impose any conditions upon any State, of any kind, into controversy; and it was then settled that there existed no power in the Government to impose any conditions whatever, limiting any right the State would have under the Constitution of the United States, in the absence of a condition, and from that day down to this, no condition has been tendered to any State upon which her admission into the Union was made to depend. No proposition has ever been tendered to any State with a condition that, unless it accepted the proposition, it should not become a member of the Confederacy. We have had propositions submitted to various States; but always for their free acceptance or rejection, and never as a condition of admission.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to ask the gentleman if the ordinance of 1787 did not intend perpetually to exclude slavery in the northern territory?

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I cannot enter into a political controversy.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to ask another question.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. This is the last time I can yield.

Mr. REAGAN. My question is, whether the party whom the gentleman sustains in this controversy has not maintained that the Missouri compromise was a perpetual bar to slavery north of 36° 30'?

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I respectfully decline a discussion upon party politics.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman invited interruption.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. No, sir. With great respect to my friend, I invited interruption upon one point, and not beyond that. There have been various cases in which grants of land have been made to various States upon condition, if they did not assent to the condition, the grant failed, and if they did accept the condition they had the land. The bill proposed here by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MONTGOMERY] was in that form. The question of admission was one thing, and the acceptance or rejection of the grant was another thing. They could, under that bill, accept the Lecompton constitution and accept the grant, or they could accept the Lecompton constitution and reject the grant. If they refused the condition they would lose the land, but they would be a State under the Lecompton constitution; and if they accepted the condition they got the land, and they were not less a State under the Lecompton constitution.

The distinction between that bill and this of the conference committee, is, that under this bill they cannot become a State unless they assent to the terms and conditions of the land proposition. It is the only thing upon which they are required to express their opinion, but on that opinion their admission or exclusion is made to depend absolutely. And the effect of refusing to accept the proposition is to exclude them from the Union. Gentlemen, therefore, on the southern side of the House have interposed an additional difficulty in the way of the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution. Under Mr. CRITTENDEN's bill they could come into the Union although they rejected the land grant. Under the bill of the committee of conference they cannot come into the Union unless they accept the land grant.

What, then, are the conditions they are thus required to submit to?

Under this bill, I now maintain they cannot get admission into the Union unless they concede one of the flowers of their prerogative. In their ordinance the people of Kansas have asserted a simple absurdity. They say, "as we have the power to tax all the lands in Kansas, if Congress will grant us a certain amount of lands, we will waive the right to tax." There is no lawyer here who would express even a doubt as to the entire nullity of that assumption. It, sir, has been settled by the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case in 3d Howard, coming up from the State of Alabama. It was settled by the unanimous opinion of the Senate, when California was about to be admitted. Some gentlemen doubted, at first, whether they would not have power to tax the lands of the United States, or to impede the authority of the United States in disposing of them and making rules and regulations on the subject unless California surrendered it; and the great leading minds of the Senate treated it as an utterly unfounded assumption. California was admitted without any such provision; and from that day down to this the United States have been disposing of the public lands in that State, and California has never presumed to impose a tax upon them. In the courts and in the halls of legislation that has been the concession—that there is no power in the various States to impose taxes upon the lands of the General Government lying within their borders. That was the decision of the Supreme Court in the case in 3d Howard, to which I have alluded, where this question as to the validity of the conditions in the land grant to Alabama, and the principle on which they were valid or void, was considered. The court held that, though in the form of conditions or compacts, such restrictions as were valid derived their force, not from being compacts—for Congress could make none with a State limiting its power—but from being laws of Congress on subjects within its constitutional power, and operative without the assent of the State; that they are merely laws regulating the public lands; that the States have no power to tax those lands, whether they shall assent or not assent to any condition; that it is a power existing paramount in Congress, and that the States can exert no authority over the subject. So far, therefore, as this bill provides that Kansas shall not tax the lands of the United States, that it shall not interfere with the United States making its arrangements relative to the public lands, that it shall not interpose any obstruction to any law passed by Congress for the disposition of the public domain, it does not operate by way of a compact; it merely sets forth, in the form of a condition, a declaration on the part of Congress that such are the public rights of the United States, operative without the assent and in spite of the dissent of the State of Kansas; not conditions divesting any sovereign rights she would otherwise have, but laws of Congress she is bound to obey under the Constitution of the United States.

But, sir, I suppose that the power of the western States to tax the lands within their limits not belonging to the United States, is one of their sovereign rights. Their power to tax lands in the hands of individuals is absolute. There is no power in Congress to impose any limitation upon it. If Congress can impose limitations upon one part of the lands belonging to individuals in the States, it can impose conditions on other portions of lands belonging to individuals in the States. If they can say, as a condition of the admission of a State into the Union, that the State shall provide that non-resident proprietors' shall not be taxed higher than residents' lands, they can also say that persons shall not be taxed; that no poll-tax shall be imposed; that no tax on personal property shall be imposed; that no tax on tavern licenses shall be imposed; that no tax on mercantile licenses shall be imposed; that no tax upon sale or transfer of goods and chattels shall be imposed. If, therefore, Congress has any right to exact, as a condition of admission, that any portion of the taxing power of the State shall be given up, they can strip the State of all taxing power; they can regulate the whole fiscal system of the State by a condition of admission; they can strip the State of every power of maintaining itself, or dictate to it a system contrived to foster or ruin some branch of national industry. The principle goes fully to the extent contended for by the most extreme men of the North; this conference bill carries with it the principle that Congress can impose a condition limiting the authority of the State on the subject of its domestic institutions—the relations of husband and wife, the relations of parent and child, the relations of guardian and ward, the relations of master and servant; all that is needful is to substitute for the words of the bill, "nor tax non-resident proprietors higher than residents," the words, "nor to establish slavery within its limits;" and the extent of the principle is apparent.

Sir, does this bill do that thing? If it does, then I desire some gentleman to meet that one question directly—not to rise here, and say that Congress possesses the power to declare conditions with reference to control over the public domain, (that they have, whether reserved or not;) but I ask gentlemen to show me any authority, direct or indirect, implied or expressed, which gives to Congress the guardianship of the taxing power of the States over lands in the hands of individuals. If there be any such power, then this bill is constitutional; if there be no such power, then this bill is unconstitutional; and no gentleman here who is of that opinion, and regards his oath to support the Constitution of the United States, can give it his assent.

Now, sir, in the proposition which the people of Kansas must accept, before they can become a State under the Lecompton constitution, it is provided:

"The foregoing propositions hereinbefore offered are on the condition that the people of Kansas shall provide by an ordinance, irrevocable without the consent of the United States, that said State shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the soil within the same, by the United States, or with any regulations Congress may find necessary for securing the title in said soil to bona fide purchasers."

If it had stopped there, this condition would not have excluded my support. But it proceeds: "that in no case shall non-resident proprietors be taxed higher than residents."

Non-resident proprietors! Who are they? Is the United States a non-resident proprietor? Did the committee mean to include the public lands of the United States under those words, when they had previously said that no tax should be imposed upon lands held by the United States? Who is a non-resident proprietor within the meaning of that provision? The United States is, to the extent of its delegated powers, everywhere paramount over all other delegated authorities: it spreads undivided, it operates unspent, from the Gulf to the Canadas; it is present everywhere, in every State and in every Territory; it is present here in our midst, and it is present on the confines of Oregon. It is no non-resident proprietor. This, then, is an attempt to impose a limitation on the power of the State to tax men who have bought their lands from the United States, and are subject to the State sovereignty. It is an attempt to impose a limitation upon the power of the State to tax the lands which it may see fit to tax, according to different rates. We may think it right or wrong that any such thing as a discrimination should be drawn between resident and non-resident proprietors. I submit that that question is not for us. It is a question of State policy. It is referred to the State authority. It is for it to say whether large speculators residing in the East shall, by holding great masses of lands out of the market, prevent the filling up of the West, and retard its growth in population. It is a question whether the States shall have a right to control their own internal affairs so as to prevent an Irish system of absenteeism. This bill proposes that the State shall follow our ideas of policy and not theirs; that the State shall frame their State taxation laws on considerations of policy as to what is best for the whole country, and not on their considerations of policy as to what is best for themselves.

I submit, therefore, that this provision is a direct limitation on the sovereign legislative power of Kansas, made as a condition precedent to the admission of the State, and without assenting to which by an irrevocable ordinance she cannot be admitted into the Union. That is what the committee of conference have proposed we shall do. Sir, that line in their bill reverses in every particular the whole traditional policy and politics of the South. That line throws away the great victory won by Henry Clay and William Pinckney, in the Missouri contest. It breaks down the constitutional barrier which protects the South against the imposing of other and more offensive terms of admission on other States. That line, if you pass this bill, will shut the mouth of every southern man to deny the right of an invading and aggressive majority to impose any, the most offensive, humiliating, and dangerous conditions on the application of slave Territories in the future for admission as States.

Sir, I here represent a southern slave State, not so greatly interested in this question as others are, but still deeply and profoundly interested—a State more nearly touched by the agitation of this question than any other State—a State losing more negroes a year, by the failure to execute the fugitive slave law, than all the other States put together—a border State, and hence, in case of serious difficulty, more directly interested than South Carolina herself; for she has a tier of patriotic southern States between her and any aggressors.

The State of Maryland is on the frontier. It was that which illuminated William Pinckney when he arose to defend the rights of the States. I profess to be his humble follower in the great path of constitutional right. Here to-day, in the name of Maryland, I enter my solemn protest against conceding that great right which the great men of the Republic so long contended for, so triumphantly vindicated, and which is so vital to the maintenance of the interests of the South.

Now, sir, gentlemen need not tell me that these very words are contained in many of the grants of lands to the States on their admission into the Union, North and South. That is true; but it is irrelevant. The words are there, but the condition is attached not to the admission of the State, but to the acceptance of the grant of lands. They are there as conditions of the acceptance of the grant. They are made to States, to be accepted by States already admitted; not to applicants for admission, to be accepted as the only terms on which they will be admitted. They are the words of equal dealing with equal. They are not conditions without which a State cannot come into the Union. They are conditions without which the grant would be void, merely affecting the grant alone, and which, if rejected, would leave untouched the existence of the State. These words have, in some acts, been inserted as conditions on which the grants were made, but since the Missouri contest never in a single instance has the acceptance of the grant been made indispensable to obtaining admission to the Union, till this report of the committee of conference was laid before us. I aver here to-day, and I challenge any gentleman here to rise and deny it, that this is the first time in the history of the country, since the Missouri contest, when there has ever been an attempt to make the yielding up of the power of taxation the controlling condition under which we consent to admit a State into the Union. I say it deliberately; I say it after having carefully, a night or two ago, refreshed my memory by reading the statutes of the United States admitting every State which has been admitted into the Union.

It is true, that in the early history of the Government there were loose ideas prevailing as to the power of Congress to impose conditions upon States prior to their admission into the Union. There were, as I have said, anomalous conditions imposed upon the admission of Mississippi and Louisiana into the Union. There may have been such conditions imposed upon one or two other States which were admitted prior to the time to which I have made allusion, when this great question was adjudicated upon and settled. It was then settled as one of the fundamental principles of the Constitution itself, that States which are admitted into the Union shall come in upon an equal footing with the original States. These are household words. They are recognized universally as containing a sentiment as sacred as the Constitution itself, until I had almost forgotten that they were not actually incorporated in that great instrument. So distinct an impression had they made upon my mind, that I supposed not only that they embodied the common law interpretation of the Constitution, but that they were themselves words of that great instrument. I had an impression that the men who founded the Republic had written them on its corner-stone, until I turned to the Constitution and found that they were not there. But, sir, they have been accepted as the formal expression of the deep meaning of the Constitution; and no man now will venture to question their soundness or speak lightly of their value as the accepted exposition of the Constitution of the Republic. I therefore conclude that this bill is equally unprecedented and unconstitutional.

It is true that in the early day of the Republic there were conditions inserted in enabling acts infringing on the sovereign equality of the States, as in the cases of Louisiana and Mississippi; but those precedents were considered and declared unsound in the Missouri contest.

Since that day no condition impairing in the least degree the sovereign power of a State under the Constitution has ever been required to be assented to as a condition of admission into the Union.

Congress has admitted States on condition of assent to boundaries; but the boundary of a State is essential to its identity, and can be fixed only by the concurrence of Congress and the people forming the State. It is essential to the existence of the State, and till Congress has agreed to its territory it is no State; and after it has agreed to its territory it is a State, whose rights are defined by the Constitution alone. Such was the case of Michigan.

Congress has required constitutions to be submitted to a vote; but that was no condition limiting its sovereignty; it was merely a mode of showing Congress that the people willed the constitution. Such was the case of Wisconsin.

Congress has in the act admitting several States declared it a condition of the admission that the States should not tax or interfere with the regulation and disposal of the lands of the United States, and that all navigable waters should be free; but these, though in form conditions, are held merely declarations by Congress of its powers, existing whether assented to or dissented from by the State—mere exertions of its power to regulate the public lands and to regulate commerce among the States. They were no invasions or limitations of any right the State, but for these, would have had. The State was not required to assent to them by an ordinance, but they stood or fell by the power of Congress. Such was the case of Iowa, Florida, and Michigan.

Congress has as well in the enabling acts, as after the full admission of States, tendered to them grants of land for their free acceptance or rejection, and has declared such grants of land to be on certain conditions, such as not to tax United States lands nor interfere with the sale of them, and in some instances not to tax lands sold for five years, or not to tax non-resident proprietors higher than residents. Such are the cases of Ohio, Illinois, Alabama, Missouri, and others.

But never before has the acceptance of a proposition granting land upon the condition of not taxing non-resident proprietors higher than residents, been made a condition precedent to admission, unless a case be found before the Missouri contest. Never has it been said, surrender your sovereign power of taxation as the price of an inferior alliance.

In a word, the question of admission has never been dependent on any condition not necessary to ascertaining the existence and identity of the State—the assent to the form of government and to the territory over which it is to operate.

This bill does make the admission of Kansas depend on a previous surrender of part of her sovereign power of taxation; and it does so because, for the first time, the question of admission is blended with the question of assent to the proposition touching the land grants and their conditions, instead of following the settled precedents and principle of submitting the question of admission with its incidents—the assenting to the constitution and the boundaries as one question; and the proposition touching the lands with the condition confined to them—as a separate question to the free acceptance or rejection of the people; unaffected by, and having no connection with, the question of the admission of the State.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I must confess my surprise at the grounds upon which the honorable gentleman from Maryland bases his opposition to this bill. That he is opposed to it is not to me a matter of surprise at all; but I am surprised that he should place his opposition on the grounds he has—that is, of its violation of and his advocacy of State-rights. It is the first time I knew the gentleman pretended to be the peculiar defender of State-rights. He maintains that the doctrine of State-rights will be violated; that the State of Kansas will be shorn of her sovereign powers if we adopt this bill, because it is provided in our terms of admission that she shall first agree not to tax the lands of non-residents higher than those of her own citizens. That is the ground upon which he placed his main opposition, if I understand him; and he challenged us who support the bill to show a single precedent, from the organization of the Government down to the present time, where such a power had been exercised, or such a condition proposed by Congress to any State applying for admission. Sir, this challenge is readily met. In the act for the admission of Louisiana into the Union, which I have before me, passed in 1811, it is declared, as a condition of their admission, that the lands belonging to citizens of the United States, within said State, shall never be taxed higher than the lands belonging to persons residing therein.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. The gentleman from Georgia will certainly do me the justice to remember that I said expressly that the acts for the admission of Mississippi and Louisiana into the Union, prior to the Missouri compromise, were exceptions.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. And what difference did the adoption of the Missouri compromise make?

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I merely wanted the gentleman to state my argument fairly. That is all I ask.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I was going on to show that the Missouri compromise had nothing to do with it. I understood the gentleman to state that, until the adoption of the Missouri compromise, no such condition was ever imposed upon the admission of a State. I intended to show that that had nothing to do with it.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I thought the gentleman understood my proposition. I stated it as clearly as I was able. I said that there were very indistinct ideas of the power of Congress in connection with the admission of States, until the power of imposing conditions was brought in question at that time; that there had been conditions imposed previously, but none since.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I will show the gentleman that there have been such conditions imposed since, and repeatedly since; and, if I am not mistaken, the honorable gentleman himself voted the other day for the Crittenden-Montgomery amendment, which contained these identical words.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. The honorable gentleman has misunderstood by argument from the beginning, for of course I know he does not intend to misrepresent it. I said that there had been conditions of this kind connected with the land grants; and that the effect was, that if the grants were accepted the conditions became binding. But I say there has been no case where that has been made a condition of admission into the Union. That was my position, and I think I repeated it several times.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The condition on the land grant in the Crittenden-Montgomery amendment is, in identical words, "that no tax shall be imposed on the lands belonging to the United States, and that in no case shall non-residents be taxed higher than residents."

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. But suppose that she rejects the grant?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. And suppose that she rejects the same grant in this bill? [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I wish to respond at that point. If she rejected the grant under the Crittenden bill, she was in the Union under the Lecompton constitution as a SLAVE STATE. If she rejected the condition under the Crittenden bill, and yet voted for the constitution, she was, by the terms of that bill, in as a slave State. If she rejects it here, she is out by the terms of the bill, and no State, slave or free.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. How could she have been in the Union as a slave State if she had rejected the condition? But, if she had accepted and come in, would she not have been shorn of this great right that the gentleman contends for, and not allowed to discriminate? [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, the honorable gentleman from Georgia cannot be allowed to misrepresent me in that way. The question is with reference to the power of this Government to exact, as a condition of admission, her assent to yielding one of her sovereign prerogatives. If, after she is admitted, she chooses to yield it as a matter of contract, she does it freely, as I would contract with the honorable gentleman. But the difference between the Crittenden bill and this is, that that bill puts the question of admission as one question, and the question of agreement to the grant and conditions as another.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I do not wish to misrepresent the gentleman's position; and I do not intend that he shall escape either.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. There certainly is no desire on my part to escape. Suppose the questions were put separate, but the decision of the first depended upon the latter: where is the difference as to its effects upon State sovereignty?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The difference between our proposition and the Crittenden bill, on this point, or so far as it relates to State rights, is this: we first propose to the people of Kansas to accept our terms as to grants of land, in lieu of those they offered, and which no man in this House is willing to allow, while the Crittenden amendment, that the gentleman voted for, has the same condition, but makes no provision for the acceptance or rejection of the new terms proposed. I maintain that this bill is framed much more strictly upon the principles of State-rights than the Crittenden-Montgomery amendment—that amendment which he voted for declared the same condition absolute, on its face, without any provision for its acceptance or rejection. This bill rests strictly and eminently upon the principle of State rights.

But to return: I said the gentleman should not escape. I have shown you, sir, that in Louisiana, the words indicated were used. The gentleman says that since the Missouri compromise no States were admitted under a condition. I have turned to a few authorities or precedents, since the gentleman commenced his speech. Here is a law passed in 1836 for the admission of Michigan upon a distinct and express condition that she should agree to certain terms, which, if she assented to, she was, by proclamation of the President, to be in the Union. Here, again, is the case of Iowa.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Are they conditions limiting her sovereignty?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Yes; if the gentleman pleases to maintain that terms relating to land grants, the right of eminent domain, and extent of State limits, involve State sovereignty, I say the cases are analogous. Here is the case of Iowa:

"Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That it is made and declared to be a fundamental condition of the admission of said State of Iowa into the Union, that so much of this act as relates to the said State of Iowa, shall be assented to by a majority of the qualified electors at their township elections, in the manner and at the time prescribed in the sixth section of the thirteenth article of the constitution adopted at Iowa City, the 1st day of November, anno Domini 1844, or by the Legislature of said State. And as soon as such assent shall be given, the President of the United States shall announce the same by proclamation; and thereupon, without further proceedings on the part of Congress, the admission of the said State of Iowa into the Union, on an equal footing in all respects whatever with the original States, shall be considered as complete."

The very words of this bill, as to the "fundamental condition," and the proclamation of the President after the condition should be accepted.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Will the gentleman point out the limitation upon her sovereign power?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. She came with a constitution republican in form, and asked for admission, with certain asserted rights as to boundary, &c. Congress said they would admit her, and did admit her, upon the condition she would agree to boundaries proposed, and other things touching jurisdiction over certain rivers. Just so with Kansas. She came here with the Lecompton constitution, republican in form. She came also with an ordinance relative to land grants. This bill does not make a point upon her constitution. It raises no question as to the matter of its substance or the mode or manner of its adoption. But the terms of the ordinance as to land grants cannot be acceded to; these the Senate bill rejected—these the Crittenden-Montgomery amendment rejected; they both put the admission of the State on the condition that the State would accept other terms than those proposed. This bill does the same, nothing more or less on that point, except that we provide for the mode of ascertaining that acceptance or rejection. But the marked difference between this bill and the Crittenden bill, for which the gentleman voted, is that that bill did raise a question as to the constitution itself, and required its submission to the people. This bill takes the constitution as it is, made as it was and adopted as it was, just as it is presented. So far as the argument of the gentleman goes to represent those upon this side of the House as willing to force a constitution down the throats of an unwilling people, I wish to say for myself I occupy no such ground. I never have. Nor, sir, does this side of the House. I hold and maintain that that constitution embodies the legally and fairly expressed will of the people of Kansas. Everything relating to its formation was regular and legal. If any portion of the people of that Territory, for factious purposes or otherwise, did not vote at the proper time, it is their own lookout, not ours.

This bill, as I have said, makes no point on that constitution. It receives it, but inasmuch as the convention asked us to admit them with the proposition in her ordinance to surrender her right to tax the public lands within her limits, &c., in consideration of certain enormous grants of land, amounting to $22,000,000, we say that we will receive their constitution and admit them under it, if they will agree to take the usual land grants to new States under the usual conditions. These conditions are no infringement of State rights or State sovereignty, and have no relation whatever to the form or substance of their constitution, that being admitted to be republican.

I have met with some, sir, who imagine that the conditions in this bill differ from those of the Senate bill. By no means. That Senate bill was upon the express condition that Kansas should accept the same terms, as to grants of land, in lieu of those she proposed. Suppose that the bill had passed and Kansas should refuse by her Legislature to accept the conditions therein proposed: would she not be out of the Union, just as she will be if the people under this bill refuse to accept the identical proposition? How could we force a State into the Union on conditions of our own? Most assuredly it takes two to make a bargain. How could we put an absolute condition upon a sovereign State?

Now, sir, I claim to speak in behalf of the rights of the States. I was bred in that school, reared in that school of politics—the State-rights school—and if there is any doctrine which I cherish above all others it is the rights, the independence and the sovereignty and perfect equality of the several States of this Confederacy; and I maintain that this substitute more fully and completely carries out that doctrine than even the Senate bill, which I was willing to vote for. Had that bill passed, Kansas would not have been admitted if she had refused the condition. Just as was the case with Iowa. She refused the condition imposed, and did not come in under the act admitting her, which I have read from. No point was made on her constitution, though it excluded slavery. So no point is made on the constitution of Kansas, though she adopts slavery; and I will say, that if she had come with a constitution which had been as fairly, legally, and regularly made and adopted, with the exclusion of slavery, I would have voted for her admission under it as readily as I do; and I would have been willing to act in reference to her land ordinance in the same way this bill proposes. It makes no difference with me as to the character of her constitution on that subject. The people of Kansas, in convention, settled that question in their own way, as they had a right to do. That convention was fairly and legally elected and had full powers to do what they did. But I am not now going into a discussion of that branch of the subject. I am replying directly to the gentleman's objection. He said he had no objection to the constitution. I was glad to hear the gentleman say it, because I think that is the great objection of most of those who oppose the admission of the State under that constitution. If that is not the groundwork of his objection to this bill, it does seem to me he will be compelled to yield that one which he has brought forward with so much zeal this morning.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I do not quite understand his allusion.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I said the gentleman stated that he did not make any objection to the subject-matter of the constitution.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Certainly not.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Nor to the manner in which it was adopted.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Oh, no, sir; I did not say that. I said I had no objection to the subject-matter.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Then you had no objection to the form of the constitution?

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. None in the world. The constitution is very good.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Then do I understand the gentleman to say that the convention could not make a constitution?

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I meant to say that the convention was a party caucus without the slightest authority of law whatever.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Does the gentleman say that the law authorizing the call of the convention was without authority?

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I mean to say that the law of the Legislature was absolutely void.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Why?

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Because it was beyond the limits of the legislative power.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Was it not a legal Legislature?

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Certainly; perfectly so.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Had they not the right to call a convention?

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. No, sir. I think not.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Upon what ground does the gentleman stand, then?

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. The gentleman will pardon me; a few days ago I endeavored to argue that proposition on authority and on reason. My very short reason for it is, that it is not a proper subject of legislation of a Territorial Legislature to call a convention. The act is beyond the scope of their authority, and it has been always so held by every public man in the country who has expressed his opinion upon it, down to the end of the last Congress, Mr. Buchanan among them.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Do I understand the gentleman then to maintain that an enabling act is necessary?

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Oh, certainly not. I think we have no sort of limitation upon our free discretion. If a Territory comes here with a constitution in the shape of a petition, and we choose to accept it, provided we think it fairly expresses the will of the people, we may undoubtedly accept it, and it has been often so done. The only question with me is, whether this constitution is a fair embodiment of the popular will, and that is the only question I intended to raise.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Then I do not understand the gentleman to contest the legality of the Legislature which called the convention?

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I do not.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The gentleman only maintains that they had no right to call this convention. I ask the gentleman if, under the organic law they had no power to legislate upon all rightful subjects of legislation, subject only to the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I think they had; but I think this is not a rightful subject of legislation for the Territorial Legislature, as the last Congress decided—both Houses—by authorizing them to do what the honorable gentleman now intimates they had the right to do, and which this bill implies they have not the right to do, by giving them power to frame a constitution after a certain period.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The bill does not imply any such thing as the gentleman argues. It only means to announce to the people there the conditions on which, hereafter, that power, if exercised, would be recognized by Congress.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Then it is a limitation; or it is a repeal of the act; or it is of no effect whatever, and void.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Certainly it is a limitation; but by no means void, for we have the right thus to limit or to recognize a constitution of the people, notwithstanding it may not have been made in pursuance of such limitations, if we choose.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Certainly.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Certainly we have the right to make such limitations, and the admission of a State is itself a matter of discretion.

Now, what I was stating when the gentleman interrupted me was, that, as the main objection he had was to that part of the bill which he made his speech upon, and which he said assailed State-rights—that is the clause which proposes as one of the conditions of our grants of land in lieu of her ordinance that she will never tax the lands of non-residents higher than those of residents—which I had fully and completely answered, and as the whole of his argument nearly upon that clause was founded upon an error in the history of this Government, I thought the gentleman ought to yield even that. He says now he objects to the manner of the adoption of the constitution, though not to the substance. I shall not reply to him on that point. I have shown that as early as the admission of Louisiana the same words were used as to taxing lands of residents and non-residents equally. I have shown that States have been admitted upon express fundamental conditions since the admission of Missouri upon matters not relating to the substance of their constitution, or the mode of its adoption. Other cases might be cited. A gentleman near me [Mr. COBB] says it was so with Alabama in 1819. I know it was so with Arkansas in 1836; and Texas came in, in 1845, on express conditions under the resolutions for annexation. But I cannot now collate the precedents. I have shown that in the very bill for which the gentleman himself voted, the identical words are used, in the condition on which he voted to admit Kansas, as in this bill. Now how can the gentleman further urge that objection?

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I was unfortunate if I did not make myself understood. The gentleman's eminent legal attainments ought to have carried his mind at once to my point, or I was very unfortunate in the mode in which I expressed myself. I said that the right of Congress to control the public domain within the limits of a State, had repeatedly been declared in the form of conditions to land grants; and those are the kind of conditions to which the gentleman has referred, excepting that having reference to the boundary of a State—which, of course, must be settled by concurrence between Congress and the people of the Territory applying for admission, before a State can exist—and also excepting that requiring the assent of the people to the constitution of their State, as preliminary to their admission as a State. With the exception of requiring the assent of the people, in some shape or other, to the constitution, and requiring the assent of the people to the boundaries fixed by Congress, which are essential to the very existence and identity of the State to be admitted, I say there has never been, since the Missouri compromise, a condition of admission exacted; and those conditions are not limitations on the sovereign power of the State when created, but the defining by common consent the constitution and territory, without which there can be no State at all. There have been conditions annexed to land grants, but never to the admission of a State. There have been conditions declared in acts of admission asserting and securing the power Congress already possessed, and would continue to possess, over the public lands.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Right there let me ask the gentleman if, in the very cases he speaks of, where the conditions are expressed and put in the acts of admission, the State had refused to accept the condition, she would not have remained out of the Union? Did not their admission depend on their acceptance of the conditions?

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. They are cases where no conditions were imposed and required to be assented to in order to secure admission. The States were admitted, and the conditions were merely the declaration by Congress of its construction of its rights.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I have just read the express conditions which were proposed in the case of Iowa. Iowa rejected the conditions, and she remained a Territory. The State was not actually admitted under that act.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. That was in reference to her boundaries.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. In reference to her boundaries, and jurisdiction over rivers. And the only objection of the gentleman to this bill that I am replying to is that it puts upon the State a condition as to the exercise of her sovereign power of taxing hereafter. The cases are analogous. The gentleman says conditions have been annexed to land grants, but never to the admission of a State. Why, sir, in the case of Arkansas, as well as Louisiana, the condition of the land grant was in the bill for the admission of the State, as in this case, and as he has voted, and every member of this House. The condition in the Iowa case was in the act of admission.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. In reference to the freedom of rivers, it is covered by the same decision of the Supreme Court of the United States—that the condition declaring the river free does not operate in the way of a compact by the assent of the State, but as a law regulating commerce. And there has been no case where an assent to that has been made a condition of admission.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Why, sir, it was made by declaration to be a fundamental condition to the admission of the State of Iowa.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. That was a declaration of Congress as to its opinion of a right, in which opinion the Supreme Court concurred. It was not a condition which required the assent of Iowa to yield a sovereign right.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. It was, sir, just as I have stated; whether a sovereign right or not. I read it once and I will read it again:

"And he it further enacted, That it is made and declared to be a fundamental condition of the admission of the said State of Iowa into the Union, that so much of this act as relates to the said State of Iowa [Florida was included] shall be assented to by a majority of the qualified electors," &c.

The assent of the people was required.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Mr. Speaker—Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I cannot yield any more.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Very well, sir.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I have got the gentleman just where I knew I would get him, and where he cannot escape. The condition here is in the act of admission. The people had to assent to it. They did not assent to it, and the State did not come in. I think I have shown the House that the objection the gentleman urges to this bill with so much vehemence and eloquence is founded solely upon a pretext—solely upon a pretext.

Now, I ask this House—I ask the country—if, upon such grounds as this, if the bill is otherwise acceptable to all sides, and will settle this question, we are prepared to allow this Kansas question any longer to agitate the public mind, and obstruct the public business, as it has been agitating and obstructing it, not only during this session and the last, but for several years past? Does not patriotism, does not duty, does not every consideration that should influence the patriotic public man, demand of us, one and all, to come together, give this measure our approval and support, remove this question from the public councils of the country, quiet the public mind, and go on with the public business?

Mr. Speaker, I do not intend, at this stage of the proceedings, to detain the House longer. I am prepared, though, to defend this bill in every part of it, and in every section of it. I did not wish to make a speech upon it, because I thought the subject had been sufficiently discussed; but when gentlemen said they wanted to debate it, I was willing that they should debate it. And now, sir, the debate is opened, and I throw down the gauntlet to the opponents of the measure. I hold myself ready to defend it from the beginning to the end, from the alpha to the omega, every line of it, every word of it; and I say to gentlemen that I am willing they shall discuss it as long as they choose, or the House will entertain discussion.

Mr. GILMAN. I would ask the gentleman from Georgia, before he takes his seat, whether, in his judgment, the Lecompton constitution is or is not submitted by this bill?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I tell the gentleman frankly that it is not.

Mr. KEITT. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to vex the attention of the House with a prolonged discussion upon the matter before it, for I know that every phase of the subject has been examined in the protracted debate which has been had upon it. I intend only to offer a few considerations which have influenced me to the conclusion I have arrived at. The bill reported by the committee of conference is obnoxious to me, but the question is, whether under the circumstances, it is not better that we should pass it?

I confess, Mr. Speaker, that I have been somewhat astonished at the peculiar zeal displayed by the member from Maryland [Mr. DAVIS] in the cause of State sovereignty and the spirit of proselytism manifested by him. It had not occurred to me before that there was any consonance between his theory of our Government, both State and Federal, and mine. Nor do I dream now that there is any consonance between them. What, sir! shall the member tell me that this Federal Government is a mighty sovereignty, spreading with unity of purpose, singleness of power, and unspent force from the Gulf to the Canadas; that it is a colossal central system, revolving in its self-appointed orbit, and, with resistless energy, dragging the States within its circumference; and then tell me that he is a supporter of the sovereignty of the States? Is this the theory of my distinguished friend from Mississippi, [Mr. QUITMAN? Will the member from Maryland [Mr. DAVIS] tell me that in aggrandizing the Federal Government into a ruthless central despotism, to be wielded by a fanatical and hostile majority, he is advocating the rights and safety of the South? If so, will my friend from Mississippi [Mr. QUITMAN] feel, that, when standing under the same banner, they are other than opponents? No, sir; I deny that the member from Maryland is the custodian of the rights and sovereignty of the States. I have been reared up in the school of politics illustrated and adorned by my friend from Mississippi, [Mr. QUITMAN,] and there is no homogeneity between my views of the theory and functions of this Government and the views of the member from Maryland, [Mr. DAVIS.] Sir, if the States are sovereign, the Federal Government cannot be so. There can be no partition of sovereignty between them. The doctrine of the divisibility of sovereignty is not redeemed from contempt, even by the impudence of its absurdities.

But, sir, we of the South have no lack of advisers upon States' rights, and the policy of the South in the present exigency of affairs. In the Senate, Mr. SEWARD, and other leaders of the Black Republican party, and in this House the leaders of the same party, have advised us that we are yielding principle, and exposing the South to danger through this bill. When, sir, have these gentlemen become the peculiar conservators of the rights and honor of the South? or when have they refused to seize a gain against or over principle? The South asks not their advice, and can protect herself against the stabs of fanaticism. No, sir; these intermeddling advisers fear that agitation may be stricken with paralysis—that fanaticism may not wear the crown of power as securely as it now wears it—if Kansas is admitted into the Union under this bill, and hence come their tearful exhortations, and hence their lachrymose whinnies over endangered principles.

Now, sir, I will proceed to briefly examine the bill before us, for the admission of Kansas into the Union. The people of Kansas, in convention at Lecompton last September, submitted to Congress two propositions for admission into the Union. The chief and paramount proposition was their State constitution; the second, and inferior one, was their ordinance in relation to the public lands. They did not offer to come into the Union, either upon the one proposition or the other, but upon both. Now, in this bill, we have accepted their first and paramount proposition—their State constitution; and have agreed to admit them, so far as that is concerned. But they offered, at the same time, another proposition—the ordinance appropriating an extravagant quantity of the public lands; and to this proposition Congress will not accede. Kansas asks to be admitted upon her State constitution and her land ordinance, and she must be admitted upon both, or rejected, or treated with in relation to whatever is unacceptable to Congress. Now Congress accepts her State constitution; but as her land ordinance is objectionable, Congress treats with her as to that. By this bill, the Lecompton constitution is binding, is obligatory; is, in fact, a finality. It lives to the extent that the proper authority in Kansas has breathed life into it; it exists as a complete political entity, to the extent that the proper authority in Kansas has shaped, framed, and made it one. It is accomplished, finished, fixed; upon it our movements are not made; our fingers do not touch its machinery. In short, neither Congress nor the people of Kansas have anything further to do with the Lecompton constitution. It starts off now through the energies implanted in it; in other words, it moves into its appointed orbit through the forces contained in its provisions.

But the land ordinance is made a matter of negotiation with Kansas. How can you negotiate with her? Her convention is functus officio; her State organization comes into active operation only after her admission into the Union; and her territorial authorities are utterly incompetent to treat upon the subject. You cannot put her State organism into motion, for with its interior workings you have nothing to do. While the Lecompton constitution provides for the endowment of this State organization with active powers only after the admission of Kansas into the Union, you cannot treat with the territorial authorities, for they are inferior and incompetent; you must treat, then, in the manner proposed in this bill, or not treat at all. If you refuse to treat, then you must concede to Kansas her exorbitant demands for public lands in return for abstaining from the exercise of her right of taxation over the lands of the United States within her limits, or you must reject her application for admission into the Union. Will you grant her the lands? Congress will not. Will you, then, refuse her admission into the Union? Do my southern friends wish that? They do not. Should there be division, then, among us? I trust that finally there will be none.

I said, sir, that the Lecompton constitution was an accomplished, a finished, a fixed thing; and so it is admitted to be by the very words of this bill. Congress, through the bill, treats with the people of Kansas only about their land ordinance. Suppose the convention had formed only the Lecompton constitution, and had offered no proposition to Congress in relation to the public lands, but, in advance, had agreed to take whatever quantity of lands Congress might grant, and had made provision for the acceptance of such grants of land, and relinquished the exercise of the right of taxation over the lands of the United States, or had created a proper body to treat with Congress upon this subject: what then would be the status of the case now, under the principles of this bill? There would be nothing submitted to the vote of the people of Kansas; and so, upon granting the lands which we have granted, Kansas would now be admitted, by the bill, as a State into the Union. The agreement would be executed; the conditions of the compact would be fulfilled; nothing would be left to be done. If a proper body had been created by the convention to treat with Congress upon the subject, then we would treat with that body, and an agreement with it would be final and complete, if it had received power to act finally and definitively.

The distinction between treating with the people of Kansas about their proposition in relation to the public lands, and the submission of the constitution to them, is, to my mind, clear and distinct. The outline of a gossamer's thread is as distinct and definite as that of a ship's cable; so, a distinction may be clear and vital, though narrow.

Congress will not accede to the proposition of Kansas as to the public lands. She offers to come in if you will give her so much of them. You will not give her the quantity she asks. Will you drag her into the Union against her will? Will you make her a State in the Union if she refuses to be one? Will you derogate from her convention? Will you strangle her sovereignty in its very birth; or will you respect her wishes, and treat with her as a State to be the equal of the States in the Union? Suppose Kansas comes in; and, despite your conditions subsequent, claims all the lands within her boundaries: what will you do? Will you drag her before your tribunals here to plead her cause of sovereignty, and receive judgment from your courts? How will you bring her before them? What writ will you serve upon a sovereign State? What posse comitatus will you summon to take her into custody? And, if you sue out a judgment against her, how will you execute it? Will you enact a force bill, and send your armies to tread her down into submission, and with fire and sword to harry her soil until her ruined and wretched people shall kneel before you in dependence and in chains? Think you that you can perform a drama like this? Think you that your skies can redder with the fires of civil war, and your soil be drenched with blood, and this Government live on? No; infatuation cannot go thus far. How else will you proceed in the contingency I have alluded to? Would you depose her from her sovereignty? Can you do it? Would you dismiss her from the Union? Can you do it? And if you could, what then?

Sir, there is no compromise of principle, much less is there a sacrifice of principle or a surrender of principle, in this bill, as well as my judgment can determine its provisions. It must pass, or Kansas will be refused admission into the Union. What will we gain by her rejection? She has been the fruitful mother of constitutions; and shall we gain by the multiplication of her progeny? Illegitimate conventions have sprung from her bosom, like mushrooms from a rotten trunk; stained and bastard constitutions have been spawned upon us through the lechery of her political lust; and now hastening to us is the Minnesota constitution, deformed, disfigured, disgraced by base imposture, by driveling philanthropy, by whining hypocrisy, and by a practical amalgamation of the white and black races. This miserable and ricketty thing, the Minnesota constitution, with all infamies clinging to it, may come to us, and be embraced by its friends. They may defile this Hall with its presence; but, under its auspices, Kansas can never come into the Union. We wish to admit her now, not because we care about the mushroom conventions they have held or may hereafter hold, but because her application under the Lecompton constitution is legitimate, and her admission under the bill before us sacrifices no principle. The South has no reason to rejoice in the passage of this bill. She may regret its defeat. If her sons will unite upon it, she will gain more in their union than in aught else.

Mr. BINGHAM. I congratulate the country that the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] has seen fit on this day to acknowledge what he has heretofore, during the last and present Congress, steadily and persistently denied, that the position of those with whom I have the honor to act on this floor and elsewhere, in regard to the power of Congress over the several Territories during the whole time in which they continue to be Territories, and up to the very moment of their transition from a Territory to a State, is the true position under the Constitution of the United States, and one to be recognized and legitimately enforced by congressional legislation.

The gentleman from Georgia predicated his reply to the distinguished and learned gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. DAVIS], among other things, upon the ground that the Congress of the United States had heretofore dictated to the people of Louisiana conditions precedent to their admission into the Union as a State. I desire, inasmuch as the gentleman from Georgia made special reference to the Louisiana enabling act, to call the attention of the House and of the country to its provisions, for the purpose of showing that it goes as far as any man on this side of the House has ever ventured to go in respect to the authority of Congress over the Territories, and its power to impose restrictions upon the admission of new States into the Union.

Admit that the act of Congress, passed in 1811, to authorize the people of Louisiana to form a State constitution and government and to provide for their admission into the Union, was a just and constitutional enactment, and you admit all that we ask, all that any man can ask, upon which to predicate an argument against the proposition submitted to this House by the committee of conference, appointed through it, and in favor of the power of Congress not only to reject that bill but to reject the Lecompton constitution under any and all conceivable circumstances.

I do not know, nor do I care, whether the honorable gentleman from Georgia assumed and asserted the validity of the Louisiana act merely for the occasion, or not. I thank him for his concession that that act was a precedent which he might with propriety quote here against the argument of the gentleman from Maryland. Sir, if the gentleman's admission and assumption be right, if that statute be valid, it totally sweeps away the dogma of the sovereignty of new States in the formation of constitutions preparatory to admission, against the expressed will of the whole people of the United States, as set forth by their Representatives in Congress assembled. The admission of the authority of Congress to impose upon new States the restrictions of that statute concedes the right of Congress to reject any new State until it shall have adopted a constitution, not only republican, but also consistent with the Constitution of the United States, and also in conformity with such conditions precedent as Congress may deem just and proper to be imposed. I quote from that statute as follows:

"Sec. 2. And to it further enacted, That all free white male citizens of the United States, who shall have arrived at the age of twenty-one years, and resided within the said Territory at least one year previous to the day of election, and shall have paid a territorial, county, district, or parish tax; and all persons having in other respects the legal qualifications to vote for representatives in the General Assembly of the said Territory, be, and they are hereby, authorized to choose representatives to form a convention, who shall be apportioned among the several counties, districts, and parishes within the said Territory of Orleans, in such manner as the Legislature of the said Territory shall by law direct. The number of representatives shall not exceed sixty; and the elections for the representatives aforesaid shall take place on the third Monday in September next, and shall be conducted in the same manner as is now provided by the laws of the said Territory for electing members for the House of Representatives.

"Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the members of the convention, when duly elected, be, and they are hereby, authorized to meet at the city of New Orleans, on the first Monday of November next, which convention, when met, shall first determine, by a majority of the whole number elected, whether it be expedient or not, at that time, to form a constitution and State government for the people within the said Territory; and if it be determined to be expedient, then the convention shall in like manner declare, in behalf of the people of the said Territory, that it adopts the Constitution of the United States; whereupon the said convention shall be, and hereby is, authorized to form a constitution and State government for the people of the said Territory, provided the constitution to be formed, in virtue of the authority herein given, shall be republican, and consistent with the Constitution of the United States; that it shall contain the fundamental principles of civil and religious liberty; that it shall secure to the citizen the trial by jury in all criminal cases, and the privileges of the writ of habeas corpus, conformably to the provisions of the Constitution of the United States; and that after the admission of the said Territory of Orleans as a State into the Union, the laws which such State may pass shall be promulgated, and its records of every description shall be preserved, and its judicial and legislative written proceedings conducted, in the language in which the laws and the judicial and legislative written proceedings of the United States are now published and conducted: And provided also, That the said convention shall provide by an ordinance, irrevocable without the consent of the United States, that the people inhabiting the said Territory do agree and declare, that they forever disclaim all right or title to the waste or unappropriated lands lying within the said Territory; and that the same shall be and remain at the sole and entire disposition of the United States; and, moreover, that each and every tract of land sold by Congress shall be and remain exempt from any tax, laid by the order or under the authority of the State, whether for State, county, township, parish, or any other purpose whatever, for the term of five years from and after the respective days of the sales thereof; and that the lands belonging to citizens of the United States, residing without the said State, shall never be taxed higher than the lands belonging to persons residing therein; and that no taxes shall be imposed on lands the property of the United States; and that the river Mississippi, and the navigable rivers and waters leading into the same or into the Gulf of Mexico, shall be common highways and forever free, as well to the inhabitants of the said State as to other citizens of the United States, without any tax, duty, impost, or toll therefor imposed by the said State."

I am not here to find fault with the arguments of the learned gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. DAVIS]. I am not here to follow the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS], with the new lights he has discovered in his way to this political Damascus. The latter gentleman has, if you please, become an ally of the Republicans, of those he is wont to call Black Republicans. He is working (not voting) with us to-day. He is agreeing with us that Congress is restricted in nothing but its own conviction and its own judgment, in regard to the limitations which it may rightfully impose, under the Constitution, upon new States, as conditions precedent to their admission into the Union.

To make good my assertion, I need only refer specifically to the limitations imposed by the Louisiana act of 1811, providing for the admission of the State of Louisiana, which I have just read, and which the gentleman from Georgia approves, and upon which he takes his stand.

That statute, I repeat, goes as far as I have ever ventured to go on this question, and as far as any gentleman upon this side has ever ventured to go. I beg the attention of the House to the conditions precedent and restrictions which that act imposes upon the sovereignty of Louisiana. First, there is the condition precedent that before the people of Louisiana, after the election of their delegates to a convention, should take another step towards the organization of a State government, their delegates, in convention assembled, should, in their behalf, declare that they adopt the Constitution of the United States, together, of course, with all its limitations and restrictions upon State sovereignty. Having first performed this condition precedent, and not before, they might proceed to form a State constitution; provided, says the statute—

"That said constitution so to be formed shall be republican; shall be consistent with the Constitution of the United States; shall proclaim the fundamental principles of civil and religious liberty; shall secure to every citizen charged with a criminal offense a trial by jury; shall secure, also, the writ of habeas corpus as provided in the Constitution of the United States; shall provide that the legislation and judicial action of said State be conducted in the English language; shall surrender the right of the State over certain waste lands; also, its right to tax United States property."

Sir, this statute does not stop where certain gentlemen upon the other side of the House have been telling us that our power stops, to wit: with the mere declaration that the constitution of the proposed new State should be republican. That statute, as I have shown, goes much further, and requires that the new constitution shall conform to all the conditions and restrictions which I have enumerated. This statute further provides, in the fourth section, that the constitution so framed shall be submitted to the Congress of the United States for approval or rejection. For what purpose? To give to the Congress of the United States the opportunity of judging whether these conditions precedent had been complied with; whether the people had, by their legally chosen delegates, adopted the Constitution of the United States; whether their new constitution, contrary to and in contravention of their local laws—the civil law under which they then lived—secured the right of trial by jury in all criminal cases; whether the great writ of habeas corpus was secured to the citizens within the limits of the State; and whether, in addition, their constitution declared, as required, the great and fundamental principles of civil and religious liberty. Unless these provisions appeared, Congress, by this fourth section, reserved the power to say that Louisiana should not be permitted to organize herself into a State government for admission into this Union—should not, in fact, become a State, but should remain a Territory.

I ask the gentleman from Georgia, in order that I may make no mistake in this matter, whether he concedes that that enactment was constitutional; that it was the right of Congress, in 1811, under the Federal Constitution, to dictate to the people of Louisiana the condition precedent that their constitution should be consistent with the Constitution of the United States? whether he concedes that it was competent for Congress, under that act of 1811, to dictate to that people the further condition precedent that they should secure the right of trial by jury, in all criminal cases, to citizens within the State? whether he concedes that it was competent for Congress, by that act, to dictate to the people of Louisiana, as a further condition precedent to the establishment of a State government, and their admission into the Union, that they should secure the benefits of the right of habeas corpus in all cases, pursuant to the Constitution of the United States; and, finally, I ask him whether he concedes that it was competent for the Government of the United States, speaking through Congress by that act, to declare that that people should abolish their civil law and take ours? If he concedes all this, as he did by citing that act, he concedes all that I claim, and all that my friends have ever claimed in this great controversy. Who, sir, is to judge whether the constitution, framed by a people within a Territory, "is consistent with the Constitution of the United States?" By that enactment, upon which the gentleman planted himself, it is manifestly declared that the Congress of the United States shall judge of that, and no one else. That is Republicanism—Black Republicanism.

Mr. CURTIS. I beg the gentleman's pardon; it is not Black Republicanism, as some understand it.

Mr. BINGHAM. It is my Black Republicanism. That legislation of 1811 is sustained by precedent and commanding authority. It was sanctioned and approved by a man who has been called the Father of the Constitution—by way of preëminence—Mr. Madison. In addition to his approval of the act, I have before me what he has written on this provision of the Constitution, that Congress "may admit new States into the Union." He says:

"In the Articles of Confederation no provision is found on this important subject. Canada was to be admitted of right on her joining in the measures of the United States, and the other colonies, by which were evidently meant, the other British colonies, at the discretion of nine States. The eventual establishment of new States seems to have been overlooked by the compilers of that instrument. We have seen the inconvenience of this omission, and the assumption of power into which Congress has been led by it. With great propriety, therefore, has the new system supplied the defect. The general precaution that no new States shall be formed without the concurrence of the Federal authority"

* * * * * "is consonant to the principles which ought to govern such transactions."

There is where I stand; there is where those with whom I act, in reference to this question, stand; that there can be no such thing as an existing State, organized within the national territories, outside of the Union, and without the consent of the Federal Government; that there can be, under our Constitution, no new State rightfully organized within a United States Territory except it be organized in consonance with the Constitution of the United States, and with the consent of the Government of the United States given to such State organization, either previously or subsequently to its formation, and before the admission of such State into the Union. That is the position of Madison, that is the Republican position, and that seems to be the position of the gentleman from Georgia. Sir, other precedents justify me in saying that conditions and restrictions upon the organization of State governments within the Territories may be imposed by the Congress of the United States. I speak now of new States organized within the Territories of the Union more particularly. I do not wish to speak now of the organization of new States within the territory of a single State of the Union. That belongs to another provision of the Constitution, and we have nothing to do with it in this issue. We have other precedents, sir, for the position we assume of this power of Congress to impose limitations and restrictions upon new States—precedents furnished by the action of the fathers of the Constitution.

Sir, there was a condition precedent in the act providing for the admission of the State which I have the honor, in part, to represent, and which authorized the people of Ohio to frame a State constitution and government preparatory to their admission into the Union. That condition precedent was this:

"That the constitution so to be formed by the people of the Territory of Ohio shall not be repugnant to the sixth article of the ordinance of 1787."

What was that article? It was, sir:

"That slavery or involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime, should be forever prohibited."

Upon that condition the State of Ohio was permitted to organize a constitution, and to come into the Union. The men who framed that statute, and who voted for it in this and in the other Hall, did not get this new idea into their heads, that the people of a Territory might frame a constitution and organize a State government, and demand admission into the Union upon the simple condition that their constitution should be republican. What is a republican government? A republican government is simply a government where the sovereign authority is exercised through delegates or representatives chosen by the people. The Congress of 1802, which provided for the admission of the State of Ohio, thought that there was something more than a republican constitution to be framed; and hence they put in the other condition precedent, that the constitution of Ohio should not be repugnant to the sixth article of the ordinance of 1787, which forever prohibited slavery. Ohio came into the Union under that condition precedent; and for six years after her admission, and by force of this very restriction, she was denied the privilege of engaging in the foreign slave trade, which was being carried on by the original States under the express reservation of the Constitution of the United States, which authorized that trade until the year 1808 by any of the original thirteen States.

That same condition precedent was applied to the State of Illinois, and upon a strict compliance with that condition was she permitted to come into the Union. The same condition precedent was applied to the State of Indiana; and without that condition complied with she would not have been permitted to come into the Union. Her people petitioned Congress to repeal that restriction, and Congress reported through Randolph, of Roanoke, against the repeal, and refused to do it.

Now, sir, on these conditions precedent I might rest this argument; but there is yet another of great significance—the celebrated joint resolution which authorized the admission of Texas into the Union. The whole territory embraced within the limits of that State—notwithstanding the asserted sovereignty of the State—was by a condition precedent set forth in the act of admission, subjected to certain conditions and restrictions imposed upon no other State of the Union. Upon this point I challenge contradiction.

What is the general provision of the Constitution? Simply that new States may be admitted by Congress into the Union; also, that further provision, "that no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State, nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States, or parts of States, without the consent [in the latter case] of the Legislatures of the States concerned, as well as of Congress." And what was the condition precedent annexed to the admission of the State of Texas? I will read the act that there may be no misunderstanding of it. It is as follows:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Congress doth consent that the territory properly included within, and rightfully belonging to the Republic of Texas, may be erected into a new State, to be called the State of Texas, with a republican form of government, to be adopted by the people of said Republic, by deputies in convention assembled, with the consent of the existing Government, in order that the same may be admitted as one of the States of this Union.

"2. And be it further resolved, That the foregoing consent of Congress is given upon the following conditions, and with the following guarantees, to wit: First, Said State to be formed, subject to the adjustment, by this Government, of all questions of boundary that may arise with other Governments; and the constitution thereof, with the proper evidence of its adoption by the people of said Republic of Texas, shall be transmitted to the President of the United States, to be laid before Congress for its final action, on or before the 1st day of January, 1846. Second, Said State, when admitted into the Union, after ceding to the United States all public edifices, fortifications, barracks, ports and harbors, navy and navy-yards, docks, magazines, arms, armaments, and all other property and means pertaining to the public defense belonging to said Republic of Texas, shall retain all the public funds, debts, taxes, and dues of every kind, which may belong to, or be due and owing said Republic; and shall also retain all the vacant and unappropriated lands lying within its limits, to be applied to the payment of the debts and liabilities of said Republic of Texas, and the residue of said lands, after discharging said debts and liabilities, to be disposed of as said State may direct; but in no event are said debts and liabilities to become a charge upon the Government of the United States. Third, New States, of convenient size, not exceeding four in number, in addition to said State of Texas, and having sufficient population, may hereafter, by the consent of said State, be formed out of the territory thereof, which shall be entitled to admission under the provisions of the Federal Constitution. And such States as may be formed out of that portion of said territory lying south of 36° 30' north latitude, commonly known as the Missouri compromise line, shall be admitted into the Union with or without slavery, as the people of each State asking admission may desire. And in such State or States as shall be formed out of said territory north of said Missouri compromise line, slavery or involuntary servitude (except for crime) shall be prohibited."

There is a restriction upon State sovereignty—Texas as a State, as well as the new States hereafter to be formed within the limits of Texas, are bound and fettered by that restriction—by its terms no new State can hereafter be formed within the territory of Texas and admitted into the Union, unless such State so to be formed, north of 36° 30' north latitude, shall forever exclude slavery.

Sir, with these precedents, and the great and commanding authorities of Jefferson and Madison, who signed the statutes I have cited, it seems to me it is not necessary to multiply arguments upon the subject of the power of Congress to impose these restrictions, and thus limit State sovereignty.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I wish to make one suggestion here, and that is that the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] voted for those resolutions for the admission of Texas.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is consistent with his argument here to-day; in claiming that the Congress of the United States may impose conditions precedent upon the admission of new States within the limits of the Constitution. That vote of his asserted the right of Congress to exclude slavery within new States. That is where I want to place him; that is where he belongs, and where I belong. I do not recognize the right of five hundred men, or five hundred thousand men, to establish any State constitution, or government, anywhere within the territories of the United States, without the consent of the people of the United States expressed either previously or subsequently, through their representatives in Congress assembled.

This brings me, therefore, to the point now before us. I do not find fault with this bill because it asserts the power of Congress to annex conditions precedent upon which alone the State of Kansas is to come into the Union. I find fault with this bill because, in my judgment, it is a great crime, not only against the people of Kansas, but against the Constitution of our common country, and against the sacred rights of human nature.

Globe that bill over with what words you may, it is a written crime; enact it into a law, and it will be a legislative atrocity engrossed upon parchment. Dignify this act with what title you please, history, stern, truthful, impartial history, will entitle it "An act to take away the liberties of American citizens." That this bill is a crime, I will try to show. In the first place, this bill does not submit, as the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] very frankly acknowledges, to the people of Kansas the question, whether they will approve or reject the Lecompton constitution.

Instead of that, sir, it submits to them a bribe in the way of lands and money, and says to them, "if you will vote for this proposition you may come into the Union under the constitution framed at Lecompton on the 7th day of November, 1857; but if you reject this bribe the penalty which will follow shall be that you shall not come into the Union as a State until you shall have a population equal to the ratio of representation at the time of your subsequent application." I say such a thing is without precedent in the legislation of the country; is unauthorized by and in direct contravention of the Constitution of the United States. There is nothing in the Constitution of the United States which gives colorable authority for such legislation. There is nothing in the past legislation of this country that gives colorable authority for it. It is a simple act of despotism attempted to be enacted here by the Congress of the United States under cover of that Constitution which bears the peerless name of Washington. It were better, sir, that that sacred instrument should perish as though smote by the lightning of heaven, than that any such act as that now proposed should be placed upon our statute-book. What is it? Why, that the Congress of the United States shall dictate to freemen that they shall accept under pains and penalties a bribe, and thereby become subject to a constitution which they never made, which they abhor, and which they have condemned! I say, and say it without the fear of contumacious, that the genius of our Constitution is this: that new State constitutions must emanate from the people within the limits of the proposed State, and from no other source. In framing a State constitution, they are subject to the limitations of the Federal Constitution, and the limitations or restrictions imposed by acts of Congress. They may do anything in framing their constitution that is not inconsistent with the provisions of that instrument, or of such restrictive enactments. The moment they violate these provisions, their constitution ought to be rejected by Congress. That is our position.

But this bill assumes the very contrary and provides that Congress shall adopt a constitution which was framed by conspirators at Lecompton. The people of Kansas never framed it, by delegates or otherwise. On the contrary, on the 4th day of last January, ten thousand of the lawful voters of that Territory, a large majority of all its qualified electors, condemned this instrument at the ballot-box. They never framed that instrument. It was framed, I admit, by delegates at Lecompton; but, as I had occasion to say on a former occasion, they were delegates whom the people had never chosen, nor authorized to be chosen, and they only sat in safety at Lecompton under cover of Federal bayonets. That fact is notorious; and the President of the United States, who is to-day, by the use of his patronage, engineering this infernal proposition through the Congress of the United States, came before this body, and by his message of the 2d day of February last, concedes to us and to the world, that the people of Kansas never framed this constitution. What does he say, sir? Why, he says in that message, amongst other things, that ever since the day of his inauguration—namely, the 4th of March, 1857—the people of Kansas have been in open rebellion against the government established there by Congress. He says further, that they wished during all that time to establish a revolutionary government under the so-called Topeka constitution. He says further, and therein lies the confession of the truth of this matter, that they were arrayed in such numbers against the existing authorities in that Territory, that they would have overturned the territorial government—out of which sprung this Lecompton constitution—but for the fact, to use his own words, that that government was protected from their assaults by the troops of the United States.

Now, I submit to you, sir; whether that is not a fair, unequivocal, open confession of the fact that the great majority of the people of Kansas never assented, from first to last, to any portion of that machinery which has resulted in the production of this Lecompton constitution? Why, then, attempt to force it upon them with this penalty threatened on the one hand, and this bribe tendered on the other? Do you not impose an unjust and unfair condition by this bill when you therein declare that, if the people accept this bribe, they shall come into the Union under the Lecompton constitution, although they have only fifty thousand population; but if they reject the bribe, they should not come in under a constitution of their choice till they shall have a population of ninety-three thousand four hundred, the present ratio of representation, or a still greater number, if before that time the ratio be increased?

But, sir, there is another objection to this measure. Suppose that the people of Kansas were permitted to vote directly upon this constitution—I say that the Congress of the United States has duties to perform which it is not at liberty to waive; and one of these duties is to see to it that no constitution shall go into operation with the consent of Congress which denies the right of a majority of the qualified voters to amend, alter, or change it at their pleasure. Such a constitution is not republican.

Now, sir, I assert, that this Lecompton constitution, by express provisions, excludes the majority from this right of amendment. What are its provisions in this respect? First, that in any election to be held in said State, the qualifications of a voter shall be that he be a male citizen of the United States, above the age of twenty-one years. (Article 8, section 1.) And section fourteen of the schedule, provides that the constitution shall never be amended or altered, "unless a majority of all the citizens of the State shall first have voted for a convention." Now, every man knows that under our free institutions, every person born of free parents within the jurisdiction of the United States, and who are residents thereof, is a citizen of the United States, and therefore of the State of his residence, whether such person be male or female. The records of the courts in a thousand instances, bear witness to the fact that women and children, as well as men of full age, are citizens of the United States, and of the several States. This Lecompton constitution limits the right of suffrage to male citizens of the United States over twenty-one years of age, and at the same time said instrument provides that it shall never be amended or altered without the consent and approval of a majority of all the citizens by their votes at the polls. It simply requires an impossibility, when it says that a majority of the citizens, men, women and children, of the Territory, shall assent by ballot to the convention for amendment, when it declares that at any election only male citizens of the United States over twenty-one years of age shall vote. That is the language and legal effect of this instrument. No man will undertake to gainsay that the language is there as I have quoted it. The words are plain; and when the words are plain, there is no room for construction, and no construction can be tolerated.

But, Mr. Speaker, I must hasten to the conclusion of what I have to say. There is another provision in this constitution to which I desire to call attention; and that is, the provision that it shall never be so amended as to affect the ownership of property in slaves. What becomes of gentlemen's notions of State sovereignty, if the Congress of the United States can give force and effect to such a law as this? Does not every man here know that even if my construction of the constitution were wrong, and a majority of the qualified voters of Kansas were to attempt to amend their constitution so as to abolish the ownership of property in slaves, after this atrocious thing had become the fundamental law of the State by the assent of Congress, such amendment would be held by that citadel of slavery which is located in the base of this Capitol to be in violation of vested rights, and therefore void? The whole power of the General Government would be arrayed to sustain that vested right, if you please, against the expressed will of a majority of the people of Kansas.

Sir, this is the first instance in which the Congress of the United States has attempted, by formal enactment, to give perpetuity to this institution of slavery within the limits and jurisdiction of a sovereign State. As a State-rights man, standing here, pledged as I am to maintain the rights of the people and the rights of the States, I protest against this dangerous assumption of power, and claim that it is the right of the sovereign people within the limits of a State to abolish the institution of slavery at their pleasure. Does any Representative from the South assert this power to be in Congress?

I do not object to restraints upon States in favor of liberty, and to the end that the Constitution of our common country may be upheld in full force, and that the great and sacred rights of human nature may not be infringed; but I protest against this Lecompton conspiracy, which denies the right of self-government, and ignores the will of the majority if expressed, or attempted to be expressed, against despotism. Let gentlemen beware how they attempt, even under the power and shelter of a great central Government, more than imperial in its resources, to crush out the heart and conscience of the people. GOD IS IN HISTORY. Let gentlemen give heed to its lessons of the terrible retribution which sometimes overtakes those who seek to establish an odious and hated despotism over the minds and conscience, the brain and heart of freemen.

Sir, I claim for myself the same right as did the Congress of 1811, to inquire "whether this Lecompton constitution is consistent with the provisions of the Federal Constitution?" And, sir, I have come to the conclusion that it is not only inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States, but that it is in direct conflict with the rights of every man, woman, and child, within the Territory of Kansas.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. BINGHAM. No, sir. If you please, I prefer to conclude what I have to say without interruption. This instrument declares that the right of property in slaves and their increase is not within the control of the majority of the people of the State; that this right is before and higher than any constitutional sanction. This instrument asserts another provision, the brutal despotism of which can hardly be equaled, except by that recently exercised by Nicholas, whose hands were red with the blood of murdered Poland and the assassinated liberty of Hungary. It is the provision which dooms freemen, guilty of no crime, to perpetual exile. Such are some of the provisions of this infernal instrument framed at Lecompton, for which we are now called upon to vote.

What, sir, are the arguments addressed to us to induce us to give our assent to this instrument? The President of the United States stoops from the position of his great office, hitherto made illustrious by Washington, Adams, Jefferson, and Madison—he comes here into the Hall of this House of Representatives, and tells us that this Lecompton constitution, with all its atrocious provisions, is eminently reasonable and proper, because Kansas, says he, "is at this moment as much a slave State as Georgia or South Carolina." And he does not stop with this. The President has officially declared to us that these slave provisions are just and reasonable. Justice, sir, to sell a man's wife? Justice to sell a child's mother? Justice to drive a man, guilty of no crime, away from the land of his birth, from the scenes of his childhood, from the graves of his kindred? Justice to deny to a man the fruits of his own toil? Justice to deny to a man the enjoyments of his own home? Justice to deny to a man the presence and prattle of his own children? Justice to deny to a man the convictions of his own soul? Justice! justice, sir, is the unchanging and eternal rule of right; it is the attribute of the great God of nature; it dwelt with him before worlds were; it will abide with him when worlds perish! By the judgment of the Pagan and Christian world, it is injustice to deny to any man his right.

Mr. Speaker, it is not justice to wantonly subject men, women, and children, at the arbitrary will of another, to stripes and imprisonment, to hunger and thirst, to cold and nakedness, robbery and murder. To enslave a man is to murder him by slow torture. This will not pass for justice among men, until men forget the distinctions between right and wrong, good and evil, virtue and vice.

By this bill, sir, we are not only to sanction the monstrous atrocity of chattel slavery, but we are to say, if the majority will accept the bribe, that atrocity shall be perpetual. We are to agree that the children of wrong and oppression in Kansas shall have no deliverance in the future; that they and their children shall, from generation to generation, toil on in the house of their bondage; in the words of this instrument, that no alteration shall be made therein to affect the ownership of property in slaves. Sir, the American Congress, by this enactment, is to declare that if the majority will accept the bribe, the Congress of the United States will perpetuate the horrid lie that one man may of right sell his brother for thirty pieces of silver—as Judas sold our Lord!

I say to gentlemen you may pass the bill, but you cannot make the lie perpetual. A lie cannot live forever, it has no vitality in it. Sooner or later it must perish. Perpetuate the atrocity that a majority may of right enslave the minority or drive it into returnless exile! Make this rule of wrong perpetual! There is nothing perpetual but God, His truth, His justice, and the creatures of His hand. I say to gentlemen on the other side, you have it in your power to save our country from this foul dishonor. Why do you hesitate to deny your assent to this great wrong? Is it because you believe with the President "that slavery exists in Kansas under and by virtue of the Constitution of the United States?" Is it because you believe, with certain political economists of our day, that slavery is the natural and normal condition of the laboring man? If that be your conviction, act it out; say so in words. It is your right and your duty to declare it. And by an open, manly avowal of it, you will command the respect of those who differ from you for your candor, if you can never hope to command their approval of your principles. Declare openly your true purpose and intent. For God's sake do not shirk this great issue under false, and, if I may be allowed the expression without meaning to be offensive, fraudulent pretenses of State rights and popular sovereignty. Why do you hesitate to say openly what your support of this bill manifestly imports—that it is your purpose to establish and uphold chattel slavery in Kansas under the forms of law and at all hazards? Why do you hesitate to avow this purpose? Is it not because you feel and know that its distinct avowal would electrify the nation, and summon it to a stern, united, defiant resistance?

I say to gentlemen on the other side, who compose the majority of this House, you may pass this bill into a law; you may induce the majority to accept its proffered bribe; you may thereby impose upon that young Territory the shame and crime and curse of this brutal atrocity; you may thereby shake down the pillars of this beautiful fabric of free government, and drench this land in fraternal blood, but you can never give permanence to such an act of perfidy, to such a system of wrong. It is too late for that; it is the high noon of the nineteenth century. The whole heavens are filled with the light of a new and better day. Kings hold their power with a tremulous and unsteady hand. The bastiles and dungeons of tyrants, those graves of human liberty, are giving up their dead. There is a pause in the world's great battle. Its banners of conflict, which but yesterday streamed from Paris to St. Petersburg, are furled; and to-day the mighty heart of the world stands still, awaiting the resurrection of the nations, and that final triumph of the right foretold in prophecy and invoked in song, when the Angel of Deliverance shall lead captivity captive. In this hour of the world's repose, and the world's hope, shall America, the child and the stay of the earth's old age, prove false to her most sacred traditions, false to her holiest trust, and by this proposed enactment, consent to strike down liberty in her own temple, and forge chains for her own children?

Mr. CLINGMAN. The report from the conference committee is not amendable. We must vote on it as it stands. I presume that gentlemen have made up their minds on it, and I have risen to demand the previous question.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that demand. I propose only to say a word or two; and when I have concluded, I will renew the call for the previous question.

Mr. QUITMAN. It is known that my position on this question is different from that of the great body of my southern friends, and I would be glad of an opportunity to explain that position.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Somebody suggested to me that the gentleman from Mississippi only wants ten minutes. I am disposed to be courteous. If the gentleman will renew the call when he has finished, I have no objection. Then it can be seconded and the main question ordered. As it is nearly four o'clock, and the House does not seem to be full, we can then adjourn, and let the vote be taken to-morrow.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I will suggest to the gentleman from North Carolina not to move the previous question this evening. Let him announce that he will call for it to-morrow at one o'clock.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I will make this suggestion, which I hope will meet with universal consent: that the previous question be seconded, and the main question ordered; with the agreement that this debate shall go on until one o'clock to-morrow. We may not, if the proposition of the gentleman from Georgia be carried, be able to second the previous question to-morrow.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I trust that there will be no such agreement. The House is very full, and I think we had better have the vote to-day.

Mr. CLINGMAN. As I cannot suit everybody then, I insist on my call for the previous question. The majority can vote it down or not, as it chooses.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I call for tellers. Tellers were ordered.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I will withdraw the call for the gentleman from Mississippi, and for nobody else, on condition that he will renew it.

Mr. SEWARD. I object to any farming out of the floor.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I move that there be a call of the House.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. I was upon the floor nearly as soon as my friend from North Carolina, and if he yields I insist that I am entitled to the floor.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I insist on the demand for the previous question.

Mr. GARNETT. Will the gentleman from North Carolina permit me to interrupt him before he calls for the previous question? There are more than one of us—there is the gentleman from Mississippi, and one or two others—who wish, not to make a speech, but to state the reasons which will govern our votes on this occasion. I think that it is asking nothing unreasonable of my friend from North Carolina, or the House. We ask that the previous question be not called until to-morrow.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Gentlemen can give their reasons as well after the vote as before it. I leave the question with the House.

The House divided on Mr. STEPHENS's motion for a call of the House; and there were—ayes 98, noes 104.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. It is now our hour of adjournment; and I therefore move that the House adjourn.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. The understanding was that we should take this vote to-day; and I hope it will be taken.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I wanted that; but that was exactly what the gentleman would not agree to. I do not want to have a snap judgment taken.

Mr. MORGAN. I make the point that the gentleman cannot make motion after motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows no reason why he cannot. Can the gentleman suggest any?

Mr. MORGAN. It was a mere mistake of mine. The House divided; and there were—ayes one hundred and three—

Mr. STANTON demanded tellers.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 107, nays 105; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ahl, Anderson, Atkins, Avery, Bark-dale, Bishop, Bockock, Bonham, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Bryan, Burnett, Burns, Caruthers, Caskey, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Clingan, Cobb, John C. Sherman, Robert Smith, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Tompkins, Tripp, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Elihu B. Washburn, Israel Washburn, and Wilson—105.

So the motion was agreed to.

Pending the above call,

Mr. RITCHIE stated that his colleague, Mr. PURVIANCE, who had been called home by the death of his mother, had paired off with his colleague, Mr. DIMMICK, until Tuesday next.

Mr. BONHAM said that at the instance of those from his own section, and with whom he had acted, he would change his vote, and vote for the adjournment.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois, said that for a similar reason he would change his vote, and vote against the adjournment.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, said that he had voted against the adjournment, and he believed he had voted right. He thought the House ought to dispose of the question at once. At the suggestions of friends he changed his vote, and voted in the affirmative.

Mr. ATKINS said that he had voted against the adjournment; but not caring to record his name with those upon the other side, he would vote in the affirmative.

And then the House (at ten minutes past four o'clock, p. m.) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, April 29, 1858.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The joint resolution from the House of Representatives (H. R. No. 26) authorizing the arrangement and disposal of public buildings in the city of Philadelphia, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

GONZAGA COLLEGE.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 76) to incorporate Gonzaga College in the city of Washington and District of Columbia. The amendment was in line sixteen of the first section, to strike out "five" and insert "two," so as to restrict the amount of property which may be held by the college corporation at any one time to $200,000 in value.

Mr. BROWN. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. JONES presented the memorial of James Thorington, praying for the establishment of an additional land district in the State of Iowa; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented additional papers in relation to the claim of Captain John Pickell; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HAMMOND presented a presentment of the grand jury of the April term of the circuit court of the United States for the district of South Carolina, sitting in Charleston, recommending that a suitable building be provided for the accommodation of the United States courts at that place; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BIGLER presented the petition of George T. Parry, praying that the Secretary of the Navy be authorized to purchase his patent for an instrument, the object of which is to abolish the friction attending the thrust of propellers; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. HARLAN presented the petition of citizens of Iowa, praying that a license may be granted to Lewis A. Thomas, for the establishment of a ferry across the Missouri river, within the limits of the proposed Territory of Dacotah; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. HOUSTON presented the petition of Sarah Brashear, mother of William C. Brashear, deceased, an officer in the Texan navy at the time of the annexation of Texas to the United States, praying to be allowed the benefit of the act granting five years' pay to the surviving officers of the Texan navy; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BROWN. I have a memorial from more than one thousand resident citizens of the cities of Washington and Georgetown, praying the reorganization of the criminal court of this District. The petition is very short, only a dozen lines, and I will read it.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America:

The undersigned, citizens and residents of the cities of Washington and Georgetown, do most respectfully represent, that, in view of the frightful violations of law and order now and for a considerable time prevailing in these once peaceful cities; and believing that the manner in which our criminal laws have been for several years past, and are at the present time, administered, is the principal if not the entire cause of these outrages:

We therefore most respectfully pray your honorable bodies to take the subject into your most earnest and serious consideration; and we would ask, in conclusion, that you will enact a law to reorganize our criminal court in this District, and our petitioners will ever pray.

I desire to say, in presenting this memorial, that I concur entirely with the memorialists, but that neither they nor I are to be understood as saying or intimating that the fault is with the criminal judge. The fault is in the organization of the court itself; the manner of drawing grand jurors, and the manner of appointing bailiffs, all of which is regulated by law. It is expected that the Committee on the District of Columbia should take charge of this memorial, but that, to my mind, is not the proper reference. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

It was so referred.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate pay, from the contingent fund of the Senate, the sum of $200 to B. L. Bogan, for the services of his son in the document-room of the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, their Clerk, announcing that the House had passed a bill to authorize the vestry of Washington parish to take and inclose certain parts of streets in Washington city, for the purpose of extending the Washington Cemetery, and for other purposes.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. HUNTER. I report back from the Committee on Finance the bill (H. R. No. 306) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1858, which was referred to the committee with the Senate amendments, and the action of the House of Representatives on those amendments. I move that it be now taken up for consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HUNTER. The Senate are aware that the House sent back the bill disagreeing to our amendments, one of which relates to the reporters of the House, and the other to the third section. Both of those items were stricken out by the Senate, and the House disagreed to those amendments. The Committee on Finance instruct me to move that the Senate recede from those amendments, which motion I accordingly submit.

Mr. TOOMBS. I believe the proper motion would be—though I do not know which has priority—to insist, and ask for a conference with the House of Representatives, which I hope will be done. I see no reason why we should recede from the almost unanimous judgment of the Senate against these amendments of the House, which are confessedly admitted by all the Senate—at least by all who spoke on the subject—to be illegal, contrary to the laws of the land. Here is a general supply bill for the public service, one which the exigencies of war alone can justify our passing through at all, and we are asked to allow the House of Representatives to place upon such a bill illegal appropriations, things that nobody on this floor will justify; not only against law, but so outrageous in their character that they have not one defender on this floor. I see no reason why the honorable Senator from Virginia should make this an exception to the ordinary parliamentary rule. Why should not the Senate take the legitimate parliamentary means of getting rid of what they have nearly unanimously determined to be an extremely obnoxious section? I hope, therefore, that the motion of the Senator from Virginia will be voted down, or that mine will have priority, that the Senate insist and ask for a conference. It is the usual mode, and I see no reason for departing from it, unless gentlemen wish to abandon their opposition to these obnoxious measures, and to procure their passage while voting against them. Unless they are really in favor of them, while seeming to oppose them, I see no reason for departing from the usual course.

Mr. HUNTER. If I supposed that by appointing a committee of conference the House of Representatives would agree to strike out these items, I certainly would vote for it; but the vote of that House was very decided—more than two to one. I have no idea, from all I hear, that they will recede. I know that the Government is in need of the money proposed to be appropriated in this deficiency bill, and therefore I was disposed to end it as soon as I could. In regard to these sections, if the Senate does not choose to recede, then the Senator from Georgia can move to insist and try a conference. I apprehend without that he will not find himself able to effect anything unless he determines to lose the bill upon it.

Mr. TOOMBS. I have no hesitation in saying that I am prepared to lose the bill on it. I am prepared to do my duty to the public Treasury, and not to be forced to illegal and unconstitutional expenditures by the other branch of the Legislature. While I yield all respect to them, I have my duties to perform, and I shall follow them to their consequences.

Mr. PUGH. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to recede.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator from Georgia that the motion of the Senator from Virginia is first in order, and must first be put.

Mr. TOOMBS. I withdraw my motion for the present.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. YULEE. I have been absent in attendance on a committee; but I understand that the Committee on Finance recommend that the Senate recede. I nearly always vote to sustain the recommendations of the committee; I shall do so on this occasion.

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bell, Bigler, Brown, Crittenden, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Houston, Hunter, Johnson of Arkansas, Mason, Polk, Wilson, Wright, and Yulee—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Biggs, Broderick, Chandler, Clark, Dixon, Douglas, Durkee, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Henderson, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, King, Mallory, Pugh, Seward, Simmons, Toombs, Trumbull, and Wade—22.

So the Senate refused to recede from their amendments.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope that, as the Senate have refused to recede, the Senator from Georgia will make his motion to insist and ask a conference.

Mr. TOOMBS. I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to. It was ordered that the committee be appointed by the President pro tempore; and Messrs. TOOMBS, BIGGS, and FESSENDEN were appointed.

A message was afterwards received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, their Clerk, announcing that the House insisted on their disagreement to the first and second amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 306) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending 30th of June, 1858, insisted on by the Senate; agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and have appointed Mr. JOHN LETCHER, of Virginia, Mr. WILLIAM B. MACLAY, of New York, and Mr. M. H. NICHOLS, of Ohio, the committee on their part.

GEORGE FISHER'S REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. TOOMBS. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up the Senate joint resolution No. 21. It is a short resolution, which was objected to the other day by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. BIGGS,] who, on examination, withdraws his objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will remark to the Senator from Georgia, that, unless by unanimous consent, his motion cannot be entertained, the hour of half past twelve o'clock having arrived.

Mr. TOOMBS. I ask that unanimous consent. It will not take more than a moment to dispose of this joint resolution. If it takes time, I am willing to let it go over.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. No. 21) devolving upon the Secretary of War the execution of the act of Congress entitled "An act supplementary to an act therein mentioned," approved December 22, 1854.

It provides that the various duties imposed or required to be performed by the act of Congress entitled "An act supplemental to an act therein mentioned," approved December 22, 1854, including the act to which it is supplemental, shall be transferred to the Secretary of War, who is to proceed de novo to execute the same in their plain and obvious meaning; but from any amount which may then be found justly and equitably due to the legal representatives of George Fisher, deceased, there shall be deducted all sums which may have been heretofore allowed and paid by the United States.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

KANSAS—LECOMPTON CONSTITUTION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. No. 161) for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I have carefully examined the bill reported by the committee of conference as a substitute for the House amendment to the Senate bill for the admission of Kansas, with an anxious desire to find in it such provisions as would enable me to give it my support. I had hoped that, after the disagreement of the two Houses upon this question, some plan, some form of bill, could have been agreed upon, which would harmonize and quiet the country, and reunite those who agree in principle and in political action on this great question, so as to take it out of Congress. I am not able, in the bill which is now under consideration, to find that the principle for which I have contended is fairly carried out. The position, and the sole position, upon which I have stood in this whole controversy, has been that the people of Kansas, and of each other Territory, in forming a constitution for admission into the Union as a State, should be left perfectly free to form and mold their domestic institutions and organic act in their own way, without coercion on the one side, or any improper or undue influence on the other.

The question now arises, is there such a submission of the Lecompton constitution as brings it fairly within that principle? In terms, the constitution is not submitted at all; but yet we are told that it amounts to a submission, because there is a land grant attached to it, and they are permitted to vote for the land grant, or against the land grant; and, if they accept the land grant, then they are required to take the constitution with it; and, if they reject the land grant, it shall be held and deemed a decision against coming into the Union under the Lecompton constitution. Hence it has been argued in one portion of the Union that this is a submission of the constitution, and in another portion that it is not. We are to be told that submission is popular sovereignty in one section, and submission in another section is not popular sovereignty.

Sir, I had hoped that when we came finally to adjust this question, we should have been able to employ language so clear, so unequivocal, that there would have been no room for doubt as to what was meant, and what the line of policy was to be in the future. Are these people left free to take or reject the Lecompton constitution? If they accept the land grant, they are compelled to take it. If they reject the land grant, they are out of the Union. Sir, I have no special objection to the land grant as it is: I think it is a fair one, and if they had put this further addition, that if they refused to come in under the Lecompton constitution with the land grant, they might proceed to form a new constitution, and that they should then have the same amount of lands, there would have been no bounty held out for coming in under the Lecompton constitution; but when the law gives them the six million acres in the event they take this constitution, and does not indicate what they are to have in the event they reject it, and wait until they can form another, I submit the question whether there is not an inducement, a bounty held out to influence these people to vote for this Lecompton constitution?

It may be said that when they attain the ninety-three thousand population, or if they wait until after 1860, if they acquired the population required by the then ratio—which may be one hundred and ten thousand or one hundred and twenty thousand—and form a constitution under it, we shall give them the same amount of land that is now given by this grant. That may be so, and may not be so. I believe it will be so; and yet in the House bill, for which this is a substitute, the provision was that they should have this same amount of land, whether they came in under the Lecompton constitution or whether they formed a new constitution. There was no doubt, no uncertainty left in regard to what were to be their rights under the land grant, whether they took the one constitution or the other. Hence that proposition was a fair submission, without any penalties on the one side, or any bounty or special favor or privilege on the other to influence their action. In this view of the case, I am not able to arrive at the conclusion that this is a fair submission either of the question of the constitution itself, or of admission into the Union under the constitution and the proposition submitted by this bill.

Again, sir, there is a further contingency. In the event that they reject this constitution, they are to stay out of the Union until they shall attain the requisite population for a member of Congress, according to the then ratio of representation in the other House. I have no objection to making it a general rule that Territories shall be kept out until they have the requisite population. I have proposed it over and over again. I am willing to agree to it and make it applicable to Kansas if you will make it a general rule. But, sir, it is one thing to adopt that rule as a general rule and adhere to it in all cases, and it is a very different, and a very distinct thing, to provide that if they will take this constitution, which the people have shown that they abhor, they may come in with forty thousand people, but if they do not, they shall stay out until they get ninety thousand; thus discriminating between the different character of institutions that may be formed. I submit the question whether it is not congressional intervention, when you provide that a Territory may come in with one kind of constitution with forty thousand, and with a different kind of constitution, not until she gets ninety thousand, or one hundred and twenty thousand? Is it intervention with inducements to control the result. It is intervention with a bounty on the one side and a penalty on the other. I ask, are we prepared to construe the great principle of popular sovereignty in such a manner as will recognize the right of Congress to intervene and control the decision that the people may make on this question.

The great principle for which we have all contended, in the language of the Kansas-Nebraska act, is to leave "the people perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States." If you hold out large grants, and pecuniary inducements, to influence the affirmative vote, and the terror of staying out of the Union to influence the negative vote, I submit the question, whether that people are left perfectly free to form and regulate their institutions or not? I insist that where there are inducements on one side, and penalties on the other, there is no freedom of election. The election must be free. The electors must be left unbiased by the action of the government, if you are going to have fair elections, and a fair decision.

For these reasons I do not think that this bill brings the question within that principle which I have held dear, and in defense of which I have stood here for the last five months, battling against the large majority of my political friends, and in defense of which I intend to stand as long as I have any association or connection with the politics of the country. I must repeat, sir, that I do not think this brings it within the principle thus laid down, nor do the Democracy of Illinois think this bill comes within that principle. We have recently held a State convention. Public meetings were held in ninety-eight of the one hundred and odd counties. In ninety-seven of these counties resolutions were passed indorsing the course of the delegation in Congress upon this question. In one county the opposite policy you see sustained. That was the county of Lake, a county where the Republicans have an overwhelming majority—perhaps ten or twenty to one over the Democrats, and where there were just Democrats enough to hold the post office and the custom-house, and to fill the light-houses. That one county was carried by the Lecompton men, twenty-seven of them in number, I think; the other ninety-seven counties were being carried by the anti-Lecompton men, and in nearly all of them by a unanimous vote. That convention representing the entire State, embodied more of the eminent and distinguished men—men of weight, of character, moral, political, and social, than any convention ever assembled in the State. That convention which thus assembled a few days ago passed resolutions, and among them was one upon this point which I will read. After defining and indorsing the principle of popular sovereignty, the sixth resolution declares:

"Resolved, That a fair application of these principles requires that the Lecompton constitution should be submitted to a direct vote of the actual inhabitants of Kansas, so that they may vote for or against that instrument, before Kansas shall be declared one of the States of this Union; and until it shall be ratified by the people of Kansas at a fair election held for that purpose, the Illinois Democracy are unalterably opposed to the admission of Kansas under that constitution."

I will furnish to the reporter the whole series, and ask him to incorporate them into the report, as furnishing the platform upon which the Illinois Democracy stand, and by which I intend to abide.

"Colonel McClernand, from the committee to prepare resolutions for the consideration of the convention, made the following report; which was read, and, on motion, each resolution was separately read and unanimously adopted:

"1. Resolved, That the Democratic party of the State of Illinois, through their delegates in general convention assembled, do reassert and declare the principles avowed by them as when, on former occasions, they have presented their candidates for popular suffrage.

"2. Resolved, That they are unalterably attached to, and will maintain inviolate, the principles declared by the national convention at Cincinnati in June, 1856.

"3. Resolved, That they avow, with renewed energy, their devotion to the Federal Union of the United States, their earnest desire to avert sectional strife, their determination to maintain the sovereignty of the States, and to protect every State, and the people thereof, in all their constitutional rights.

"4. Resolved, That the platform of principles established by the national Democratic convention at Cincinnati, is the only authoritative exposition of Democratic doctrine, and they deny the right of any power on earth, except a like body, to change or interpolate that platform; or to prescribe new and different tests; that they will neither do it themselves nor permit it to be done by others, but will recognize all men as Democrats who stand by and uphold Democratic principles.

"5. Resolved, That in the organization of States, the people have a right to decide at the polls upon the character of their fundamental law, and that the experience of the past year has conclusively demonstrated the wisdom and propriety of the principle, that the fundamental law, under which the Territory seeks admission into the Union, should be submitted to the people of such Territory for their ratification or rejection at a fair election to be held for that purpose; and that, before such Territory is admitted as a State, such fundamental law should receive a majority of the legal votes cast at such election; and they deny the right, and condemn the attempt, of any convention, called for the purpose of framing a constitution, to impose the instrument formed by them upon the people against their known will.

"6. Resolved, That a fair application of these principles requires that the Lecompton constitution should be submitted to a direct vote of the actual inhabitants of Kansas, so that they may vote for or against that instrument, before Kansas shall be declared one of the States of this Union; and until it shall be ratified by the people of Kansas at a fair election held for that purpose, the Illinois Democracy are unalterably opposed to the admission of Kansas under that constitution.

"7. Resolved, That we heartily approve and sustain the manly, firm, patriotic, and Democratic position of S. A. DOUGLAS, ISAAC N. MORRIS, THOMAS L. HARRIS, AARON SHAW, ROBERT SMITH, and SAMUEL S. MARSHALL, the Democratic delegation of Illinois in Congress, upon the question of the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution; and that, by their firm and uncompromising devotion to Democratic principles, and to the cause of justice, right, truth, and the people, they have deserved our admiration, increased, if possible, our confidence in their integrity and patriotism, and merited our warm approbation, our sincere and hearty thanks, and shall receive our earnest support.

"8. Resolved, That in all things wherein the national Administration sustain and carry out the principles of the Democratic party as expressed in the Cincinnati platform, and affirmed in these resolutions, it is entitled to, and will receive, our hearty support."

There the Democracy of Illinois, assembled in convention under the circumstances which I have stated, have, by a unanimous voice, declared that this constitution must be submitted to a direct vote of the people on its ratification or rejection, and that Kansas must never come in under it unless, on such a direct vote, at a fair election, the people shall decide in favor of admission under it. Under these circumstances, it will be seen that I stand now as I have stood during the whole session, with the Democracy of my own State, firmly, immovably, in favor of that great principle of popular sovereignty, which leaves the people perfectly free either to take the Lecompton constitution, or to take such other one as they may choose to make.

I have had appeals made to me from political friends, whom I respect and esteem, imploring me to yield this great principle on this question in consideration of so many concessions being made on the other side. Some of that glorious band of Democrats who have been acting with me on this question during the session have felt it their duty thus to yield, believing, as they think, that they have secured a substantial triumph in this great contest. Sir, I desire no personal triumph. I have not stood here for five months in conflict with men with whom I have acted a whole lifetime, struggling for a personal triumph. Hence because they have made concessions, that fact ought not to change my course unless those concessions are of such a nature as to give me the principles for which I contend.

If the object was to prove that the Lecompton men had backed down, and abandoned their original ground, I could parade the fact that at the opening of this session we were told that Kansas must come in under the Lecompton constitution unconditionally, or else that four States would secede from the Union. It was then to be an unconditional admission. After a while, upon reflection, upon investigation, the conclusion was arrived at that it was wise to put a clause in the bill in some way recognizing the right of the people of that State to change their constitution before 1864, although, according to my construction of its terms, it prohibited any change until that period. Here was a concession made, a great concession, a concession which I never could have made, on whichever side of the question I may have been, for the reason that I do not believe that Congress have any right to alter or construe authoritatively a State constitution.

It was not satisfactory to me to have Congress, in pursuance of the recommendation of the President, intervene and recognize, by any implication, the right of the people to change their State constitution in a manner different from that prescribed in the instrument itself. I deny the right of Congress to exercise any such power. I deny the right of Congress to intervene and authoritatively construe the constitution of a State. If the constitution was their act and deed; if it embodied their will; it was sacred, and it ought not to be touched by Congress in any respect whatever, except to receive it unconditionally, or reject it unconditionally. That concession was made; but still it did not reach the point which I had felt it my duty to make. It did not come to my principle. I do not claim that Senators are under any more obligation to come to me, than I am to go to them. I claim the right to determine for myself, according to my own judgment and my own conscience what my duty is to a great fundamental principle; and if Senators cannot bring the bill within the principle, I must exercise my right and duty of dissenting from it. I did not think that concession brought it within the principle, or obviated any of my objections. It only made the bill more obnoxious to me by violating another principle equally sacred in our political system, that of the sovereignty of the States.

Next came the declaration that the free-State Legislature was elected; and hence, if Kansas was forced into the Union with a pro-slavery constitution, against the will of her people, it would not last long, for the reason that there was a free-State Legislature, who would immediately take steps to change it and abolish slavery. That argument did not address itself favorably to my judgment, for the reason that it did not affect the principle involved. What difference did it make, so far as the principle was concerned, whether there was a majority of free-State men or a majority of pro-slavery men in that Legislature? What difference did it make to me, whether there was a majority of Democrats, or a majority of Republicans, or a majority of Americans in that Legislature, provided they were fairly and honestly elected? If the people of Kansas desired a pro-slavery Legislature they had a right to it. If they desired a Republican Legislature they had a right to it. If they desired an American Legislature they had a right to it. If they desired a Legislature purely Democratic, elected without reference to the question of slavery, it was their right to select such a one; and, sir, it was the duty of Mr. Calhoun to declare those elected who had received a majority of the legal votes, fairly and honestly returned. The declaration of that result could not change the principle involved in this discussion, for the great principle was, shall that people be left perfectly and entirely free to form and regulate their own institutions in their own way?

These various concessions could not control votes enough to carry the bill. What next? Then comes a disagreement between the two Houses of Congress. The Senate insisting upon the bill which it had passed for the admission of Lecompton unconditionally, except what is called the Green amendment; and the House insisting on the bill which it had passed as a substitute, known as the Crittenden-Montgomery bill. This committee of conference provide for a question of submission to the people, but what do they submit? The chairman of that committee of conference, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. GREEN] has informed you that the constitution is not submitted; the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTER], who was his colleague on the committee, has informed you that the constitution is not submitted; and I believe both of them have added that they would not vote for the bill if the constitution was submitted. I understand that similar declarations have been made in the other House of Congress by the members of the committee of conference there, showing that that was their understanding and their construction of this bill.

Then, if the constitution is not submitted; if the people are not allowed to vote for it or against it, freely, without a bounty on the one side or a penalty on the other, how can it be said that it comes within that great principle of popular sovereignty which, I insist, ought to be carried out in all the Territories? It is no answer to this objection to tell me that because men have conceded so much, I ought to concede. No matter how many and how great their concessions are, if they have not conceded the principle for which I contend, I cannot take what they propose. It is not for me to say whether these concessions are right or wrong, whether they are wise or unwise. It is enough for me that the principle for which I insist has not been clearly and distinctly recognized in this bill. I dislike the indirection by which the submission is proposed to be made—made to depend on a land grant. In order to compel the people of Kansas to reject the Lecompton constitution, you compel them to vote against a land grant, that every man, woman, and child in the Territory would desire to have. You will not allow them to take the land grant unless they take the constitution with it, and you will not allow them to proceed immediately and make a new constitution, with the same population, and have the same land grant, if they reject this. If you did that, then the principle would be fairly carried out, but unless you do allow that to be done, I insist that the principle is violated.

Now, Mr. President, I can say to you very frankly, that if there were two amendments made to this bill, although it would still be somewhat objectionable in its equivocal features, I could and would take great pleasure in giving it my support. One would be to strike out the land grant altogether, and the other to strike out the limitation as to population. Then the simple question presented to the people would be, will you come in under the Lecompton constitution or not? and if you do not, you may proceed immediately with the same population to make a new constitution. In that there would be perfect fairness; there would be no congressional intervention with its inducements to control the results. Or, if you wanted to leave the land grant in, why not make it applicable to the new constitution as well as the old one, as the Crittenden amendment did? Then they would get the same amount of land under the one as the other. In other words, if you wish to make this proposition fair, you must give Kansas the same land, under any new constitution she may form, as you do under this one, and you must allow her to come in with the same population under the one as under the other constitution. Then there would be fairness, then there would be equality.

I appeal to my friend from Virginia to know whether he, as a southern man, desires to see the principle of congressional intervention to control and influence the voting of the people carried out hereafter in the admission of new States? The time may come when the case will be reversed. The time may come when there will be an anti-slavery majority in both Houses of Congress. When that time comes, it may so happen that a bill may be brought forward with a land grant of ten million acres for a free State, and five million for a slave State, or allowing a free State to come in with a population of forty thousand, and providing that a slave State shall not come in without ninety thousand. Would our southern friends regard that as being a fair interpretation of the principle of popular sovereignty? Would they not say that was the most dangerous and unconstitutional system of intervention that was ever devised, when the Federal Government steps into the Territories, and by its bounties on one side, and its penalties on the other, attempts to influence and control the action of the people?

I do not regard this as a matter of much consequence to Kansas; I do not believe there is enough in this bounty, or enough in this penalty, to exercise any material influence upon the people of Kansas in this election; but it involves the great fundamental principle, it involves the principle of freedom of election, and it involves the great principle of self-government, upon which our institutions rest. With all the anxiety that I have had to be able to arrive at a conclusion in harmony with the overwhelming majority of my political friends in Congress, I could not bring my judgment or conscience to the conclusion that this was a fair, impartial, and equal application of the principle.

There is another objection to this proposition, one that looks badly upon its face. I take it for granted that it was intended to be fair and just; but it gives cause for apprehension, and will generate suspicion among the people that the election under it will not be, and cannot be, fair. I allude to the provision as to the board of commissioners. By the bill framed by the eminent Senator from Kentucky, and passed by the House of Representatives, there was to be a board of four commissioners to superintend the election on the constitution; two representing the people of the Territory, being the presiding officers of the two branches of the Legislature; the other two representing the Federal Government, being the Governor and Secretary appointed by the President and the Senate. In that way, two commissioners would necessarily be of one class of politics, and the other two of another class of politics. Under that state of the case, it is not probable that unfairness would have been perpetrated in the election. Under that board, as prescribed by the Senator from Kentucky, you would have the assurance from the very law itself that one half of the judges of election would belong to one party, and one half to the other; that one half of the clerks would belong to one, and one half to the other.

But how is it when you add a fifth member to the board, and provide that the board shall consist of five, the two presiding officers of the Legislature, and then the Governor, Secretary, and the district attorney, making three United States officers, and declare that three shall constitute the board? Is it not clear that if these three gentlemen choose, they can have all the judges of election and all the clerks of election and all the returning officers of one class of political faith, the same as Mr. Calhoun did at the elections which took place on the 21st of December and the first Monday of January? Does not the change in this respect give ground for apprehension that you may have the Oxford, the Shawnee, and the Delaware Crossing and Kickapoo frauds reenacted at this election? I should have been better satisfied if it had been left as the House bill left it, with the four commissioners, two from each political party in Kansas, two representing the Federal Government, two representing the people of the Territory, requiring three to be a quorum, thus rendering it impossible for partisan politics to control the action of the board. The very fact that it was deemed necessary or wise to change this feature, is to me a serious objection to this proposition.

Then, sir, what is my duty upon this question, under this state of the case? I have but one line of duty, and that is to vote against the bill; because, in my opinion, there is not a fair submission to the people under such circumstances as to insure an unbiased election and fair returns. I have indicated two amendments, which, if they had been made, would have enabled me to support this bill, notwithstanding other defects in it. I will indicate another. I am willing to subscribe to the principle that a Territory shall contain the requisite population for a member of Congress before admission, provided it is made a general law. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. PUGH] yesterday cited me as authority for that provision of this bill. He referred to my report, as chairman of the Committee on Territories, and the bill accompanying it, in 1856, in which I then provided that Kansas might proceed to form a constitution when she had the requisite population, to wit: ninety-three thousand four hundred and twenty, under the present ratio. That was my judgment then of the true rule upon the subject. He quotes also a proposition that I have brought in at this very session as a substitute for the Arizona bill, providing a general law that no Territory shall ever form a constitution and State government until it has the requisite population for a member of Congress. I am for that proposition now; and if Senators will consent to any arrangement by which you can strike out the whole of this bill, and, in lieu of it, insert a provision that neither Kansas, nor any other Territory of the United States, shall proceed to form a constitution and State government for admission into the Union until it has the requisite population for a member of Congress, according to the existing Federal ratio, I will give it my support.

But, sir, if I require it in Kansas, I wish to require it in other Territories; and if I am to apply that limitation to the new constitution that is to be made, I wish to apply it to the one that is in existence. I am not willing to prescribe one ratio to one kind of constitution, and another ratio to another kind. Make it uniform, and it can have my support. I have on all proper occasions indicated that as the proper rule—in 1856, as the Senator from Ohio proved; at this session again, as he proved yesterday by reading the bill offered by me; and I repeat now that, if you will strike out all of this bill but the clause that Kansas shall not come in until she has the requisite population for a member of Congress, and then say that this section is incorporated into and made part of the organic law of each of the Territories of the United States, and that none shall come for admission until they have that population, I will give it my support.

In other words, Mr. President, I desire to carry out the principle of leaving the people to decide for themselves in perfect fairness. I will support no rule applicable to the North that does not apply to the South. I will make no rule applicable to the South that I am not willing to apply to the North. I will not intervene either for slave constitutions or against slave constitutions by an act of Congress, holding out bounties on the one side or penalties on the other. Stand on the great principle of equality; leave each State on an exact footing with every other State; never inquire whether her institutions are of this character or that character; never inquire whether the State is in the North or in the South, and I will stand with you and apply the rule with exact justice and impartiality in every instance.

Mr. President, I say now, as I am about to take leave of this subject, that I never can consent to violate that great principle of State equality, of State sovereignty, of popular sovereignty, by any discrimination, either in the one direction or in the other. My position is taken. I know not what its consequences will be personally to me. I will not inquire what those consequences may be. If I cannot remain in public life, holding firmly, immovably, to the great principle of self-government and State equality, I shall go into private life, where I can preserve the respect of my own conscience under the conviction that I have done my duty and followed the principle wherever its logical consequences carried me.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I desire in a few words, and without making a speech, to assign the reasons why, if we are ever brought to a vote, I shall record mine in favor of this proposition. I must say in the outset that I do not like it; there are a great many reasons why I do not; but as I have brought my mind to the conclusion to vote for it, I shall not assign the reasons why I do not like it, but rather assign the reasons which influence me to vote in its favor.

The first is this: that we settle this question; and better on these terms, than leave it open. I can see if left open that it is to be made the fruitful source of discontent and strife, and of political turmoil perhaps for years to come. I can see how in very many ways it may endanger, seriously endanger the perpetuity of the Government itself. As long as the question is kept open it must continue to irritate the feelings of the people of the two sections of the Union. Until this question is settled you cannot begin to have a reconciliation on that great controversy which has been going on for years and years between the North and the South. This question is a thorn which rankles in the side of the nation. You must extract it or you can have no permanent peace. If I had no other reason for going for this bill, I would do it for that and that alone. It is a peace measure; it brings healing upon its wings; it brings the different sections of the country in closer neighborhood, in better fellowship.

How much is there in the bill, to forbid our taking it? First it is said by some of those who vote against it, that it is a submission of the Lecompton constitution to the people of Kansas. And then again others vote against it because it is not a submission. I mean to state my own views with perfect candor and with entire fairness. I do not understand it to be the submission of the constitution to the people, but I do understand this to be true, that you submit collateral questions—the land question, and others involved in the Kansas ordinance—to the people of Kansas; and that if in voting upon those questions they choose to determine that they will not come into the Union under the Lecompton constitution they have the right to do it.

They pass no judgment directly at the polls on the constitution, one way or the other, but each voter can control his own vote by his own reasons; and if he chooses, under cover of voting to sustain the ordinance, to vote against the whole constitution and against coming into the Union, he can do so; and if a majority take that view of the subject the State is not in the Union.

That much in fairness and candor, for thus stands the question if I properly comprehend it.

Now what just ground have we southern men to object to that? What just reason is there for our opposing it? We took the ground in the beginning, and maintain it now, that we would not and will not sustain a submission of this constitution to the people under the circumstances of its coming here. But we took the ground at the same time that we would not sanction this ordinance, making as it did exorbitant land demands upon the Government, and setting up other pretenses which had not been tolerated in the admission of other new States. From the beginning the friends of the Lecompton constitution struck at that ordinance, determined not to receive it, and not to give it their sanction. The original Senate bill declared that it was no part of the constitution, and could not be so recognized by Congress. After we made that declaration, I apprehend, if the bill had passed, it would have rested with Kansas to decide whether she would organize under the constitution or not; whether she would come into the Union, or be considered a member of it. You had stricken off her ordinance. You chose not to regard it as a part of the constitution. But did Kansas so regard it? She did not. You struck it off without her consent. She thought it a material part of her proposition.

Then was she in the Union? She was not, until, either by silent acquiescence in your action, or by some positive declaration of her own, she placed herself into the Union. I hold that if you had passed the regular Senate bill, and Kansas had refused to organize a State government under the Lecompton constitution, and under that bill, there would have been no power in this Government to force her, and therefore that she would not have been in the Union. She would not, because you had not met her proposition, and she had not accepted yours. Your minds had not agreed. She would not accept the proposition you had sent to her. You had changed her proposition so far as to strike off her ordinance, and she had not agreed to have it stricken off.

Then it rested with her to say whether she was in the Union or not; and what does this proposition amount to? It simply declares that Kansas may determine for herself whether she is in or out of the Union—a right which she had without your saying so; and which she would still have, whether you said so or not. You do not, by this declaration, confer any right on Kansas. You simply recognize a right which already exists, and which, if she chose, I repeat again, she could have exercised without your consent, just as well as with it. When this debate first opened, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. STUART] employed this language on this point: "They"—meaning the people of Kansas—"are arming; they are determined to resist an admission under this constitution, by any and every power with which God has clothed them; and yet we are to sit here and say, 'we admit you into the Union of the United States.' As well might you take a prisoner, under the sentence of a court of justice, handcuffed, with you officers surrounding him, by force to the prison, and say to him, 'there is no coercion; we admit you into the penitentiary.'"

I thought then, sir, and so declared, that there was no power to force Kansas into the Union. If she proposes to come in, and you accept her upon the terms which she proposes, then she is in, and she cannot recede. But if she proposes to come in, and you alter her proposition, then it depends upon her to say whether she accepts or rejects the alteration. That right, I repeat again and again, she has, whether you admit it or not.

To reduce it to a simple question of law, suppose you and I, Mr. President, have dealings in reference to an estate, and we agree upon the terms; I draw the bond or the deed, and attach to it a memorandum, or condition, or ordinance, explaining what I understand to be the meaning of the paper, how I expect to see it executed, and send it to you, and you sign it, but strike out the memorandum, or condition, or ordinance: I ask any lawyer whether the contract is binding on me until, either by silent acquiescence, as by proceeding to execute it, or by some positive declaration, I make it my own deed? Just so with Kansas. She sent you a constitution; she sent along with it her ordinance, the memorandum which explained the reasons why, and the terms upon which, she proposed to enter into the bargain, and become a member of the Union. You choose to strike the ordinance out; you choose to strike it from the constitution. Then I hold, as a simple legal proposition, she had a right to say, "you have changed the terms upon which I propose to come in; I will not come in; I choose entirely to recede from the proposition." It does not depend on you, sir, as one of the contracting parties, to say whether she shall recede or not; the right exists independent of you. If you meant to bind Kansas absolutely, you should have accepted her proposition in totidem verbis. You could not strike out what you did not like, stand by what you did like, and still insist that Kansas was bound by her proposition.

But, Mr. President, how am I to understand Senators? The Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS], who has just closed his speech; opened the session with an argument in favor of submitting this constitution to the people of Kansas for their reception or rejection; yesterday, in a colloquy with the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PUGH], he said no State ought to be admitted until she has the requisite population to entitle her to one Representative, and he repeated the declaration, with some qualification, to-day. Now, what does the bill before us propose? According to the argument of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. STUART] yesterday; according to the argument of the Senator from Illinois to-day; according to the argument of nearly all the gentlemen on the other side, this bill proposes to send back the constitution, and give the people of Kansas an opportunity to accept it or reject it, as they choose. It is true, the honorable Senator from Illinois says you put them under some sort of compulsion; but he does not pretend to deny that they will have the power to reject, under this submission, if they choose to do it. Then, if they do, what follows, according to this bill? That they shall not come into the Union until they have the ninety-three thousand four hundred and twenty population requisite to entitle them to one Representative under the existing ratio. And yet, Mr. President, when both these propositions are before us, one to submit the constitution for rejection or submission, as gentlemen argue, and the other to reject the State entirely until she has the requisite population—they being, in plain English, the two propositions of the Senator from Illinois himself, embodied in the same bill—he rejects them both. In the name of popular sovereignty, he rejects two of his own propositions, either of which he thinks would be just to the people.

Under this bill, as I have admitted, and as other Senators have claimed in broader language than I have, the people of Kansas may, if they choose, accept or reject the Lecompton constitution. The Senator thinks they ought to have a right to reject it or accept it; or, if that be denied them, that the people be authorized to form a State constitution only when they have the full ratio of representative population. Very well; this bill takes both horns of the dilemma; and yet the Senator rejects it. For myself, I am free to say, I hope the people of Kansas will, if this bill passes, adhere to their ordinance, and insist on remaining out of the Union. If they come in they must come in under the Lecompton constitution; if they stay out they must stay until they have the population to entitle them to one Representative in Congress. That suits me. I close in with that offer.

But, says the Senator from Illinois, this land grant is a bounty held out to the people of Kansas to accept this constitution—a bribe, as it has been elsewhere termed. How, sir? It reduces the amount of the grant claimed in the ordinance by more than twelve million acres. The Senator from Michigan, in a carefully prepared table, which he introduced into his speech delivered on December 23d last, shows that the whole grant was upwards of sixteen million acres; that the railroad grant alone was upwards of seven millions. I understand from the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. GREEN], who brought forward this bill, that he has had a calculation made, and that the grant proposed for all purposes is about four million acres. And yet when you reduce the grant from sixteen millions to four millions, the Senator from Illinois comes forward and says that is a bribe held out to these people to accept the constitution. It is a queer way of bribing them to offer twelve million acres of land less than they claimed in their ordinance.

Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, I am willing to deal fairly with this young State. I have dealt, so far as my vote went, fairly with other States in reference to these grants; but I never saw the moment, from the first introduction of this constitution down to the present time, when I would have conceded to Kansas all that the ordinance attached to her constitution claimed for her. She had no right to set up any such claim. And if it be called compulsion, as the Senator has intimated, to refuse admission to this State unless she will yield her exorbitant demands, I deny it. If it be said that in one sense this is a bribe, and in another sense it is an attempt to coerce Kansas, I deny as much the one as the other. It is no bribe, for the reason I have shown you. It is no compulsion, because Kansas has no more right than other States have had to make these exorbitant demands. Why, sir, if she can claim sixteen million acres, and say she will not come into the Union unless she gets it, why cannot she with the same propriety claim sixty or one hundred million acres of your lands, or claim them all? She may justly claim to the outer verge all that has been granted to the other young States, but she can claim nothing more. Whatever she gets beyond that must be by the grace of Congress, and not because she has a right to demand it. I simply protest that it is no compulsion to say to Kansas, "we refuse your demands; if you are not willing to come in as other States have come, then stay out."

I shall be glad, Mr. President, to see this question settled on the terms proposed in the present bill, although, as I said, I do not like the terms. I suppose no southern Senator does; very few northern men do; but I have been so accustomed to vote for things that I do not precisely like, that I have no great trouble in bringing my mind to the conclusion that I ought to vote for this. If I voted for nothing except that which I think precisely right, which commended itself in all respects to my judgment, I should be found on the negative side of most of your propositions. I believe that this measure will have a tendency to heal pending difficulties; that it will bring peace and quiet, to some extent, to the country; that it will open the way for a permanent and lasting peace between the sections; and, if it have that effect, objectionable as it may be to me in many of its features, I shall feel justified in voting for it. If it fail in all this, I shall justify myself to my own conscience and the country on the ground that I so meant it—that it was so designed. If it fail of its objects, that will not be my fault. It is as good a proposition as the original Senate bill. Nothing so good can now be obtained. It will do for all sections of the country—for the South as well as for the North; and it is not decidedly bad for either.

The features of this bill have, in many respects, been changed from the original Senate bill; but I have not seen that they have been changed for the worse; I rather think they have been improved. We have certainly got clear of some objectionable points, and we have brought into bolder relief others that are bad, but which a close observer would have found in the original. On the whole, for the reasons I have given, and for others, which the time and place and surrounding circumstances forbid me to give, I shall vote for the bill; and I send up my devoutest prayers that it may pass.

Mr. TOOMBS. Mr. President, as it is the very obvious purpose of the Senate, I suppose, not to take this vote until there is action elsewhere, I shall occupy a few minutes of its time in giving the reasons why I approve the action of the committee of conference. It is in no wise distasteful to me. I heartily approve it; I think it is a wise measure—a good measure. I like it because it settles this question upon a principle, and not on a concession. It is a concession by nobody, by no section of the Union; but it settles this question upon principles which I have maintained from the beginning of the controversy. It is not subject to two interpretations. To suppose so is an imagination of its opponents, and their very difficulty in finding reasons for their opposition to it has strengthened my own opinion in its favor. I believe the cabal, the coalition, took about three days to determine whether they should go for or against it. I very much regret that they did not come to a determination to maintain it, because it is based upon principle.

The idea has been suggested, I believe, first by my honorable friend from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] and then fallen into generally by those who coöperate with him in this opposition, that that is capable of two interpretations; that it is a submission, and not a submission. Now, Mr. President, the bill itself is clear, plain, and distinct, and admits of no two interpretations. Kansas proposed to the Congress of the United States to come into the Union under a constitution made at Lecompton, and upon the further condition that we should grant to her certain land bounties, among others, seventeen millions for the completion of railroads. We entered into this discussion for and against the Lecompton constitution. The friends of that constitution, those who supported the measure, the friends of the Administration, held that the Lecompton constitution was the legally and fairly-expressed will of the people of Kansas. Therefore we accepted it; we accepted it in the measure which we sent to the other House; we accept it in this measure. We do not put that in controversy. We stand upon the ground that it was legally adopted; that it was the legal expression of the popular will of Kansas; and we in no wise disturb that. We simply say to Kansas, who is treating with us here as an equal, as a sovereign, we accept your constitution as fully and freely as we have that of any other of your sisters who have come into this Union. We decline to interpret it. We deny all these allegations of its fraud, or its force, or its violence; we put them under our feet, and we say we accept it as your act and deed. We say it is the emanation of your people; that it is the fair exercise of the popular sovereignty of the people of Kansas. You did not choose to submit it to the people. Your convention adopted it, promulgated it—except as to the one clause which you did submit, and that was accepted by the people. Hence we receive it as the act of the people. We have laid out of the account wholly the ten thousand, or twenty thousand, or fifty thousand—if there were so many—who did not vote. We care not whether any of the people declined to act when the question was legally submitted to them; whether they voted or not. We hold they were bound by the action of the legal voters who did perform their duty as citizens.

For these reasons, the Senate of the United States accepted that constitution. We sent our bill accepting it to the other House. They put in a proposition to submit it, the House of Representatives assuming, and the other side declaring, that it was possibly fraudulent; that there were allegations of fraud against it; that it was not the popular will. They sent the bill back to us, declaring that the constitution should be submitted to the people. We rejected that proposition. The two Houses agreed to a conference on their disagreeing votes. This committee of conference then declared that they would accept the Lecompton constitution as fully as the Senate accepted it in their bill; but the very offer of this Lecompton constitution to the United States by Kansas, was coupled with a further condition demanding the ordinary grants of lands given to the new States, and seventeen millions besides. What have this committee done? They have said we accept the Lecompton constitution; we pass no judgment upon that, we leave that where the Senate's bill left it, as your act and deed, and properly reflecting the legally-expressed will of the people of Kansas; but we will not give you the seventeen millions of land for railroads; we will give you what we have given your other sisters. What, then, are the legal consequences and effect of this declaration? Precisely those of the Senate's bill, because the Senate's bill accepted only a part of the proposition, and rejected the rest. It does not vary the land granted by that bill one acre—not one nineteenth part of a hair. We said, we will not give you the land you ask. Your proposition is, "Receive me into the Union with this constitution, with the ordinary lands granted to the States, and with seventeen million besides." The Senate said, we will not give you these seventeen millions.

When this question was under debate some month or two ago, the honorable Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] stated that we had not a right to vary the propositions at all, that the ordinance as to land must go with the constitution. I differed with him in that statement. In my judgment the constitution was the business of the people of Kansas. The land and the boundary were our business as well as theirs—matters of contract between equals; and therefore, if we varied the boundary, or varied the proposition in any shape, the contract would not be complete until the other side acted.

Mr. DOUGLAS. On the statement now made by the Senator from Georgia, we understand the matter exactly alike. I agree you could not vary the proposition unless you sent it back to them to ratify the change.

Mr. TOOMBS. I am happy to know that we agree in that respect. That is my own position. I hold that; but I did not understand the Senator before as going to the extent that they had to accept it before the contract became binding. That was my position then, it is mine to-day. We accept part of the proposition of Kansas; we accept her constitution, and we accept the call for the ordinary grant of land; we reject the extraordinary land grant of seventeen million acres. Well, if the Senate's bill had passed, "Lecompton," as it is sometimes called, without one word of dissent, except striking out the seventeen million acres, she would not have been in the Union without the acquiescence of her people in that change. If she had organized her State government under the constitution, after our act of admission in that form, it would, according to the general practice hitherto, be an acquiescence; but her proposition being changed, she could not come into the Union without an agreement to or an acquiescence on her part in the change.

That would have been the result of the Senate's bill. Kansas could have rejected it. She made an offer. We rejected her offer in part. We made her a proposition. She could have rejected that; and where would the parties have been then? She would have been where she was—in a territorial condition. There is where the Senate's bill would have placed her. If the convention had placed the power in the Legislature to regulate this matter of the land grant, as Arkansas did, the committee would have put it there as being the most convenient tribunal; or if the convention had reserved to itself the power it might have been put there; but as the constitution of Kansas has made no provision for anybody else adjusting these rights of sovereignty, (for the grants are given in consideration of yielding the sovereign power of taxation,) as the people have not delegated it to anybody in their constitution, the committee very wisely sent it to the source of all power—the people themselves. The consequences are identically the same as though we had passed the Lecompton bill with or without the amendment of the gentleman who introduced it, usually called the Green amendment. It is not in the slightest degree varied, nor is there any dispute about it, nor are there any two constructions about it.

I will allude now to the only point which gentlemen attempt to torture into double-dealing in this bill. My honorable friend from Illinois supposes it will be represented one way at the South and another at the North. I know of no way in the world to prevent partisans—the vicious and the vile demagogue and deceiver of the people—from doing that in respect to any measure. My honorable friend knows that the bill of his, which I supported with so much pleasure in 1854, met with the same fate, though there was a perfect agreement among every one of its friends here.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The distinction between the cases is obvious. That bill provided that where there was a difference of opinion it should be decided as a judicial question. Here there is no arbitrator made in this bill in regard to Kansas.

Mr. TOOMBS. I do not understand the Senator.

Mr. DOUGLAS. All questions relating to personal liberty and slave property were referred to the Supreme Court of the United States by the bill of 1854, to which the Senator alludes.

Mr. TOOMBS. That was not the clause. The great clause was what was called the stump speech that was injected into its bowels. It was contended by its enemies that it had a different meaning at the North and at the South. It had not. It was universally accepted by its friends with the same meaning everywhere, as far as I am informed; and I never knew two constructions put upon it by them. Again and again, however, it was reiterated here, and the enemies of the measure did so construe it. Of course, the enemies of a measure will always do that, especially if it involves a sectional issue. Oftentimes arguments will be used to make a measure, which is even a just settlement, palatable to one section or the other, which are construed to present it in different forms. Everybody understands, however, that we, having varied this proposition by striking out the seventeen million acres of land, simply say to the people of Kansas, will you come into the Union with your constitution as it is? We do not alter that; we accept that part of your proposition, and we give you the ordinary grant of land, but we will not give you the extra seventeen million acres that you claim. If they will not agree to this, what is the consequence? The bargain is at an end, of course the constitution fails, the ordinary grant fails, and she is in a territorial condition.

Gentlemen seek to torture that into a submission of the constitution. Undoubtedly the effect of a rejection by the people of Kansas of our proposed alteration of their proposition, annuls the whole contract; and is not that the case in similar transactions every day between man and man? You make me an offer to sell me a piece of land; you say I may have it for $10,000 upon two years' time. I say I will give you that, but I want five years. You reject the five years; there is no dispute between us about the price; but the whole contract falls. Kansas is treating with us as an equal contracting party; she offers to come into the Union on certain terms; and we accept a portion and reject others. Then if she says, "I will not come in under the modified terms," the whole contract falls, and that is the way the constitution falls. It is a mode, a fair and legitimate mode, an irresistible mode, a mode that would exist whether you submitted it or not, because, I say, when you varied the contract, even under the Lecompton bill as it went from this House, it was the right of Kansas to reject it, and if she had rejected it she would have been where this bill proposes to place her in that contingency, in a territorial condition.

This objection comes from the opponents of this bill; they are sorry that this is one of the results of the proposed action. I am not. If it be true that the people of Kansas do not like this constitution, if it be true that those who are in rebellion may go to the polls and vote it down, when we only submit a proposition for a change of the lands the people asked, they may have what reasons for their vote they please. I do not object to it because they may give a vote upon a wrong reason. They might have done that under the Senate's bill; they may do that under any bill, for you cannot force a State into this Union, you cannot bring her in except on terms to which she agrees, and I say that naturally results in all treaties with equals, with sovereigns, and with citizens. If you make a contract and the other party makes a substantial variation, unless that variation is agreed to by both, it annuls the whole. That is the simple fact about this contract. The rejection of the constitution may be one of the consequences of it, I know, but it has no double meaning; it is not pretended by any friend of the bill, North or South, that we submit the constitution. We accept the Lecompton constitution as the will of the people of Kansas, and we accept a part of their other proposition by which their constitution is accompanied, to wit: that she shall have the same quantity of lands that Minnesota had; but we reject that clause of her proposition by which she claims seventeen million acres.

Now we are told, by the Senator from Illinois, and other Senators, that here is a bribe and a threat. Our bribe is, striking off seventeen million acres of lands that she asked to come in. Our threat is, proposing to leave her, if she rejects our proposition, just as she would be if we had no bill. That is a fair statement of the case. Our bribe, I repeat, is, striking out the seventeen million acres of land that she demanded, with Lecompton. If we had given her the seventeen million acres of land, an unusual and extraordinary grant to a State coming into the Union, which never had been made before, you and I know, and all the country knows, that a clamor would have gone up from here to Canada, throughout this broad land to the Pacific ocean, "See, these slave-drivers give these people seventeen millions of acres of land, this extraordinary grant, to make them take slavery in their constitution!" But we strike it out; we put her precisely on the same basis with other States; and now, because we tell her that if she does not come in at this time, she shall not come until she has the requisite population, it is attempted to be tortured into a threat! I suppose this idea never would have occurred to the people in Kansas, or to anybody but persons who were hunting for objections. Everybody knows that when Kansas is admitted, no matter at what time, she will get the same land that other States have had. The bill does not prohibit it; and, I suppose, it would never be imagined but by some politician who was seeking for a pretext, when he could not find a reason.

The Senator from Illinois says that he is willing to agree to the principle of not allowing a State to be admitted until she has ninety-three thousand people, or a sufficient number for one member, according to the ratio. He voted for it, and so did I; and when, two years ago, I introduced a bill to solve this difficulty by bringing her into the Union then, I declared, from my seat here, that it was a violation of a principle. This is the general rule. I supposed the then condition of the country made Kansas an exceptional case; I put it exclusively on the ground of an exceptional case; I was really desirous of pacifying the country on this question. We have labored to do it. The Administration has labored to do it; the Democratic party has labored to do it; but a majority of the people of Kansas, it seems, or at least a large portion of them, taking their counsels from the Opposition, have, even to the extent of refusing to vote, used all the means in their power to prevent it. Well, what do we say now? "We accept your constitution—it is your act; we give you the ordinary grant of land; but if you do not wish to come in, we remit you to the general rule"—that is all. The Senator from Illinois says that general rule is a right rule, and we ought never to depart from it. It is one from which Congress has not usually departed, and which never ought to be departed from, except under extraordinary circumstances. As a general rule, it is a sound one; but there may be exceptions to all rules. When I proposed to depart from it, I was acting for Kansas, endeavoring to pacify her, and also endeavoring to take this question, which was a disturbing and dangerous element, out of the politics of the United States. That was not agreed to; but Kansas, acting in the spirit of that proposition, has presented herself for admission. I say to her I will accept the constitution you have made; I will give you the ordinary land grants; but I will not allow you to make constitutions every six months. The conduct of the population of Kansas has been such as not at all to increase my estimate of their capacity for self-government. It would be sufficient for me, even after having voted for it, in 1856, to say now that the events of the last two years have convinced me that she ought not to be admitted as a State. I apply this remark to all; I do not apply it to the free-State men more than to others. There have been wars, and tumults, and frauds, and cheatings, and a disposition manifested everywhere in that Territory totally to disregard the law. If one party get a Legislature, they turn everybody else out, no matter which party it is; and a majority of one is as good as a unanimous vote. There seems to be an incapacity in this population, thrown in there, I admit, under the most unfortunate circumstances, to govern themselves; and I am free to acknowledge that I shall not regret if one consequence of this measure shall be to put them back in a territorial condition.

Then where is the concession by the North? None. Neither the Senator from Illinois, nor any other person here, denies that the people speak finally through a convention. The people of Kansas have done it. We accept the act of this convention; we accept a portion of her proposition for lands, and we tell her that we do not accept the rest, and we submit to her a modified proposition, in place of her proposed contract in regard to lands. If, for any reason you please, you refuse to take this modification of the contract, whether it be because you do not like the Lecompton constitution or not, we take it that you do not want to come into the Union now. If you refuse to take the proposition which we submit to you, the contract falls, constitution and all.

I say, therefore, we do not submit the constitution. One of the necessary consequences of the modification of the proposition, however, is, that if she votes against it, she is in a territorial condition, and we require her to stay there exactly the time which it is conceded all around the Senate the general rule would require. To this general rule I have heretofore uniformly adhered, and declared my convictions of its propriety. We say you shall stay as every other Territory ought to stay, and not bring two Senators into this body, and one member into the other House, until you have a population sufficient under the Federal Constitution to entitle you to a Representative according to the existing ratio. That is all there is in it.

The South, then, has made no concessions of any sort, and the North has made none. The clamor of cramming constitutions down free people's throats is at an end. Ilinc lachrymæ—hence these tears! They wanted the cramming process. Although the result everybody knew would be the same with the people of Kansas, still it would have been a very available argument on the rostrum; but that is gone. Now, they say, it is true it is gone; but it is not gone in the right way. That seems to be the objection of the Opposition. It is true the people may say we will not take this modification; we will not come in unless with the seventeen millions; but I can assure my friends I will not give them the seventeen million acres. We have not seized eagerly at this bait; we have not given them this bribe to bring in a slave State. If we were disposed to do what we are charged with, we have acted the most foolish part any sensible men ever did. If we wanted to bribe them, we would have stood by Lecompton, ordinance, and all, and given them the seventeen million acres; but we cut off the ordinance and give them only what we have given Minnesota and all the other States coming into this free sisterhood. Now, I apprehend that but for the commitments of gentlemen, but for political reasons, but for the strength of the coalition looking to the other thirty-one States, not to this new sister, but to its effect outside of Kansas, there would be very little difference between us on this question. We cannot alter this constitution if we would. We do not wish to take any advantage in this mode of submission. Inasmuch as Kansas, instead of offering us a simple constitution, proposed other terms and conditions, we had to accept them, as the Senator from Illinois admits, in their entirety, or if we modify them, she has the power to reject them. That is all there is in this proposition. You did it in Michigan. You did it in Wisconsin. You did it in Iowa. In Iowa you rejected her application on the question of boundary, which is no stronger than this, because here the point is whether Congress, in consideration of the new State giving up her power of taxation, the highest power of a sovereign, over the public lands, and over those lands you grant to others for a brief time, will make a grant of lands such as has been made to other States, and give her seventeen million acres more to make railroads. I say to her, you must release your sovereignty in this respect; and you have no right to demand of this sisterhood of States more lands, more pecuniary advantages for releasing this sovereign power, than each of the other eighteen new States that have come into the Union had. We will give you that and no more. Thus we offer her no bribe.

So far from holding out to her a threat, we leave her just where you would leave her by defeating the measure—in a territorial condition; and in a territorial condition under the sound principle that she ought not to come here unless you can show her to be an exceptional case, with less than the number prescribed by the Federal ratio for one Representative.

For these reasons, Mr. President, I say that I have no reluctance in voting for this proposition. I do not vote for it as a compromise or concession, but I here state there is in it no concession by the North or by the South, but a present settlement, firmly based upon a broad, right, ever enduring, constitutional principle; and as such it not only meets my acquiescence, but my hearty concurrence.

Mr. HALE. I wish to ask the Senator from Georgia a question: he says it is proposed to submit this back to the people of Kansas because there is a modification of their land proposition, and it is necessary to submit it because it is modified. My question is, why the first Senate bill did not send it back, for that modified the proposition equally with this, but still that admitted the State without resubmission?

Mr. TOOMBS. That is true; but, as I stated, the consequences would have been the same, with or without submission. I do not think this submission necessary to be put in the bill; but, according to the original Senate bill, without its being nominated in the bond, Kansas could reject it, as Arkansas and Iowa did. It might have been there without objection from me; I thought it was proper to put it there; but in the case of Arkansas, the convention had authorized the Legislature to accept a modification of the land terms, and hence Congress referred that to the Legislature. In the other case it was referred to the people of Iowa, and Iowa rejected it, and made a new constitution subsequently. I say that if it was not there, the consequences would be the same as though it were there; and I should not have objected to it if it had been in the original Senate bill. The legal consequences would be the same whether it was there or not.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. Toombs] tells us that the cry of cramming the Lecompton constitution down the throats of the people of Kansas is at an end. It is to go down by another process now. This measure is a conglomeration of bribes, of penalties, and of mediated fraud. Lecompton is not to be crammed down now; it is to be bribed down, and to be cheated down, and this proposition provides for both of these alternatives. It goes to the people of Kansas with a bribe in one hand and a penalty in the other; and, if bribes and threats will not win, you have provided that fraud shall.

But the Senator from Georgia starts a new proposition here to-day, one we shall all give him the credit of originating; and that is, that if we had admitted Kansas into the Union under the Senate Lecompton bill, that we fought over so long, she would not have been in the Union as a member of this Confederacy, because we did not agree to her proposition for seventeen million acres of the public lands. Sir, why did we not hear of this when the question was before the Senate? For more than four months we have sat here babbling over this Lecompton constitution, and no man in the Senate or the House of Representatives, and no public press of the country, no public man of the country, no human being on God's earth ever dreamed, or ever uttered the dream, that Kansas would not be a member of this Union if the bill to admit her under the Lecompton constitution should pass.

Sir, as we were about to take the last vote in the Senate upon the bill for the admission of Kansas, I called the attention of the Senate to the certificate of John Calhoun, certifying that the ordinance claiming these lands was adopted by the people as a part of the constitution. A brief debate sprang up upon that point. The Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PUGH], who yesterday addressed the Senate for nearly two hours upon matters pertaining to the general affairs of Kansas, said, on that occasion, that,

"There has scarcely ever been a new State admitted into this Union that did not, in its ordinance, claim more public lands than Congress ever gave it. I never knew Congress to grant it in any case. It is not a part, it cannot be made a part, of the constitution, no matter what Mr. Calhoun certifies. That does not affect its legal force. It is a question of the gift of the public lands. There is no case, from the admission of Ohio to this day, in which a new State has not asked more lands than Congress has given. The attempt to make a mountain out of this molehill will certainly fail."

The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BENJAMIN] said that this proposition was only a proposition for a bargain—a proposition made by Kansas for a bargain for public lands; that "this pretended right of taxation had never been yielded by Congress, and never would be yielded." He said:

"The idea of one of the States of this Union taxing the property of the Government of the United States within its limits is one which has been frequently advanced by the new States with a view to extort from Congress an additional grant of land. It never yet has been conceded, and never will."

Sir, there was not a man here in the Senate, not one who claimed that if Kansas was admitted under the Lecompton constitution, she would have the seventeen million acres of public lands. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. GREEN] offered an amendment, and it was adopted without division by the Senate; and it expressed the unanimous judgment of this body and of Congress:

"That nothing in this act shall be construed as an assent by Congress to any or all of the propositions or claims contained in the ordinance annexed to said constitution."

Here was a special provision put into the bill, that nothing in the act should be deemed or taken as an assent to any of the provisions of the ordinance, and that provision passed by the unanimous voice of the Senate. This was a repudiation by the Senate of the claim of any right on the part of Kansas to tax the public lands. I declare here and now that this pretense that Kansas would not be a member of the Confederacy if the original Senate bill had passed Congress, is an afterthought. It is a doctrine avowed here to-day for a special purpose, to have a special effect in the country, and there is not a man in the Senate of the United States, or the Congress of the United States, or on the soil of this Republic, who believes there is anything in it. It is the merest pretense.

The proposition that comes to us from the committee of conference had its origin with men who for four months have sat in council with us here in resisting this attempt of the Administration to force the Lecompton constitution through Congress. It comes from men who were pledged by all that binds honorable men to stand by the proposition made by the honorable Senator from Kentucky, to vote to sustain that proposition, to resist a committee of conference, and to defeat the measure for the admission of Kansas into the Union under this Lecompton swindle. Sir, we read in Holy Writ that "the ox knoweth his owner, and the ass his master's crib," and we have had these words illustrated in this case. The asses have found their master's crib, and the oxen have recognized their owner. This report comes to us under a false and lying pretense. Yes, sir, a false and lying pretense. There is no controversy in regard to the public lands between the Federal Government and the Territory of Kansas, none whatever. From the adoption of the Lecompton constitution by the convention on the 7th of November last, up to the framing of this proposition, there was not a man in America who believed that there was anything in this ordinance but a mere proposition for a bargain. Nobody believed the Congress of the United States would accept it, and if Congress rejected it, there was an end of it, for Congress has never put, until this proposition was made, the question in controversy of the rights of the States to tax the public lands of the United States. It has been settled by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, that the States have no right to tax the property of the United States. That principle is almost as old as this Government, and yet this well-defined and settled principle is now to be submitted to the decision of the people of Kansas; a doubt for the first time is raised, and this is the basis on which you have trumped up this proposition!

I have said that this is a proposition to bribe the people of Kansas. The Senator from Georgia tells us that it is no bribe. Now, I say to the Senator that it offers a positive and direct bribe of hundreds of thousands of dollars to the people of Kansas, to come into the Union now under the Lecompton constitution. There are eighty million acres of land in the Territory of Kansas. We have sold none of those lands, or next to none of them. Hundreds of thousands of acres of these lands have been taken up by actual settlers. Your Government has advertised hundreds of thousands of acres to be sold in July next. The best of the lands of the Territory of Kansas have been taken up under your preemption laws, but they have not yet been paid for.

Now, this scheme offers to Kansas, if it comes into the Union under the Lecompton constitution, five per cent. of the proceeds of all the lands that may be sold. If she comes into the Union between now and the 1st day of July next, she has five per cent. on the proceeds of the immense quantities of the public lands to be sold in that Territory. That will amount, I think, to millions of dollars; and that poor Territory, without money, without means, is offered five per cent. on the sales of all the public lands if she will come into the Union with the Lecompton constitution; and if not, she is to stay out, these lands are to be sold, and she is to have no five per cent. of their proceeds. Here is a positive, direct bribe offered, amounting to hundreds of thousands of dollars, for Kansas to come into the Union at once, before her public lands are brought into the market, and sold at all; and yet the Senator from Georgia recklessly asserts here in the face of this fact, before the Senate and the country, that there is no bribe offered to the people of Kansas to take this abhorred constitution.

That is not all. You are offering this people something like four million five hundred thousand acres of land to come into this Union under this constitution. In answer to that, we are told that the honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CHITTENDEN] made the same proposition. He did, but his proposition did not stand in the form of a bribe. It applied to the Lecompton constitution, if they took that; it applied to the new constitution to be made, if they took that. It was a fair, honest proposition, and could have had no effect whatever on the decision of the people. It was a proposition that came from an honest man, and was supported by honest men, and met the approbation of honest men. This is a proposition put in the form of a bribe, for it is, "have this land if you take Lecompton;" and if they do not take Lecompton, it does not say a word about what they shall have when they make another constitution. It is a temptation to the public men of that Territory to come in now and have the control of these public lands, and everybody knows how anxious men in this country, especially in the new States, are to obtain control over immense tracts of public lands.

Consider, now, sir, the penalties you propose to inflict upon these people. Every member of the Senate who has studied the affairs of Kansas, knows that there is a sentiment in that Territory, approaching unanimity, in favor of coming into the Union at once. The sentiment of all the people of that Territory is, to come into the Union now, to be a member of this Confederacy. Their interests, all they have and all they hope to be, prompt them to come into the Union now to share its blessings and its benefits. But what do you propose here? You give them five per cent. on the sales of their lands, if they will come in now. If they stay out, they lose five per cent. on all their lands sold until they do come in, and if they stay out one or two years millions of acres of the very best lands will be sold, and they get no benefit from the sales. Then you offer them four and a half million acres of land. This proposition addresses itself with immense force to the governing men of that Territory, and to the people, for they are for public schools. These lands may, and will be, given at some future time when they do come in; but the operating force of this proposition presses upon them now. You hold up the bribe in their faces now, and appeal to them to accept it; but if they do not come in now, they are to be kept out. They want to be in the Union; you keep them out unless they will come in under the Lecompton constitution that they have condemned by ten thousand popular majority. You punish them by putting this penalty upon them.

Well, Mr. President, I believe the people of Kansas will vote down this Lecompton constitution by an overwhelming majority. I do not believe you can buy that people with this five per cent. on their public lands, or by four and a half millions of her eighty million acres of lands. You have tried to force them—you have failed. Now you propose to bribe them. I have the fullest confidence that you will ignominiously fail in that. You believed it. The man who framed this measure believed the people would reject it, and he prepared this measure to carry it through by fraud, and he intended that. Yes, sir, I charge it directly that the getters-up of this proposition expected the people of Kansas to defeat it, and they intended to put it in the power of the Lecomptonites to carry it by fraud. If corruption will not win, fraud is to win.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, [Mr. BIGGS in the chair.] The Chair would suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts, that in his opinion it is not exactly in order to charge the conference committee with an intention to commit fraud. I merely suggest it respectfully to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. GREEN. I am one of the parties to whom it applies, of course, but I do not think the country will think me at all degraded by the accusation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair merely made the suggestion respectfully.

Mr. WILSON. I thank the Chair for the suggestion he has so kindly made; but I have made no charge which I do not believe to be true in substance. I believe the man who got up this corrupt proposition, the man who has betrayed the cause of Kansas and the friends of Kansas, framed this measure so as to secure the power to the friends of the Lecompton constitution to carry it through by their fraudulent practices.

Mr. President, the veteran Senator from Kentucky proposed a measure to which we gave our ready support. We Republicans believe in the power and duty of this Government to prohibit slavery in all the Territories of the United States. We believed the Lecompton constitution was not the sentiment, the will, of the people of Kansas. If we had possessed the power we would have voted it down and crushed it under our feet; we would then have given an enabling act to the people of Kansas, and said to them, "frame a constitution, submit it to the popular vote, and then come here and ask for admission into the Union." But, sir, we were in a minority in this body and in the other House; we were utterly powerless. We believed that the people were opposed to the Lecompton constitution; we had no doubt of that. We believed that if they could have a fair vote, they would vote it down. The Senator from Kentucky made a speech condemning in burning language this Lecompton fraud. He made a speech that has been read with tearful eyes by tens of thousands of men all over this country—men who differ from him in sentiment and opinion—a speech that has won their love and their confidence. While living, he will have their affectionate regards, and when he sleeps beneath the soil of his own Kentucky, he will live in their memory. He made a fair proposition; that proposition was, to submit the Lecompton constitution to a direct, fair, and honest vote of the people. If they wanted it they would take it, and they were in the Union. If they did not want Lecompton, they were authorized to make, at once, another constitution, and, on proclamation of the President, they were to come into the Union. Could we, as liberty-loving men—the friends of making Kansas a free State—hesitate to accept this proposition made in good faith by the Senator from Kentucky?

I admit, sir, that we subjected ourselves to the risk of letting a slaveholding constitution, the creature of fraud, come into the Union, but we had the best evidence that the people of Kansas were against it, and that if they had a fair opportunity they would vote it down by a crushing majority. Our friends in that Territory have the county officers. We have the sheriffs; we have the ballot-boxes; they are all in the hands of the free-State men. The Senator from Kentucky, knowing that we did not desire to avail ourselves of this advantage of having the territorial officers, made this proposition—and a fairer proposition could not be made—that the Governor and Secretary, appointed by the President, and removable at his will, and the President of the Council, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives representing the popular will of the Territory, should be appointed a board of commissioners, and that three of this board thus constituted shall form a quorum. We Republicans accepted that as a fair and honest proposition. We knew that the appointees of the President could not control that board; we knew that the men who had defrauded the people of Kansas could not control it; we knew that the board could not be organized for dishonest purposes. We believed that a board thus constituted would promptly appoint a proper time, and fix upon proper places to hold the election, and that proper men would be selected to conduct the election. We knew that under a board thus constituted your Hendersons, your Diefendorffs, your McLeans, your Calhouns; the men who cheated us at Kickapoo, at the Delaware Crossing, at Oxford, and at Shawnee; that the men who took the returns over into Missouri and added names by the hundreds to the returns; the men who have spent, many of them, the winter under the shadow of the Capitol, away from the bitter condemnation of the people whom they have betrayed and defrauded; we knew that these corrupt creatures who have defrauded the people at the ballot-box, and taken false oaths in regard to election returns; who have buried returns by night in candle-boxes, under a wood-pile, and under the ground, and then sworn that they had sent them out of the Territory; we knew that those corrupt and venal creatures who, during the last few months, have taken shelter here in the capital, where rascals have recently so much congregated, would not be appointed by the board constituted by the Senator from Kentucky. We believed that the board appointed under that proposition would choose as election officers to preside over the ballot-boxes, men of all parties, in whom the people would have confidence, and that the frauds which have been so often committed during the last ten months at Oxford, Shawnee, Kickapoo, Delaware Crossing, and other precincts; would not be repeated, and that we should have a fair and honest expression of the popular will. I avow here to-day, that a fairer proposition was never made than was made by the Senator from Kentucky, and which was adopted substantially by the House of Representatives, under the lead of Mr. MONTGOMERY, of Pennsylvania.

Here is a sort of feeble imitation of that proposition. Senators tell us that it does not submit the Lecompton constitution to the people of Kansas, that it only submits certain propositions in regard to the public lands. It submits the inducements to come into the Union; it holds out the glittering bribe in the one hand and the threat in the other, and as if this would not accomplish their purpose they have added the district attorney to the board of commissioners. They offer to the people of Kansas five per cent. of the proceeds of all the lands to be sold; they offer them four and a half million acres; and then unless that people take Lecompton they propose to keep them out of the Union under any constitution, without these lands, until they have ninety-four thousand inhabitants, and they constitute a board of commissioners to have charge of the elections a majority of whom are to be appointed by the President of the United States, mere executive instruments, men who can be removed at any time at his will.

Why is this change made? Answer, if you can. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADE] asked, the other day, why it was made; and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. GREEN] gave what Major Jack Downing was wont to call a sharp, knowing look, as though he would answer—he gave two very significant nods that he would answer in his own time. He followed the Senator from Ohio, but he did not condescend to allude to this very pertinent question put by the Senator from Ohio. Sir, the other Senator from Ohio [Mr. PUGH] yesterday undertook to explain the reason why; and the reason is this: that a board made of four men, Governor, Secretary, President of the Council, and Speaker of the House of Representatives, could not do business, and it was necessary to make a partisan majority on that board. Then why did you not give it to the people? I will tell you why: you have put that board in the hands of the President of the United States. The President of the United States, last May, sent Governor Walker to Kansas Territory, with a solemn pledge that the people should have an opportunity to vote on their constitution, on its adoption or rejection. I went up the Missouri river with Governor Walker, and he everywhere proclaimed it. I heard his speech to the people assembled at Lawrence. He told them that they should have a fair opportunity to vote. He pledged himself to the people of that Territory that, if the constitution was not fairly submitted, he himself would resist the constitution before Congress. He gave the people to understand that he was backed in this by the President of the United States; that he represented the President and his Cabinet; that he spoke for the Government. Sir, these assurances had their weight. Men said, "we shall be cheated if we go to vote under the partial enrollment; they will give us a chance to vote on the constitution, and then we will vote down the corrupt and dishonest thing and make a constitution which shall reflect the popular will."

You will remember, Mr. President, that when the October election came, the little town of Oxford, which had about forty-two legal voters, gave over one thousand six hundred votes. Governor Walker went down there, examined the case, and threw out the votes. McGee county, that had hardly any inhabitants at all, gave one thousand three hundred votes. Governor Walker threw them out; and for these acts a howl went up from the States now threatening to dissolve the Union if you do not admit Kansas under the Lecompton constitution. They denied that Governor Walker had the right to throw out these votes, and he was denounced for correcting these frauds, although the correction of the frauds was vital to the just expression of the public sentiment; for these frauds gave the Legislature to the minority of the Territory.

While these threats were borne on southern breezes to the White House, Governor Wise came to Washington, saw the President, told the President that he would write a letter sustaining his policy, and draw this fire upon himself. He did so; and a day or two after that very letter was written, the President deserted the Governor and left him to be shot down. He deserted Walker. The moment Walker corrected those frauds, the demand went forth that he should be sacrificed, and the President was the willing tool to sacrifice a man for correcting a gigantic fraud upon the people.

That is not all, sir. Mr. Dennis, who was appointed marshal of the Territory by Mr. Buchanan, attended the polls at Oxford, this very precinct that gave sixteen hundred votes at one election, thirteen hundred at another, and seven or eight hundred at another. He was summoned before the investigating committee of the Territorial Legislature; and he testified that there were less than one hundred and fifty voters in the precinct, and that not over two hundred and fifty votes were given there on that day, when they counted out nearly thirteen hundred votes. He gave this testimony, exposed these frauds before the investigating committee, and the President of the United States removed him. Yes, sir, Mr. Dennis was sacrificed for exposing the frauds of the friends of Lecompton by a willing Executive who has shown that he is but an instrument of the slave propagandists.

While Walker and Stanton and Dennis were stricken down, for exposing these frauds upon the people of Kansas, by your President, Diefendorff remains a clerk in your land office. Jack Henderson, who took the vote at Delaware Crossing, and who was implicated in that stupendous fraud, is yet in the public service. McLean, who hid the returns in a candle-box at night, under a wood-pile, two feet under ground—this man who then went before the commission and gave a solemn oath that he had sent these returns out of the Territory, and then had to escape from the Territory to escape from a charge of perjury, and has loitered around this Capitol for the last three months—this creature is yet in the confidence of the Administration, and I have met him and his companions in the executive mansion. Yes, sir, he is in office; and Calhoun, the organizer of frauds, yet has the President's confidence, and is to be sent up into Nebraska, perhaps to play the same game in that Territory.

Now, with these lights before us, I have a right to say that this change in the board of commissioners could be made for no honest purpose. These three men may be removed by the President; and they will be removed, if their removal be necessary to effect the purposes of the men who have sustained the Missouri invasion, sustained the violence in Kansas, sustained this Lecompton fraud, sustained this whole policy that has disgraced our country for more than three years. If they demand it, he will remove these men. He has given pledges, guarantees; all there is of him, and all he hopes to be, he has staked upon them. He is in their hands. He is their instrument; and if they demand it, he will see to it that the three men he appoints, who have the control of this board of commissioners, who can fix the day of election as far off as they please, who can appoint just the men they please to preside over the ballot-boxes, who can count in the Oxford, Kickapoo, and Shawnee frauds, who can decide this whole question—he can remove them at his will, and they are but his tools and his instruments, and he is the tool and instrument of the slave propagandists and disunionists. They must obey him, and he will obey the imperious men who rule him for their own purposes.

Do you believe, Mr. President, that the men who sustained, in Congress and out of Congress, the invasion of March, 1855; who sustained the invasion of December, 1855; who sustained the sacking of Lawrence in May, 1856; who justified the bloody scenes of the summer and autumn of 1856; who have denounced Walker and Stanton and Dennis for exposing the frauds of October, of December, and of January last—do you believe the men who have incurred all the odium of sustaining these acts, which have brought disgrace and dishonor upon our common country, for the purpose of making Kansas a slave State—do you believe they will yield it up now, when they have their final gripe upon the people, when they have three commissioners who can count Kansas in under the Lecompton constitution? Sir, the public judgment of the country, awakened to this proposition and to this condition of affairs, may make even these men act with common honesty. Nothing else will baffle them. I say to the people of Kansas, of the United States, if this measure passes, as I suppose it is to pass, for we see the potent influences of executive power all around us and about us, nothing can save Kansas from being counted into the Union by fraudulent votes, but the vigilance of the people of Kansas and the public judgment of the people of the United States. I have no faith in this Administration; none in the President; for I know they want Kansas to come into the Union as a slave State. Failing in all efforts to force her in the Union, you now propose to bribe her in by rewards, by penalties; and if these will not do, you have got the power in this scheme to bring her in by fraud.

I tell you frankly, this bill will not make peace unless you mean to use fraud. That will close it. Use fraud, gentlemen, and you have the power to close it; and that alone will close this controversy; for the people will spurn your bribe, they will vote down your constitution, and they will not come in under it, unless you count them in by counting fraudulent votes. Suppose you are not able to do that, and Kansas rejects your Lecompton constitution: do you think the people of Kansas or the people of this country will regard as of any force your declaration that she shall not make a constitution, and come into the Union, until she has ninety-four thousand inhabitants? No, sir; I think the intelligent people of Kansas will vote down your constitution; they will not accept it, unless you count them in by counting fraudulent votes; and if they do reject it, they will make another constitution, and a free constitution. You have settled it that Kansas has inhabitants enough to come in as a slave State. Yes, northern men, representing Rhode Island, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Indiana, Ohio, Iowa—these men, in this House and in the other, are voting here that Kansas may come in under the Lecompton constitution, which forbids any future Legislature ever to abolish slavery; that she may come in under that slave constitution with her present population, be they few or many; but she cannot come in until she has ninety-four thousand if she will not come in under this constitution. Sir, we will charge this upon these men in every school district of the free States; we will hold them up to the indignant judgment of a betrayed people—yes, sir, a betrayed people; we will hunt them down, and dance on their political graves. Let the people of Kansas make a constitution; submit it to the popular will; bring it here as a free State. You have voted that she has inhabitants enough to come in as a slave State; and let us see these men keep her out as a free State, if they dare. Yes, sir, we give you notice now that you cannot close this question under your new scheme, except by stupendous and gigantic frauds. You can do it that way; but you cannot do it honestly. The people of Kansas will spurn your bribe. They will make a constitution; they will come here asking admission. You can keep them out if you choose to do so; but you keep them out at your peril.

If the proposition made by the Senator from Kentucky had been adopted, this whole question would have been settled to-day. The people would have taken a fair vote under men appointed by the concurrence of both parties. We should have had a fair vote on the Lecompton constitution. It would have been voted down unquestionably by an overwhelming majority. Then the people would have made a new constitution and adopted it, and the President would have made his proclamation, and Kansas would have been a sister of the Confederacy. That proposition, made by the Senator from Kentucky, and accepted by us in both Houses promptly, would have closed this whole Kansas controversy and have closed it forever. I tell the Senator from Virginia [Mr. HUNTER] who talks of a truce, that this is no truce. He could not draw a bill, with all his ingenuity, that would have less of peace in it. Every man who knows the condition of affairs in Kansas, knows that the people now want to come into the Union, that they will never accept your Lecompton constitution unless you count them in fraudulently; that they will make a constitution and come here and ask admission. If you admit them you may then close it, but you do not close it by this scheme, for you say they shall not be admitted until they have a certain number of inhabitants. You may admit them in spite of this restriction and close the controversy; but if you mean to adhere to the provisions of this act, you have on hand an open controversy, running through months—perhaps years.

Now you will adopt this measure, I think; but you will have to pay the penalties for it, depend upon that. It is a proposition you cannot defend here—you cannot defend it anywhere. I listened to the Senator from Virginia the other day; and if any man can defend this measure he can do it; I listened to the Senator from Missouri; I listened yesterday to the speech of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PUGH]; I have listened to-day to the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. BROWN], and the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. TOOMBS]. I have not yet heard within these walls, or before the people, men of talent, of capacity, labor as they have labored, and come to such impotent and illogical conclusions. Sir, there is no peace in this scheme. You talk about peace in regard to Kansas. Deal fairly and honestly, and you can have it. There will be no peace on this question, or any other question growing out of slavery, in America, until the whole controversy is settled upon a solid basis of eternal right—never, never!

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. PUGH] is absent; and I regret it. He undertook yesterday to cast odium on our friends in Kansas, by charging that they intended "to stuff the ballot-boxes with negro votes." A negro could have voted to elect delegates to the Lecompton convention; a negro could have voted on the proposition that was submitted; a negro can vote by that constitution, if he is a citizen of the United States. The law for the election of delegates to the Leavenworth convention was like the law for the election of delegates to the Lecompton convention. The provisions of both declared that the bona fide citizens of the United States should be allowed to vote. The word "white" was not in either act. The provisions of the Leavenworth constitution are exactly like the provisions of the Lecompton constitution, in regard to suffrage, in that respect. The Leavenworth constitution allows foreigners who have given notice of an intention to become citizens the right to vote; Lecompton does not.

There is a provision in the Lecompton constitution that is a disgrace to the American name: and that is that a free negro shall not live in Kansas. Sir, the descendants of the man who, on Bunker Hill shot down Major Pitcairn, who fired upon our countrymen at Lexington, if he has any, cannot live in Kansas under this Lecompton constitution. The descendants of two of the three men, if they have left any, who were captured on board the Chesapeake before the war of 1812, whom Jefferson and Madison called citizens, cannot live there. The descendants of the men who fought with Andrew Jackson before the blazing lines of New Orleans, and whom Jackson called his fellow-citizens, cannot live there. I say that proposition is a disgrace to the American name. The Senator says they are excluded from voting by the Lecompton constitution, because they cannot live in the State under it. Could they not have voted on the election of delegates? Could they not have voted on the adoption of the portion of the constitution that was submitted before they were excluded by the adoption of the constitution itself? If they are citizens of the United States they would do so. There is a provision in the Leavenworth constitution that the first Legislature shall submit the question of universal suffrage to the people—that is all there is in it; and a Senator calling himself a Democrat comes into the Senate of the United States, and undertakes to prejudice a great cause by charging its friends with attempting to stuff the ballot-boxes with negro votes. That Senator well knows that there are not one hundred free negroes in the Territory; and this assault upon the framers of the Leavenworth constitution is unjust—grossly unjust.

But, Mr. President, we shall vote against this proposition; and I assure the Senator from Georgia, who hints that we were in doubt whether to accept it or not, that the "cabal," as he is pleased to call us, never had any doubts as to what we would do in regard to this scheme. Sir, we could not accept the bill for your Lecompton constitution. We thought that the embodiment of a gigantic fraud; and as we believe this scheme combines bribe, menace, and fraud, we spurn it, and we denounce the men who originated it, and who give it their support, in and out of Congress.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President, I am determined not to be drawn into a general discussion of this subject any more. I have presented my views upon it fully. I will not weary the Senate with anything further on the subject. But when personal allusion is made to me in terms which I consider very offensive, I may be permitted to make a very brief personal rejoinder.

The Senator from Massachusetts opened with a very high eulogy on the distinguished and venerable Senator from Kentucky, to which I can heartily subscribe. I have no word to say in detraction of the high compliment he paid to that distinguished Senator; but I may be permitted to remark that it does not add to the reputation of that Senator when the whole speech is read. If the whole speech be read I think it will detract from it. The Senator from Massachusetts charges us with intending to commit a fraud. Now, sir, if he will disregard the proprieties of the Senate, if he will disregard the rules of debate, if he will set at naught the proprieties of a gentleman, I shall permit it to pass, because I know the country will estimate it in its proper light, and it will not detract from me in the least. I will add that it seems to me the most appropriate reply I can make to him in regard to that accusation when he charges fraud, and an intention to commit fraud, is, that "out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh."

He says he was with Walker, traveled up the river, and conversed with him, and he volunteers his testimony. I should like him to testify under oath when he undertakes to influence the action of the country, or influence public judgment by anything he can testify, and I should like him to undergo the scrutiny of a cross-examination that I could put to him. I think I could ferret out a little more than he has volunteered here to the Senate uncalled for. He says that after he went to Kansas, he knew this, that, and the other. Well, sir, the country knows that the "Oxford frauds" were never committed until he went there; that the "Delaware Crossing frauds" were never committed until after he went there. Whether they resulted from his instigation, whether he, by his intrigues, and schemes, and plots, and maneuvers, laid the foundation for them or not, I cannot say; but I can say that history will bear me out in the fact that until he did go there, none of these frauds were committed.

He intimated that I neglected to answer a certain question propounded by the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE.] I thought it was answered sufficiently. If not, I do not intend to re-present arguments I before presented. I could ask him questions—whether, when he went to Kansas, he did not find peace; whether, when he went to Kansas, he did not find a public sentiment gradually quieting down, disposed to harmonize itself, to accept the constitution, to put it into successful operation, and only to change it as the future exigencies of that community might require; whether he did not send for Lane, and have him brought twelve miles to his room, and concoct a scheme that has stirred up the whole strife which has spread over the country, and caused the excitement that now prevails? I could ask him these questions if he were under cross-examination, but I shall not do it. There are various other questions I could ask. Volunteer witnesses, not under oath, who perhaps might be challenged if sworn, I suppose will not have very much effect upon the country.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I should not object to be put under oath, and to have the Senator from Missouri question me in regard to all that I know of the affairs of Kansas; he would be better posted in the affairs of that Territory than he now appears to be. He asks me if I did not find peace in Kansas when I went there? Governor Walker and Mr. Stanton, in the public documents that you have published, and the public authorities, all tell you that there was not peace. I thought there was peace, though there was a deep and intense anxiety in the public mind in regard to the election of delegates to the convention. Let the Senator remember I was there the last of the month of May, and the election was to come off in June.

The Senator wishes to know if I did not send for General Lane. I did not see General Lane while I was in the Territory, and did not speak to him, or send for him. Is the Senator answered?

The Senator wants to know if any of these frauds ever occurred in Kansas before I went there. Why, Mr. President, did not the Senator's associates and friends, his own constituents on the Missouri river, to the number of forty-nine hundred, march over into Kansas on the 30th of March, 1855, and commit the most stupendous fraud ever committed in this country? Did they not go even in the autumn of 1854, and give seventeen hundred votes for General Whitfield? Has not that been proved? Did they not go over there, many of them, in the autumn of 1856, to vote? Why does the Senator speak to me, or to my friends in that Territory or out of it, of frauds in Kansas? What frauds have they ever committed there? At what time, and on what occasion, have you ever proved that a fraudulent vote was given by a free-State man in that Territory? Has there been an election in which frauds have not been committed, openly committed, proved beyond all question, by the slave-State men—beginning in 1854, carried out in 1855, renewed in 1856, running through the elections of October and December, 1857, and of January, 1858?

Let me say to the Senator now—and in saying it I reply to a hint thrown out by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BIGLER] in my absence during the long night session—that I gave no advice to the people of Kansas not to vote at any of their elections. Here, to-day, let me say that I have advised the people of Kansas, so far as my voice could go, from these Halls and before the people in and out of the Territory, on all fit occasions, to go to the ballot-box, offer their votes, give their votes if they could—if they were cheated, the responsibility would not be theirs—make a record, show the frauds to the country. That has always been my opinion and my advice.

The Senator has insinuated against me what he knows there is not a shadow of evidence for—that, in the Territory or out of the Territory, I ever consulted with or laid any plans with anybody or any class of men, affecting the public peace or affecting elections, that were not legitimate, legal, and proper. Sir, I live in a section of the country where we do not have election frauds, where the votes of the people are taken as regularly at all elections as they are taken in the Senate of the United States. I never saw an illegal vote cast in my life; and I have never, in the course of twenty-five years, attended an election where I had reason to think there were fraudulent votes given, or fraudulent returns made. I hope the Senator from Missouri can say as much.

Mr. GREEN. I merely wish to say one word. The Senator from Massachusetts intimates that he would like to be sworn on this subject. All I have to say is, that I shall not call him. In a long practice at the bar, and in conformity with long experience, and on principles laid down by the best legal writers on the law of evidence, it is unsafe to trust a too willing witness.

Mr. BELL. Mr. President, this distracting question is presented to us again, though in a somewhat altered aspect from that in which it has been heretofore considered by the Senate; and I feel that it is due to myself that I should state the grounds on which I propose to regulate my course upon the question as now presented. In doing so, I shall endeavor to be very brief; I do not propose to enter elaborately into the discussion of the subject.

My object from the first, as I announced, was to support such a measure as, in my opinion, would not only give a truce to agitation on all matters connected with Kansas, but would give permanent peace and repose to the country, without the violation of any sound principle, or without derogating from the rights and interests of either section of the country. Regulating my investigations and my conclusions by that single object, which I hope is a patriotic one, I gave a very careful examination and inquiry, not only to the particular question which was presented by the original Senate bill, but to the whole history of the difficulties in Kansas from 1855 up to this time; and I came to the conclusion that the Senate bill was not fit and proper to be supported with reference to the great controlling object which I had in view; and I desire briefly to recapitulate the heads or grounds on which I based that opinion. Without going back to the period of the first alleged violation of the principles of the organic law, I will commence with the getting up of the Lecompton convention.

I considered that there was a great irregularity in the formation of the Lecompton convention; that the law of the Legislature calling the convention, supposing it to have due authority, was disregarded and violated. Saying nothing in regard to any other cause which may have influenced the majority of the people, who were called the free-State party or Abolitionists, from voting in the election of delegates to the convention, on the ground that all the officers who were to hold the elections and to make the returns had been appointed by a Legislature which was altogether pro-slavery, with the exception of one member, I go at once to what I call the irregularity, which was, that the people of from fourteen to nineteen counties, by a defective execution of the law, were not allowed to cast a vote, or to send a delegate to the convention. That was an objection that I considered would be decided to be fatal by any court of judicature in which the validity of any judicial process or other proceeding under a law, should arise. I understood the able Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. HAMMOND,] who addressed the Senate on this question at an early period of the debate, to admit that there might be irregularities which would be fatal to the legality of the convention. Another objection was, that, after the constitution was formed, the submission to the people was a mockery, and that the alleged ratification could not be considered otherwise than as fraudulent.

It was alleged on the other side that there was no such irregularity in getting up the convention; that there were no such frauds as had been charged against the ratification on the 21st of December, by those who admitted that these were questions which might be entitled to weight and influence; but it is a most remarkable fact with regard even to that portion of the advocates of the original Senate bill who gave their attention to the subject of these frauds, and answered these allegations as far as they chose to do, that there is not one of them in either House of Congress who has not persistently up to this day voted against every proposition to inquire into them by proofs that would be satisfactory to the people of the whole country. Those gentlemen have told us that it was an assumption on our part to suppose that there was any irregularity in the getting up of the convention. I ask the gentlemen who took that position why they are not willing to have an investigation and report upon that subject? Why were you not willing to let us hear the truth by direct testimony as to the frauds in the election of the 21st of December, so far as it was material to be considered? Why did they not agree to a proposition to have the evidence brought here?

In regard to the condition of the nineteen counties to which I have alluded, in fourteen of them there were no officers appointed, so that the law requiring a census and registry could not be executed. There were three thousand voters in the nineteen disfranchised counties, and a large portion of them in fourteen of those counties who had no chance to vote, no chance to be included in any census returns, or in any registry, not because they threatened the officers with death or violence if they proceeded to execute their duty, but simply because there were no officers there; none had been appointed; the Legislature held it in their exclusive power and control to appoint all officers; the people were permitted to elect none; and the Legislature neglected to appoint any officers in the fourteen counties.

I will state a further fact, which is a most pregnant and important one. The frauds which are alleged, the charges of irregularity which are made, could all be proved, so far as they existed on paper or in writing, by looking into the archives of the Territory of Kansas, and could have been reported here in a very short time. The proof of all the facts resting in the knowledge or recollection of witnesses is said to be abundant. My investigations, of course, have been confined to the best evidence within my reach, and upon such information as has been presented to me, and on which I could rely. If any supporter of the Senate bill chose to deny any of the alleged irregularities and frauds connected with the Lecompton constitution, why did they not permit them to be investigated, and evidence to be taken when witnesses were upon the ground, or why did they not allow us to have the documentary proof before us?

These were a part, though not the most material, of the grounds on which I formed my opinion, and I think they ought to be regarded as entitled to some consideration. The President set out with the proposition that the people of Kansas had authority under their organic law to form a State constitution whenever they pleased, and he further assumed that the Lecompton constitution was formed as legally, as regularly, and as fairly, as any other constitution that has ever been formed in this country, and that, therefore, no subsequent Legislature of the Territory could alter or annul it, and that Congress was bound to regard it as the act of the people of Kansas, and reflecting their will.

Now, sir, upon the investigation of that question, I found no warrant in the organic law of Congress—the Kansas-Nebraska act—authorizing the people of Kansas to form a constitution, and demand admission into the Union whenever they pleased. I do not remember that there was any gentleman among the advocates of the measure who contended to the end that there was any such power under the organic act; or if there be any such gentleman, I am not aware that he made any such statement. I know the Committee on Territories reported their opinion to be that the people had the legal power under the organic act, and it was inserted in the preamble to the bill they reported; but it was stricken out afterwards, I presume, on the representation of other gentlemen, who were friends of the bill, that it was an untenable position.

Then how did this leave the question of the formation of this constitution? It left it without any enabling act, and without any authority of the organic law—open to every exception that could be taken on the ground of irregularity, of fraud, of any description of unfairness, or that it did not reflect the will of the people. Connected with this view of the subject, and the circumstances I have before stated controlled me so far as they went; but I repeat again, they were the least substantial of the grounds upon which I proceeded.

As there was no authority given in the organic act for the formation of a constitution, I considered that the people of Kansas might, under the authority of an act of the Territorial Legislature, at any time form a State constitution, and apply to Congress for admission, standing exactly in the position that the people of Arkansas stood when the question was asked of the authorities of the United States whether they would be entitled to come in under such a constitution. They, the people of Arkansas, were informed, through the Secretary of State, in conformity with the opinion of the Attorney General of the United States, that having formed a constitution under such circumstances gave them no right to admission into the Union according to the Constitution of the United States, but that Congress could, if they thought proper, admit them.

But, admitting everything that was contended by the advocates of the Senate's bill in regard to the regularity and fairness of the Lecompton convention, and of the formation of the constitution; admitting, in the language of the President, that this constitution was as regularly and fairly formed as any constitution could be, how did the case then stand? Until the Territory was admitted by Congress as a State, had this instrument any vitality or validity whatever? I would infer from the argument of the honorable Senator from Missouri, that he thought it had. On looking over his speech this morning to see whether I understood him correctly the other day, I find that he contends that the constitution formed a State government, and that whether it be admitted now or not, there is a State government formed in Kansas; and if I were to give a strict construction to other parts of his argument, it never could be altered at all, except in the exercise of the sovereignty belonging to the people of a State, after their admission into the Union.

According to the true doctrine upon this subject, although this constitution was regularly and fairly formed under an act of the Territorial Legislature, it had no validity, no vitality, until the Territory was admitted into the Union as a State; and what follows from that? That the people of the Territory might change it, abolish it, and frame a new constitution, when and as often as they pleased, before their admission into the Union as a State, in the same legal forms, and the same fairness that the Lecompton constitution was formed, supposing that one had been fairly and legally formed? They were not prevented from doing that in the exercise of their sovereignty over the whole question, until they were actually admitted into the Union as a State. I predicated my course in opposition to the Senate bill mainly on the ground that the Territorial Legislature had passed an act, about the validity of which there could be no question, calling the people to vote upon the Lecompton constitution, and to say whether it should be their constitution, and implying, of course, that they were to say whether they would ask admission into the Union under it, and that the vote was taken with fairness—which has never been seriously questioned by any one—and that a majority of ten thousand declared against it.

Now, according to the constitutional doctrines and principles contended for by the most experienced and able advocates of this measure, was the Lecompton constitution, any longer, after that vote, one of which it could be said that it was the constitution under which the people of Kansas now asked admission into the Union? Some of the advocates of the measure admitted that this constitution had no validity until it was accepted by Congress, and the Territory admitted into the Union as a State; but most of them forbore to say anything on the subject. The honorable Senator from Virginia, I think—certainly the honorable Senator from Missouri, the organ of the Committee on Territories—asserted the proposition that we had no right to approve or disapprove the constitution; that it was not for us to say whether we adopt it or not, (which is strictly true;) that we could only look to see whether it be republican or not; that beyond that we had no control; that the constitution was framed by and for the people of Kansas, not for the approval of Congress.

Well, sir, according to those doctrines, how came the Lecompton constitution here? It was presented, it is said, by John Calhoun, the president of the Lecompton convention. Because he was invested with that authority by that convention, did that deprive the people of Kansas of all power over the constitution? Suppose this question should lay over five years, as the honorable Senator from Missouri says a constitution framed in Florida once did: could the people of Kansas make no new constitution in the mean time? Could they make no changes of it? Could not they repudiate this instrument? Could they not, if there was time allowed them, in the same legal form, through the act of the Territorial Legislature, make half a dozen constitutions if they chose—becoming discontented with one and another as they made them, and only present the last one that they approved when they applied to Congress for admission? Surely they could.

I have contended that there is no no constitution here presented by the people of Kansas. I do not say that under the powers we have under the Constitution of the United States, we cannot admit Kansas without any constitution. We could do so if we thought proper; there is nothing in the Constitution of the United States to prohibit it. The proposition I state is, that the constitution which is alleged by the advocates of this measure, and in the report of the committee of conference, to be the constitution of Kansas, has been repudiated and rejected in the same legal forms by the people of Kansas, and with the same fairness in and with which it was originally formed. I say with greater fairness. I am admitting that everything was done fairly and legally in the formation of the Lecompton constitution; and I say, that just as fairly, and just as legally, under the act of the Territorial Legislature, the people of Kansas have rejected that constitution, and said they will not stand by it; that it does not reflect their will; and that whether it did or not when it was formed, they have changed their opinion; it is not their constitution now.

How gentlemen of constitutional learning, able and skillful as they are, on the other side of the Chamber, have ever recognized this as the constitution of the people of Kansas, according to their own doctrines, I have not been able to comprehend; for the able Senator from South Carolina and others—though I know a good many have evaded the question altogether—have admitted that this constitution had no more validity than the paper on which it was written, until Congress admitted the State into the Union; and, according to the true, strict, constitutional doctrine, as I contend—and it is according to the argument of the honorable Senator from Missouri; if not of the honorable Senator from Virginia—you have no right to say to the people of Kansas, when you come in this or that shall be your constitution. To be sure, the Senator from Virginia said we ought to see that she has a republican form of government; but I shall come to that directly.

These are the main grounds on which I could not yield my assent to the proposition made by the President, and adopted by his supporters in the two Houses of Congress, to admit Kansas under this constitution.

I have stated that subsidiary to the views which led me to take the course I did upon the original bill, I looked into the evidence, so far as it was at hand, and so far as I could procure it, to see whether the allegations of fraud and irregularity had any foundation in truth; for I had heard them repeatedly denied and as repeatedly reasserted. I looked into them myself. I know honorable Senators on the other side did not pay much attention to that point; and I allude to it now, more particularly to the honorable Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. HAMMOND,] because he was more emphatic in his statements upon this part of the subject than others. He said that he knew enough already about the history of Kansas affairs not to desire to know any more. He shut his eyes willfully to the facts of the case; he abstained from any investigation. Seemingly to me he feared, as he did not wish to separate from his friends, that, as an honorable man, if he should examine the allegations that had been made of fraud and irregularity against the formation of the Lecompton constitution, and the mode of getting it here, he could not give it his support. Others, I dare say, have taken the same position; but they all take shelter under the principle, as they call it, that they cannot look behind the constitution; that these frauds are matters of prevention and suppression by the territorial authorities; that they cannot look into them; that they can look only to the paper said to be sent here by the people of Kansas. As the honorable Senator from Georgia [Mr. TOOMBS] said to-day, they trample under foot all questions of fraud or irregularities that may have been committed. That was his language to-day; and they did trample them under foot.

The gentlemen on the other side, though, felt themselves protected from the necessity of looking into the frauds, and, of course, hold themselves irresponsible to the country, and to their own consciences, for the enormity of the frauds and irregularities that may have been practiced in connection with the Lecompton constitution. That is a happy condition to be in. I should like to occupy it in many cases, if I thought it was really fit to be assumed and occupied; and I do not say these gentlemen took that position for that purpose. They go upon the ground that this being presented, as they say, with all due legal forms, and having been framed, according to the principles they adopt, they can look no further; that everything beyond that is foreign to the issue.

I have thus stated the grounds of principle and of fact on which I opposed the original bill; but I opposed it for yet another reason. Instead of bringing peace to the country, by adopting that bill and enforcing that constitution on the people, the probability was, in my judgment, that a civil war might, or would, probably follow; that it would give no peace. As to the idea of "localizing" the agitation upon this subject in the Territory of Kansas, I think that has been proved by experience, too long, too fatal an experience, to be too absurd and preposterous to think of. Then, consistently, with the original object which I proposed to myself as my guide in regulating my action on this subject, I was bound to go against the bill.

The question is now presented, Mr. President, in a new shape; and when I came to look at it, it required, as I thought, to be considered more carefully than I had first supposed. I allude, of course, to the question presented by the report of the committee of conference. I had to consider whether this, after all, was not in conformity with the main object which I had in view in forming my opinion in reference to the original project of the President; whether it did not open a mode by which this question could be settled; not only a true given, or a lull, because I consider that of little value, but whether a mode was not provided by this report by which this question, in some short time, some reasonable time, at all events, might be put at rest.

Now, Mr. President, I lay very little stress on the charge which has been made as to the bribe which is held out, by putting the question to the people upon the ordinance instead of the constitution; or on the fact, if it be so, that the constitution is not to be submitted to the people of Kansas by this project of the committee of conference. I should lay but little stress on that, if the other provisions of the report of the committee were such as promised to secure the accomplishment of my original object and purpose in taking my course upon this subject.

I do not consider that there is much in the argument as to the bribe—the offer of these lands—though the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] has stated some things that would make it an object. There may not be many valuable lands left there in a year or two; and it might be some temptation to get these lands for the purposes of education and internal improvements, and the other objects proposed to be subserved by these grants, now while there is a very large portion of fertile lands to be obtained. But as the quantity offered to them is not more than Congress at all times would be willing to concede to them whenever they may be admitted into the Union, and, I believe, the same quantity that was conceded to Minnesota, that "bribe" I cannot consider to be one of very great influence, whatever may have been expected from it.

Next, as to the question whether the measure, as now presented, is any material modification of the original bill, in respect to the question of submitting the Lecompton constitution to a vote of the people. Whether there is, in the language of the day, any backing down on the part of the supporters of the original Senate bill, I do not pretend to say. I cannot say there is any modification of the original bill in this respect, which can be charged as an unequivocal change of the ground originally assumed on this point by the friends of this measure, though I think the circumstances are very strong to show that they are willing to waive their original policy of fastening this constitution on the people of Kansas. I will not quarrel with them on that point, or press the question of consistency or inconsistency upon them.

The honorable Senator from Virginia was very earnest and very positive in his statement that there was no change of principle; that there is no inconsistency between the present offer in regard to the submission of this constitution to the people of Kansas, and the one which was proposed in the original bill. I would not quarrel with him about that. If this bill had been framed, in other respects, in such manner as to give a close to this unfortunate and unhappy controversy, I should not stop a moment to inquire whether the friends of this measure can maintain successfully that there is no inconsistency, no change of principle, between this proposition and that which originally passed the Senate. I should with pleasure concede to them the credit of having made a proposition which, while it saved their own pride of consistency, and while it reconciled them to the idea that there was no violation of the principle on which they supported that original bill, yet substantially accomplished my great object. Instead of inquiring into that, I should have thanked them for the exercise of any skill or ingenuity by which they were able to present such a proposition which was satisfactory to their own feelings, and, at the same time, promised to bring the same results to the country—bring quiet not only to Kansas, but throughout the Union.

But, sir, when you come to the question merely whether there is a change of policy, to say nothing of principle, or not, I will not say what I really think; but if here is not a mode by which the people of Kansas can escape from having this constitution fastened on them, I do not know what construction to put upon language; I do not know what interpretation to put upon the substantial provisions of the report. Here is clearly a door opened by which the people of Kansas can avoid what a majority of them would consider an oppression. A means of escape is opened to them if they think proper to avail themselves of it—that is it. The gentlemen say this is no submission of the constitution. The honorable Senator from Georgia and others take that ground. It seems that according to their statements and their presentation of the question, they have become very suddenly alarmed as to whether there might not be serious controversy if they were to insist on their original bill, about the quantity of lands the people of Kansas should be entitled to; that it might create a disturbance, not only in Kansas, but throughout the Union, and that it therefore became them, as wise and prudent statesmen and politicians, on so grave a measure as that of admitting a State into the Union, to see that there could be no difficulty springing out of the matter hereafter. That is very commendable on their part; nobody can deny that. The only strangeness about it is, that the idea never struck them until this committee of conference came together. Nobody ever apprehended any such difficulty before, and the fact is, that nobody could have believed that any serious difficulty could ever have arisen from any such cause.

The honorable Senator from Georgia goes so far as to state that if the section of the original bill which prescribed the quantity of land which would be conceded to the State had been agreed to by the House of Representatives, and Kansas thought proper to repudiate that proposition and disagree to it, she would be out of the Union. That was a novelty to me; I never conceived of such an idea before; but these are the straits and difficulties in which gentlemen necessarily find themselves in maintaining their consistency and avoiding any change or violation of the principles on which they first set out.

I repeat, I would find no fault with them if the measure proposed offered peace. I would, on the contrary, applaud their ingenuity, and be very glad that they could flatter themselves that there was no inconsistency, no change of principle, if they had carried out the views they might have carried out, and made it an effective and substantial measure for terminating this difficulty in a mode that could not have failed of producing the result of general quiet and harmony.

But is there a change? The people are told, "if you vote for this land proposition, you take it with this constitution." They are told that, in substance. Now, I should like to inquire—I merely ask the question, without arguing it—what right have we to say that they shall take this constitution, if it was not theirs originally, or whether it was so or not? This proposition says to them, "if you vote to accept these grants of land, it must be understood that you are willing to come into the Union with the Lecompton constitution." Now, I ask whether, according to every rule of interpretation or construction which obtains in courts of justice and legislative halls, that is not equivalent to submitting the constitution to the people for their acceptance or rejection? It is intended—I do not say improperly intended—but it is expressly stated that that is to be the result. It says to the people of Kansas, "if you do not accept our proposition in regard to lands, the inference is to be that you are not willing to come into the Union with the Lecompton constitution." As I stated, I should have made no question in regard to what seems to me to be an indirection in this business, and should be very glad to concede to the gentlemen that it was consistent, and no violation of their principle, if they had further provided that "if you give a vote rejecting this ordinance, you shall proceed immediately, or in the regular course, as soon as it can be done by an act of your Legislature, if you choose to call a convention and form a State constitution," regulating the mode, in the spirit of an enabling act, by which it should be done, to secure fidelity and fairness, "and when you have done so, whether the new constitution you make provides for slavery or restricts slavery, you shall be admitted into the Union," &c. I believe that strictly according to the Constitution we have no right to impose conditions on the admission of new States; but I would not make a point about that, if it had only done what further would seem to be necessary in order to close this controversy.

I stated in the course of the somewhat long and elaborate speech which I made upon the occasion of the passage of the original bill by the Senate that I had been of opinion from the first, that this controversy was not to be closed during the present Administration. This declaration was predicated on the interest which I saw the extremes of both parties had in perpetuating it. I make no charge, but from the natural tendency and operation of such questions in the action of parties, particularly in the extremes to which they exist in this country, I have had but little hope from the first that this controversy could be terminated until after the next presidential election, if then—I mean in regard to Kansas.

Then, I do not think we are authorized to impose conditions on new States on their admission; yet in the exigency of this case I should have been disposed to vote for the measure reported by the committee of conference, if it had pursued the policy of the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky, in providing for the formation of a new constitution, as soon as might be conveniently done, after a vote upon the Lecompton, rejecting it, and for admission into the Union under the new constitution, with or without slavery. If that were done, notwithstanding what may be supposed and considered to be a "bribe" in regard to the land grant, I should have felt bound to support this proposition. That is the principal defect of it, in my judgment.

I do not charge that it was the design of the Senators who composed the conference committee to perpetuate the controversy in Kansas; but that it will probably perpetuate agitation in Kansas, at least for three or four years, I think few will deny. In my judgment, that will be the effect of it, take it in any aspect you please. Suppose a majority of the people of Kansas agree to accept the grant of lands proposed by this report; then, of course, they come into the Union, according to the provisions of this new bill, under the Lecompton constitution. But would that close the controversy? They could vote for the land grant, and the moment they came in they may make a question whether Congress has any power to force a constitution on them; they might make a question whether Congress has any power to prescribe that they shall have any constitution before or at the time of admission. According to the doctrine of the Senator from Missouri, we have no such power. He says we have no power over this constitution or any other; it is made for the people of Kansas; we cannot alter it; we cannot add anything to it, or subtract anything from it. According to my understanding of the principles of many of the advocates of this measure, as that constitution was rejected by the people before the passage of this act admitting them into the Union, they may say this is not their constitution, and if they have formed a new constitution—particularly if the Leavenworth constitution should be ratified by the people, according to the forms provided by the convention which framed it—they may say, "that is our constitution; and we make the question with Congress, we make the question with all the authorities and powers that choose to doubt our right, that the Leavenworth is our constitution." Well, sir, what then? Some gentlemen have suggested to me (I do not think it is possible though) that the Administration may have been looking ahead to the consequences of making such a question, and have got the opinion of the Attorney General of the United States that the act of the Territorial Legislature under which this new constitution was formed was not passed according to the organic act, because the Governor was not allowed three full days for its consideration; and hence all the proceedings under that act in calling a convention and in forming a constitution are void.

Who is to settle that question if it should be made? Your Attorney General is not the man who can do it. What authority is there in Kansas to settle it? If they have a legislative majority of free-State men, and they choose to organize under the new constitution, they may undertake to settle it. Suppose they do: how can the Governor interpose? Suppose he is a pro-slavery Governor even: how can he interpose to prevent any construction the Legislature think proper to put on the act authorizing the call of a convention? They choose to put that construction on it themselves. Can the Government of the United States, the Executive, or Congress, intervene and settle a question of that sort? I should like the gentlemen who have taken the position that we cannot look into any irregularities and fraud, or go beyond what appears on paper, to answer me this question. But it may be retorted on me that that would give peace; they would settle everything under the Leavenworth constitution. But I say no; it would be contested; there would be a minority there, and their efforts to defeat such a construction, under the circumstances, would be the foundation of a new agitation, only changing it somewhat. Parties would array themselves on one side or the other. The groundwork has already been laid for it. This view is supposing that the people of Kansas should accept this ordinance, and be admitted into the Union under the provisions of this new bill.

Suppose, however, that they do not do that: then they have to wait until they have a population of ninety-four thousand. Well, that is no great hardship; but I will tell you where the point presents itself to me as one of serious magnitude. The object of our proceedings here ought to be to do justice, and to settle this controversy as speedily as possible—to cut off the fountains from whence have flowed all these bitter waters. The honorable Senator from Georgia to-day said the people of Kansas had given us so much trouble that he was willing two years ago to bring them in with the population they were said to have at that time—perhaps forty thousand; and is as willing they should come in yet, if they would accept this proposition and take the Lecompton constitution; but if they do not agree to this, he would not agree to admit them until they have a population of ninety-four thousand; for every year he had a diminished and still diminishing opinion of their competency for self-government. His estimation of them on that point is growing less from year to year, on account of their gross immoralities, violence, turbulence, and general demoralization. Well, they have not recently commenced. According to our accounts of them, these violences, these outrages, this demoralization, these frauds, these irregularities have existed for more than two years—we may say, to some extent, ever since the territorial government was organized under the Kansas-Nebraska act. Gentlemen say, if these people will not accept this proposition, and come into the Union with the Lecompton constitution, we are under no obligations to admit them; we will let them fret; we will let them (to use a vulgar term) sweat; he did not use it, but I cannot think of any other more appropriate at present. Let them be punished by continued violence, outrages, frauds, and assassinations; let agitation go on; they do not deserve any other treatment until they have a population of ninety-four thousand; it is a punishment due them.

Well, sir, that is not the view I take of the subject. I want to terminate this controversy, and close these agitations; not for the sake of the people of Kansas so much as for the repose and quiet of the whole country; for the sake of ourselves; on account of both sections of the Union; on account of the suffering and prostrate condition of every branch of private enterprise in the country. I want to put an end to that incubus which has set a dead, paralyzing weight on the energies and enterprises of the country, so long creating distrust and want of confidence in the stability of our Government itself. It is not the people of Kansas alone that we are legislating for or we ought to legislate for on such a question as this; it is the whole country. That is my objection.

I repeat again, that I should probably support the present proposition but for this feature of it, prolonging the controversy for two or three years at least, bringing it into the next canvass for the Presidency almost certainly. Though the free-State men in Kansas, having the power in the Territorial Legislature, should go on comparatively smoothly, how is this question to be presented in the section of the country which is most liable to be excited, agitated, and inflamed by the action of Congress on this subject? You will admit Kansas with forty or fifty thousand inhabitants, under the Lecompton constitution; but if they are to be at liberty to form a new constitution, and a majority of them should be in favor of a free-State constitution, you will have the full pound of flesh; you will bring the rigor of the law, and of the practice of the Government, on the admission of new States, to bear upon them; you will not allow them to enter the Union until they have ninety-four thousand population. That is the way it will be urged. This presentation of the case to the northern people, I do not suppose, would be productive of any fatal consequences; but you are still adding to that mass of anti-slavery sentiment which has grown up in the North under the action of the majority of Congress in the last four years; you are still adding additional weight and consequence to it; you are still swelling the tide of anti-slavery feeling and hostility to, and alienation from, the South. You are doing this, too, on the very eve of a most important election.

Then, if the people of Kansas were to accept this proposition, if it shall be passed, as I suppose it will be, and they should go quietly on, still here is this argument to be presented to the people of the North. "Kansas is no longer suffering," it will be replied. "Yes, but under what circumstances is she kept out of the Union?" it would be retorted; "why is she not now a State of the Union?"

The honorable Senator from Virginia thought a capital objection to the amendment of the honorable Senator from Kentucky was, that the State was to be admitted without our seeing the constitution that might be formed. That amendment provided that if the people of Kansas should not choose to accept the Lecompton constitution they might go on to make a new constitution; and that, upon the people ratifying the new constitution, the State should be admitted upon proclamation by the President. That was considered a fatal objection to the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky. On what ground? Because the Constitution of the United States guarantees a republican form of government to every State in the Union. I shall not take up the time of the Senate now—because I have already occupied more time than I intended in making the statement I have—by going into that argument. I will say, however, that there is no such condition required in the Constitution of the United States at all. The provision of the Constitution that the United States shall guaranty to every State of the Union a republican form of government was intended to guard against revolutions by which an aristocracy, an oligarchy, a monarchy, or a despotism, might be set up or established in any of the States of the Union at any time. The Constitution of the United States was formed on the general presumption that the States would continue to be republican, as they were; that all new States of course would be republican when they should come into the Union; but such were the hatred and jealousy then existing of all anti-republican governments, that it was thought best to insert in the Constitution an express guarantee on this point. It has been our practice to have a constitution before us when we admit into the Union new States formed out of our own territory, but there is no warrant in the Constitution of the United States for demanding any such thing. States have a right to come in without submitting their constitutions to us. Why submit them to us? According to the doctrine of the Senator from Missouri we cannot alter them; we cannot express an approval; we cannot disapprove. The question with us is simply whether we will admit the Territory into the Union as a State. When we do this we have fulfilled our authority under the Constitution of the United States. I had intended to elaborate this point a little further, and to say something more on the general subject; but if it is desired to close debate this evening, I shall not trespass any longer on the attention of the Senate.

Mr. SEWARD. Mr. President, a few days ago there appeared in the newspapers some statements about communications which passed between the honorable Senator from Missouri [Mr. GREEN] and myself, in the progress of the discussions of the committee of conference, which have been placed in my hands, and which carry an impression that is erroneous in regard to the conduct of that honorable Senator as chairman of the committee; and it gives me pleasure to make this statement, to correct that erroneous impression. It is stated in this article:

"When Mr. ENGLISH offered his bill at the conference this morning, it was eagerly accepted by Messrs. GREEN, HUNTER and STEPHENS. Governor SEWARD and Mr. HOWARD asked time to consider, and to have the decision and report postponed till to-morrow morning. Mr. GREEN would not consent. He would only grant two hours, and named two o'clock this afternoon as the hour for reassembling the committee and reporting the English bill to the House and Senate. He very earnestly requested Messrs. SEWARD and HOWARD to be punctual, as he wished to have the question acted upon at once."

What occurred in the committee was this: the honorable Senator from Missouri was chairman of the committee; and when a proposition was made for a postponement for a day, or twenty-four hours, the honorable Senator from Missouri said he thought that was a reasonable request, that we ought to have that time, but he being in the chair, the question was put and carried against us, and we were limited to two hours. It is all right, except that the blame, if there is any, is put upon the honorable chairman, who expressed the desire that we might have the indulgence which we asked. Then, again, the letter goes on to state that:

"At two o'clock, when Messrs. SEWARD and HOWARD went to the committee-room, nobody was there. They waited nearly an hour; no one came. Mr. SEWARD went in search of Mr. GREEN, and found him very much cast down. He inquired what was the matter? Mr. GREEN intimated that the screws were loose, and everything in disorder; a portion of the party was kicking in the traces. 'Do you mean to report to-day?' inquired SEWARD. 'No,' said GREEN, 'not to-day.' 'Will the committee meet to-night?' 'No, not to-night.' 'To-morrow morning?' 'No.' 'When then?' 'Can't tell,' said GREEN moodily; 'I will let you know when we are ready to meet.'"

Very nearly that conversation occurred, but altogether in a spirit entirely different from that. I have authorized nobody to say that the honorable Senator from Missouri acted moodily. The honorable Senator was not ready to report; and this conversation was one in which my own convenience moved me to ask the information from him; and he manifested a desire to gratify me, and said the prospect was that we should not have a meeting that day, but would have one the next, and he would give me notice at all events, and I might go home. It was said in the kindest spirit.

Another thing, Mr. President, while I am up, to show how very apt we are to be misunderstood. I have had nothing but amenity from the honorable chairman, and from all the members of that committee, during all our discussions and debates. I have great pleasure in saying that. Some days ago, I raised a question of order here in debate. The honorable Senator from Missouri objected that there was no point in the question of order which I raised, and I rather thought afterwards that he was about right; but the Chair decided that I was in order. He paused, and said to me, "Very well, then, go on;" and I proceeded with the statement I was making. I said: "I wish to know whether I am to proceed with the permission of the Chair or under the direction of the Senator from Missouri?" and he replied in good humor, and as a joke entirely: "Either is entirely obligatory." That went into the newspapers as being a defiance on his part. It gives me pleasure to make this correction, and to acknowledge that throughout the whole of this debate, so far as that honorable Senator, and every other one with whom I have had any connection in the transaction of this business, is concerned, everything has been conducted with kindness and courtesy, which I hope may always be continued in all our communications.

Mr. GREEN. The Senator from New York desires to make some remarks on the pending question to-morrow, and as it is hardly worth while to prolong the session to night, I move that the further consideration of the subject be postponed until to-morrow at half past twelve o'clock.

Mr. SEWARD. I desire to address the Senate on this subject, and I am very thankful to the honorable Senator from Missouri for the motion he makes, because I am not quite well to-night, and it would be a tax for me to go on now.

Mr. HUNTER. I would suggest to the Senate that if we can do it, we ought to agree upon some hour when the vote shall be taken. The Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. DAVIS,] whose health is delicate, desires to vote, and I should like to fix some hour when we can take the question.

Mr. SEWARD. I will say to the honorable Senator from Virginia, so near as I can, that we understand on this side that the debate is practically closed on the other side; and there is no Senator on this side, I believe, who desires to address the Senate, except the honorable Senator from California, [Mr. BRODERICK,] who is always brief, and will be very brief to-morrow, and myself; and I suppose, if we take up the question at half past twelve o'clock, we may calculate to get through in a very reasonable morning hour.

Mr. HUNTER. Can we get through by three o'clock?

Mr. SEWARD. Certainly by three—perhaps before.

Mr. GREEN. I move that the further consideration of this subject be postponed until half past twelve o'clock, to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. THOMSON, of New Jersey, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 29, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. P. D. GURLEY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ADMISSION OF KANSAS.

Mr. ENGLISH. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on Senate bill No. 161, being a bill for the admission of Kansas, on which the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] demanded the previous question.

Mr. COX. If the gentleman from North Carolina will withdraw that call, I would like to say a few words.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Will the gentleman renew the motion?

Mr. COX. I will.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I will give way with that understanding.

Mr. COX. I am obliged to the gentleman from North Carolina for his kindness in this matter; and I wish to say, with the same kindness with which I have undertaken to do and to say everything which I have done and said here, that we should take care that the admission of a State should be in every respect legitimate. There should be no surreptitious birth of a State into this Union. As this House well knows, I was one of the first upon this floor to enter my protest against the admission of Kansas without a sanction of her constitution by the people.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. Yes, the very first.

Mr. COX. And I am among the first now, sir, to come forward, in the spirit, as I conceive, of honorable concession. When gentlemen upon the Republican side of the House have conceded so much and so honorably, and when gentlemen upon all sides of the House have conceded so much and so honorably, I will not be laggard in this work of honorable settlement.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to have my position understood before the country and before my people. That I opposed the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution all know. I opposed it because I did not believe in the omnipotence of the convention which framed it; because there was no express or implied sanction of that constitution by the people. But now, sir, after the most careful reflection upon the subject, after the most careful consideration of it in every relation, in relation to my party, in relation to my State, in relation to the Union, in relation to the welfare of the people of Kansas, and in relation to the dispatch of public business, I have come to a deliberate conclusion this morning to vote for the conference bill; because it gives the people of Kansas a chance to kill Lecompton, though they use the ordinance to do it. I ask the privilege simply to give my reasons, my honest reasons, for the vote which I shall give to-day upon this question.

In the bill proposed by the committee of conference there is no proposition to submit, in so many words, the constitution itself to the people. I am willing to concede that, and it seemed to be claimed, in the language used by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. Davis,] yesterday. Though it is not submitted, yet there is a means provided in this bill by which, if the constitution does not meet with the approbation of the people of Kansas, they can give expression to that will. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Davis] well remarked yesterday, that it is like the old vote by shells in the Grecian Agora, where the vote for "banishment" or "no banishment" of a traitor to the State might be given by the use of these shells. The substance was in such a vote. The shells were the medium of expression only. I am after the substance. In this case the substance, though perhaps not the shadow, of a submission is given to the people of Kansas upon this question.

The fact that the popular voice of Kansas is thus expressed, is not an objection to this matter. I would have preferred a more direct, straightforward vote. Still, this has given me no trouble. By the mode proposed by the committee, the power is placed in the people of Kansas, by which they can spurn this constitution if they do not like it. That seems to be conceded on all sides. But some objection is made on the alleged ground of bribes offered to the people to vote. I have given that question a careful consideration. I find the language which is used in the conference bill to be the same as that used in the Crittenden-Montgomery bill, for which Republicans, Americans, and the anti-Lecompton Democrats voted. I find that it is copied in the Minnesota enabling act, and I find that it is in accordance with the general course of the legislation of the country.

Mr. GILMER. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. COX. So that whether the people of Kansas accept this constitution or reject it, still Kansas will get this land for the benefit of her schools, her university, and for other purposes provided in this act. Therefore I conceive that there is no bribe offered in this bill. The people can do as they please. They are at perfect liberty to kill this constitution by the means proposed by the conference bill if they please, and they will in the end, by the process of legislation, as every gentleman here knows, get the same lands, whether they vote one way or the other. That only is a bribe which is given as a consideration for a vote; but there is no consideration here offered, which they would not get under other circumstances. That matter gives me no trouble. Neither does the commission which is raised here give me any trouble; for I have full faith in Governor Denver, and I know the district attorney is disposed to deal fairly in this matter. Of the other three commissioners, one is a Federal officer, and the other two are free-State territorial officers.

The doubt which I have, the honest doubt which I have endeavored to settle in the spirit of concession, is the fact that Lecompton is offered to Kansas now on the condition that if she does not take it she must abide by the rule laid down in the Cincinnati platform, and await the time when her population shall equal the ratio of one Representative in Congress. I think this rule is a salutary rule. The difficulty is in its present application to Kansas. I trust that this difficulty will be obviated. It has been said that if she does not come in now she will remain out for a long time. I have made inquiries of men who understand the state of things in Kansas. I have sought Governor Walker himself, and he tells me that he has no doubt that Kansas will have the requisite population by next fall. That was a simple matter of fact I was bound to inquire into, and of which I am entirely satisfied.

Some objection may be raised that, under this bill, the census must be taken; and that, as the Federal census cannot be taken until 1860, Kansas will be kept out of the Union until that time. Now, by the language of this bill, I find that the census here required to be taken is simply a census under the territorial laws—a census "duly and legally taken;" and therefore, that, as soon as they prescribe the rules for taking that census, and a sufficient population appears, they can come into the Union under the provisions of this act. Therefore, there is no such long postponement. The postponement would be no longer than the present fall, if the bill be honestly pursued.

I trust the House will do me the justice to accord to my course honest motives. I have stood here for four months acting with gentlemen whom I have found ready and willing to make concessions upon this vexed subject. The Republican party conceded much when they voted to admit a slave State in case the people ratified it. I have no taunts at, or complaints to make of them for that. I have acted with them on that question, and against my own party friends; and I have stood here bareheaded, as it were, for four months, to claim for the people of Kansas the right to pass on this constitution before I could vote to admit under it. If I understand all the relations which this question sustains to the country, it is my honest opinion, after considering all its phases, that the best thing we can do now is to vote for the report of this committee of conference, which gives a substantial submission of the constitution to the people of Kansas.

If I had any doubt as to the propriety of the course I have taken, I would forego any objections to the bill such as I have stated, because it is the unanimous voice of the delegation of my State upon the Democratic side of the House. I confess to having some deference to their good judgment. I confess, also, that I have some deference to the opinion of my party, North and South. I am not insensible to my party obligations; and when I can see that by a certain course we can attain substantially all I desire, I am willing to make some concessions. I owe to the Democracy all I am and all I hope to be. And I owe that party my fealty, and I am ready to show it in this matter when I can see that I am acting for the best. By acting in accordance with my humble desire to do the best, I feel better satisfied if I can act in harmony with my party. I reject all blandishments, come from what quarter they may. I come forward in the spirit of harmony in order that we may have a united Democracy and a united country, that we may carry on the business of the nation with dispatch and with reference to its highest interests.

Sir, the public interest demands a settlement of this question. The people will hail its settlement, even in this form; and though it may not be perfect in all respects, yet the nation will leap from the incubus of this Kansas matter as from a nightmare. The North and South will hail it as a deliverance from trouble. Unless we have this deliverance, sectional asperities will again embitter our politics. We will go home to meet them at every turn of political discussion. I do not take pleasure in such a prospect. When I go to Ohio, I prefer to feel that I am in a State which knows its sister States in a full and cordial fellowship.

When I think of my own State and old Kentucky, and of our past associations; when I think of the trials that they had during the late war, in Ohio, together, when the Kentucky hunters came across the Ohio river, knowing no boundary save the boundary of Canada, and fought against the red coats and the red skins, side by side with our own Ohio people; when I see the coat-of-arms of old Kentucky, which is painted in the glass above me—two friends with clasped hands, with the significant motto: "united we stand, divided we fall"—when I think of all these things, in the spirit of concession and harmony, though this bill may not, in every respect, conform to my best judgment, I am willing to go with my delegation, and to go with my party, and to give my heart and hand for this vote. I now call for the previous question.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I ask my colleague to withdraw that call and to let the other side of Ohio be heard and the other side of Kentucky.

[Loud cries of "No! no!" and great confusion.]

Mr. CLARK, of New York. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will not insist on that call.

[Cries of "Hold on to it," and continued confusion.]

Mr. LAWRENCE. Will my colleague yield to me for one moment?

Mr. COX. I will yield to my colleague for a moment, but I do not withdraw the call for the previous question.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Speaker, with the permission of my colleague, [Mr. Cox,] and promising to renew his demand for the previous question, I wish to submit a few remarks explanatory of the vote I am about to give on the conference proposition for the admission of Kansas. This is due not alone to myself and my constituents, but to the Democratic party of my State and of the nation.

As is well known to every member upon this floor, I have, for months, opposed the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, without its first being submitted to a vote of the people. This I believed to be the doctrine of "popular sovereignty" as declared in the Kansas and Nebraska bill, and as reaffirmed in the Cincinnati platform.

To me there is no force in the objection that the "Lecompton constitution" is not expressly submitted. It is, beyond all doubt, a substantial submission. By one form of ballot, the people can reject that instrument; by another form of ballot, they can vitalize it. Without the fiat of the people in its behalf, it is as though it had never been made. Gentlemen may quibble about the form, but while I get the substance, I shall not object.

Nor is there any truth in the charge that it is a bribe offered to the people of Kansas, in the shape of land grants, to accept the Lecompton constitution. The quantity now offered them is the quantity usually granted to new States. It is the same granted by the Lecompton ordinance; it is the same granted by the Crittenden-Montgomery amendment, for which I voted. In this view of it, therefore, I cannot object.

I am free to say, however, that it is not in every respect such a bill as I would have preferred; but under all the circumstances surrounding this vexed question, with a due regard to the peace and quiet of the country, and the restoration of union and harmony to that party of which it is my pride and boast to be an humble member, I have concluded to give my vote for this measure.

In arriving at this conclusion, I cheerfully say I have made sacrifices; other gentlemen have done likewise. Let me now indulge the hope that this question may be settled, and that its settlement may be regarded as a peace measure, and be the harbinger of future successes to the great national Democratic party of the country.

In that party I was born; in it I have spent my better days; in it I expect to die; and if political death should be my fate for this vote, my only request is, that I may die in the Democratic party, and have the ample folds of her patriotic banner my winding-sheet. However, I fear no such consequences. I represent an intelligent and patriotic people. To them I appeal for the rectitude of my conduct; and to their decision I cheerfully submit.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I am reluctant to interrupt the gentleman, but I desire to know if he is speaking by general consent?

[Cries of "No! no!"]

Mr. COX. I yielded to my colleague.

Mr. CLINGMAN. But has the gentleman withdrawn the demand for the previous question?

Mr. LAWRENCE. I shall renew the call.

Mr. COX. I still hold the floor.

Mr. CLINGMAN. If the gentleman's colleague is speaking by unanimous consent, I shall not object.

[Loud cries of "Object! object!"]

Mr. COX. I have not lost the floor, but I have given way for a moment to my friend.

Mr. GROW. Can the floor be farmed out in this way?

The SPEAKER. Only so long as the House, by its assent, permits it.

Mr. GROW. I object to the farming out of the floor.

Mr. COX. I demand the previous question.

Mr. GARNETT. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to withdraw the demand for the previous question, to allow me to give a notice in relation to this matter.

Mr. COX. Oh, no; I cannot withdraw it.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I appeal to my colleague to withdraw the demand, and let his colleagues on this side of the House be heard.

Mr. COX. I voted to bring this question to a close on Wednesday last. I did it because I was prepared to vote.

[Cries of "Order! order!"]

Mr. CLARK, of New York. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the demand for the previous question, and not claim an exclusive monopoly of the business of recantation. Perhaps some of the rest of us will follow suit. Why not give us a chance?

Mr. COX. I have renewed the demand for the previous question.

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania. It seems that no one outside of the Democratic party has a right to be heard here. I think this side of the House has as much right to be heard as that.

[Loud cries of "Order!" and great confusion.]
The SPEAKER. The gentleman has no right to be heard out of order.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I move that there be a call of the House; and upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GARNETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to give notice that, if the previous question be voted down, I shall move to postpone this question until Tuesday week.

The question was taken on Mr. CAMPBELL's motion; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 90, nays 119; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Bliss, Bonham, Bratton, Bryan, Buffinton, Burlingame, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Horace P. Clark, Clawson, Clark B. So the House refused to order a call.

Mr. HATCH stated that he had paired off until one o'clock with Mr. Burnovich.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, stated that he had paired off upon all political questions with Mr. Wood, or he should have voted "no."

Mr. RITCHIE stated that Mr. Perviance had paired off with Mr. Dimmick until Wednesday next, and not until Tuesday next as stated in the Globe.

The question recurred upon the demand for the previous question.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will withdraw the demand for the previous question until I can make a few remarks. [Cries of "No! no!"]

Mr. COX. I cannot see that any good can come of it, and I therefore decline to withdraw the call.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Then I trust the House will vote it down.

Mr. GARNETT. I rise to a question of order. I wish to inquire of the Chair whether, if the previous question is voted down it will be in order to move to postpone the subject until Tuesday week?

The SPEAKER. Such a motion will be in order if the previous question is voted down.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, demanded tellers on the second.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. CRAIG, of North Carolina, and BUFFINTON, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 103, noes 108.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I rise for the first time since the topic of Kansas has been introduced into the councils of this country to open my mouth upon the subject.

The bill which is presented by the managers of the conference is the legitimate fruit of the original Kansas and Nebraska bill that came in with the face of Janus. This is likely to go out with the impress upon it that belongs to its origin.

What a spectacle is exhibited to the American people to-day when their Representatives are engaged over a measure, the authors of which do not agree, and cannot agree, upon its meaning! Some of them have addressed this House—one, whose votes upon the Senate bill indicated a direct antagonism to that measure, now sustains this proposition warmly upon the ground that it does submit the Lecompton constitution to a vote of the people; while others, who are committed, as far as language can commit men, to the proposition that the people of Kansas are bound by the work of the convention, now sustain this measure upon the predicate that it does not submit the Lecompton constitution to a vote of the people!

Two of the authors of this measure—the managers upon the part of the Senate—have risen in their places and avowed that they had carefully guarded the point of submission, and that it does not submit the constitution to the people. Yesterday the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] who was one of the managers on the part of the House, stated emphatically that the principle of non-submission was carefully preserved in this bill, while the other manager upon the part of the House, the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. ENGLISH,] replies that the Lecompton constitution is submitted to the people by the report of the conferees.

Mr. ENGLISH. I would like to know in what part of my speech the gentleman from Kentucky finds authority to make any such statement?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. If I have done the gentleman from Indiana injustice, I will yield for explanation.

Mr. ENGLISH. That is not the question. The gentleman from Kentucky makes a statement in regard to my position. I call upon him to point to the time and place where I have taken any such position. I have not yet defined my position on the point.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. My inference of the gentleman's position upon this point was drawn from the remarks made by him; and I ask the gentleman, since he challenges the inference, whether he understands the bill as the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] understands it, or does he understand it just the other way?

Mr. ENGLISH. This bill is drawn in tolerably good English, [laughter,] and I suppose the gentleman from Kentucky understands that language, and is competent to judge what the meaning of the bill is.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. If that is all the answer the gentleman has to give, it may go to the country with my mark upon it, that the author here, when the meaning of this act is challenged, declines to tell us what he meant by it, in the face of the declaration upon the part of his colleague that just the opposite is meant by it to what all these gentlemen pretend to understand, who have suddenly found great virtues in the bill.

When the member from Ohio [Mr. Cox] was speaking this morning, I could not help thinking of that old hymn, which I will slightly paraphrase:

"Why should we mourn departed friends,
Or shake at death's alarms?
'Tis but the voice that party sends,
To bring him to its arms."

We may be defeated in this measure—

Mr. LAWRENCE. And I would quote for the edification of the gentleman from Kentucky, that—"While the lamp holds out to burn,

The vilest sinner may return."

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Very appropriate. While I apply one verse to the gentleman, [Mr. Cox,] his colleague, who is in the same category, makes another for himself. [Laughter.] May it be his epitaph!

Mr. COX. Whilst the gentleman is taking orders and singing hymns, let me ask him where is his party, to which he would invite us? I do not see it in the House. Is it the Republican party, or is it the American party?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. My party is the American party—the party of the Union.

Mr. COX. I stand up for the Democratic party, which always makes compromises, as our fathers made them in the Constitution, and as they have been made for the perpetuity of the Constitution.

If the gentleman will allow me, further, I have made some concession. The gentleman knows it. Where I see the substance of a thing, I will not, to the disruption of my party, upon which I think so much depends, run after the shadow.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I want the gentleman from Ohio to understand distinctly, as well as the other gentlemen with whom it was my fortune to act, that I am not here to impugn motives, and that I am not here to challenge the purity with which any gentleman has changed his convictions; for, sir, as I claim integrity of purpose for myself, I will yield the same claim to others.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman say that I have changed my convictions?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I will not say that the gentleman has changed his convictions; but certainly he has altered his course.

Mr. COX. I wish the gentleman to understand distinctly, that from the time that the report from the conference committee came in, I have had it under consideration. I had the matter presented from both sides. We are two hundred and thirty-four members here, of diverse opinions, and when we adopt a measure, it cannot be expected that all who favor it, do so with the same opinion of it. We must yield some of our opinions. The gentleman must admit that he did indirectly impugn my motives. When I come forward and attempt to sustain this compromise as the very best I could get, I do not, by any means, say that it conforms to my best judgment; or that it is as perfect as I could wish it. It is the best, under the circumstances, for the country and the party.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I object. My colleague had the floor this morning, and would not yield to any of us. He spoke himself, and refusing others the chance to reply, called for the previous question.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. All I have to say about this matter, can be said without any further interruption.

[A message was here received from the Senate, by Mr. HICKEY, their Chief Clerk, notifying the House that that body insisted on its amendments to the deficiency bill, and asked for a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and that it had appointed as managers of said conference on its part, Messrs. TOOMBS, BIGGS, and FESSENDEN. Also notifying the House that that body had passed a joint resolution and a bill, of the following titles, in which he was directed to ask its concurrence:

A resolution (S. No. 33) authorizing suitable acknowledgments to be made by the President to the British naval authorities at Jamaica, for the relief extended to the officers and crew of the United States ship Susquehanna, disabled by yellow fever.

An act (S. No. 298) for the relief of Catharine Jacobs, widow of Francis Jacobs, a waiter in the military household of General Washington.]

Mr. LETCHER. I ask the gentleman from Kentucky to permit me to make a motion concerning the deficiency bill, which has just been returned from the Senate.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I do not care to have a motion made inside my speech.

Mr. LETCHER. I move that the House insist on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the deficiency bill, and that it agree to the committee of conference asked for on the disagreeing votes between the two Houses.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objections, and it is ordered accordingly.

Mr. CLEMENS. I object.

Several MEMBERS. Too late.

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair it is too late.

Messrs. LETCHER, MACLAY, and NICHOLS were appointed managers of the conference on the part of the House.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I desire, before we take the vote on this bill, frankly to state the objections I have to it. The bill does substantially submit the Lecompton constitution to a vote of the people of Kansas, notwithstanding the declaration of my friend from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] and notwithstanding the declarations which have been made in another place, that in the drafting of this bill there was an attempt to preserve the principle of non-submission. If you were to put to the people of Kansas the proposition that the moon was made of green cheese, and say to them that they might take the question of admission with that proposition, and if they voted in the affirmative on that proposition, they should be admitted under the Lecompton constitution; but if they voted in the negative on that proposition, the Lecompton constitution should be considered dead, it does not require any very severe logic to deduce the conclusion that, in fact, they had an opportunity, through an immaterial proposition, to vote on the question of admission.

But I object to the manner of submission. It seems to save the pulses of gentlemen here at the expense of the history of the country, and at the expense of the sense of the people of Kansas. You require them to vote for the rejection of this proposition, which is immaterial in itself, and to conceal the fact that they are voting against the Lecompton constitution. Why take this course? What motive have you to-day, except that, by the manner of this proposition, you seek to conceal from the country that you, who vault so high, have, in fact, come down?

To another branch of that report I am determinedly opposed, because it presents a condition that is degrading to the people of the North. I ask the people of the South to hear me. We of the slaveholding States are in this Chamber in a minority of fifty. Suppose that this Lecompton constitution, instead of introducing a slave State, introduced a free State, and that the majority of the representatives of this country had sent that constitution back with this immaterial proposition attached to it, saying to the people of Kansas, "take these lands, and you can come in as a free State; but if you attempt to come here with a slave State constitution, you must come under a legal census," showing ninety-three thousand inhabitants: come here with a slave constitution, and you must show regular papers," would not my fellow-citizens of the slaveholding States have rejected such a proposition with indignation and scorn? By what sort of ethics, in this council of equals, can we, who are legislating for all sections, attempt to propose one thing to the North, which we would consider ourselves insulted by if proposed to the South? Sir, the men who send me here do not send me here to play the sectionalist; they do not send me here as a steward to see how much I can get for the slave States, and how much I can wrest from the free States. Whenever they want to degrade me to that position, I shall be here no longer. I have learned in the school of morals in which I was raised, that, among equals, it is not fair and proper to propose what you would not be willing to accept; and, as a southern man—not, not as a southern man, for I never claimed to be a southern man—but as a western man, as a citizen belonging to that section of the country which has a minority, by representation, upon this floor, I am unwilling to lay down a rule of action which in its sequences offers nothing but sackcloth and ashes to my people.

And when you men of the South apply this rule to the North, how can you, when the next case arises in this country of a similar nature, resist the application of the same rule? With what face will you stand up and complain of any inequality which may be attempted to be enforced upon you by a majority of the representatives of this country? They will refer you to your own act, your own vote, as having established the precedent. What opportunity would you have to escape from the consequence of this act?

Gentlemen hug a delusion to their bosoms, when they suppose that under this bill, animated by a desire to have this grant of land, or to acquire immediate political position, the people of Kansas will be induced to accept this proposition, and that we shall then have a summer's sea before us. This is a sheer delusion. Kansas will reject this proposition. If you are prudent men, reason with me upon the supposition of its rejection, and look then to the consequences which are to flow from that fact.

What will those consequences be? Every free State of this Union will at once arouse itself to repeal the disabling part of this very bill. All the sluices of that pernicious agitation which has flowed over this country like lava for years past, will be reopened. Repeal will be the shibboleth of party in the next election of the North. The free States will say to you, in April Kansas had population enough to be a slave State; in December following she has population enough to be a free State. So help me God! if I were a northern man I should feel it my duty to open that direct attack. I would feel that you had attached a condition to the passage of this measure which degraded me from that equality about which you know we have talked so much, and upon which we have insisted so strictly. And until that equality was restored, I should exert myself, were I a northern man, up to the full point of my capacity to have it restored by all legitimate means.

What will be the next effect? This House will, in the next Congress, be filled by men sent here to rectify this wrong, and the South will be compelled to accede to that demand or to resist. Her pride may be wounded; her sensibilities are to be affected; and then the next movement of those who play to her prejudices will be to drag her over the precipice of disunion, in that moment when she smarts under the effect of stung and wounded pride. It is exactly because I see these consequences ahead, that I am to-day firm and steady in opposition. I look forward on the path before us, and I see it leads to that alternative which I have said is most likely to occur, and my duty and patriotism alike demand that I should resist this bill, and advocate that equality which is equity between all sections of my country. I take that position, and cheerfully I shall rest upon it, satisfied that I am right, and I shall be sustained in by a patriotic constituency.

Sir, it were bootless to return to the Senate bill; but, as I am upon the floor, I will recapitulate in brief terms—for I do not want to detain the House—the heads and points upon which my own opinions have turned thus far, and by which my course has been guided. I heard the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] yesterday propound the question to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. DAVIS] whether he believed the Territorial Legislature which called the convention in Kansas had the power to call a convention? I do not know what response was made, but I desire to say to the gentleman from Georgia, and to the country, that that very point is the hinge point upon which my convictions on this matter turn. I do not believe that the Territorial Legislature possessed the power to initiate a convention to such a degree as to bind either Kansas or the Congress of the United States. I believe that when that convention was assembled, and when it had drafted a constitution, the want of the present of Congress prevented the instrument from binding Congress; and if it did not bind Congress, it could not bind the people of Kansas. If I had time, I could demonstrate that proposition. And, sir, when the people of Kansas sent up to us, through her Delegate upon this floor, who has a legal status here, by the resolutions of her Legislature, which is a legal body—through her vote on the 4th of January, regular or irregular—through the territorial Governor, who was the Federal appointee—and through the territorial Secretary—through all these channels the clear, distinct declaration, "we are not willing that this constitution shall be the fundamental, political law of the State;" believing as I did, and as I yet do, that the Legislature which initiated it had no legal right to do so, that the President who consented had no jurisdiction, and therefore his consent yielded no additional power, I felt myself bound to pause, and listen to the voice of the people. Sir, no specious sophistries could dissuade me, and no casuistry betray me. After all, it finally comes to this, whether we are to obey the dictum of the convention or the will of the people. While I had liberty to act, while it was within my congressional function to act, I did not hesitate to take that position which had a tendency to give the fairest chance to the people of Kansas to make a constitution to suit themselves, before establishing relations with them by law, under which relations I might be called upon next week to compel them, by force of arms, to obey that instrument as their constitution.

But, sir, I will not dwell on the Senate bill, or the amendment of the House, but shall confine myself to this report. We have had a conference; and I say that, in my opinion, the conference have submitted the question so that the people of Kansas may get hold of it, but can get hold of it only at the expense of stultifying themselves. It is accompanied with a disabling act, which, in my opinion, makes an invidious distinction between the free and the slave States of the country in regard to their institutions, which will have a tendency to wound the pride of the majority, and to establish a rule of action that it is unsafe for us to pursue. We, who belong to that section of the country that is in a minority of representation, ought to be wonderfully careful that, whenever we institute a rule of action here, it shall be based upon immutable principles of justice and constitutional right.

Now, sir, without wishing to detain the House, I plant myself upon these propositions as indicating the reasons why I oppose this bill. Let us have another conference, if you please. Strike off that disabling act and leave the enabling act, and it will come sufficiently close to the Crittenden-Montgomery amendment for me to vote for it; because what I wanted at the commencement, and what I want at the close, is a fair settlement of the Kansas difficulty. I do not want, and never have wanted, to leave the Kansas difficulty open. Had a majority of the members of this House been of my opinion at the start, I would have laid down the principle that no State should be admitted into the Union without sufficient population—upon a legal census—for proper representation. I would have settled that point at the commencement, and I would have guided myself by it in the case of Kansas; but there is scarcely any one here of my way of thinking. I would rather go back to that rule and now establish it, immutably, if it were possible, establish it as the rule for the future, rather than any other rule. I know I cannot find other advocates of it; on the contrary, it is proposed to bring in Kansas with a population of forty, fifty, or sixty thousand people—I do not know how many there are, but I do not think there are over forty thousand; I have never seen any mode of calculation that would make her population more than forty thousand. Some gentleman said this morning that Governor Walker thinks she will have a population of ninety-three thousand by the fall. I do not know what his calculations are, or how fast immigration is going there. But, if she must be admitted, the plain, fair, equitable proposition is the proposition of the Crittenden-Montgomery amendment. Gentlemen upon this side of the House, who voted for that proposition, voted for it with their eyes open. They voted for it not only as an amendment, but they voted for it to make it an act of Congress. They did so, well understanding that it embraced the principle that if it was the will of the people of Kansas that she should be a slave State, they conceded that she should be.

Mr. BURNETT. Will my colleague allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. No, sir; I shall get through directly.

Mr. BURNETT. My colleague does not represent the gentlemen on the other side correctly.

Several Voices on the Republican side. "Yes he does."

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I will yield to any interruption from any member of the Republican party who wants to rise and contradict the statement.

Mr. BURNETT. Why will not the gentleman yield to me, one of his colleagues, to put a question to gentlemen upon the other side?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Because I do not want to be interrupted—because I am not making a speech here for party effect upon the country. I repeat to my colleague, and I repeat it to the American people, here in my place, that if there is in this Hall a member of the Republican party who did not fully and entirely understand, when he voted for the Crittenden-Montgomery proposition, that he was assuming the position which I have stated, he can rise in his place and contradict me.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Certainly, sir.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I desire to say that I agree in every particular with the sentiment just uttered by the gentleman from Kentucky, and I will say, that so far as my knowledge extends, every Republican member of the House read, carefully considered, and pondered over the Crittenden amendment, and voted for it with his eyes open; but with the distinct understanding that the gentlemen from the free States, belonging to the Democratic party, had pledged to us their faith and honor that they only wanted a fair, straightforward, open opportunity to carry out their principle of popular sovereignty in Kansas, and that they would stand by and adhere to the proposition made in that amendment. Relying with implicit faith upon this understanding, we voted for the amendment, and have steadily adhered to it.

Mr. BURNETT. I ask my colleague—for I know he does not want the facts to go to the country with a misunderstanding—to let me propound a question to the gentlemen on the other side.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Why, the gentleman will have an opportunity after I am done.

Mr. BURNETT. But I cannot get it into your speech. My colleague allows Black Republicans to make explanations, but will not allow his own colleague to ask even a single question.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I will yield to the senior member from Ohio, [Mr. GIDDINGS,] who is a member of the Republican party, as we all know.

Mr. GIDDINGS. It is probably known, Mr. Speaker, that I was about the last to go into the support of that Crittenden-Montgomery amendment; and I assure the gentleman from Kentucky, I assure the members of this House and the country, that the only inducement that I had to go for it was that I understood—I did not hear it myself—but I understood that every gentleman belonging to the Douglas wing of the Democratic party stood pledged to the country and to themselves and to their constituencies, to stand by that proposition forever.

[Loud cries from the Republican side of the House of "That is true!"]

Mr. GIDDINGS was here taken with sudden indisposition, and was carried out of the Hall in a fainting condition.]

Mr. COX. With the permission of the gentleman from Kentucky—

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I understand the object of the gentleman from Ohio, which is to rectify my statement in regard to his wing of the Democratic party. I think the gentleman can as easily fix that matter when I get through, as now.

Mr. BURNETT. I understood the gentleman from Kentucky to yield the floor to me.

Mr. COX. I appeal to the gentleman as a matter of personal courtesy.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. The gentleman from Ohio will have an opportunity after I have concluded what I have to say.

Mr. BURNETT. I want the fact to go to the country that my colleague declines to yield for correction.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. It may go to the country that his colleague declines, and it may go to the country that his colleague has the floor here—this House having voted down the demand for the previous question—but that the gentleman voted for it. It may go that his colleague does not want to occupy much time, but wants the facts and reasons to go to the country, which will justify his action and disarm those men who have set upon him in the country, because, forsooth, he voted with the Black Republican party. Sir, I am here to-day to say that upon such a vote, whenever cast and whenever to be cast, I will stand with the Black Republican party, or any other party that has the patriotism and the honesty to cast it.

Sir, you and I have served in this Hall long enough for you to know that I am committed to the line of policy upon which I have acted in this matter; and committed to it, I am proud to say, irrevocably. I would like to know whether, with the principles which we have ever contended for, which we contended for in 1850, which are contained in your Cincinnati platform, contained in the American platform, and in whatever else you have covered under the title of popular sovereignty—to wit: that the will of the people in each locality should determine their own institutions, whether slave or free—any sane man could expect me to vote otherwise than as I have voted? When these men from the North come up and patriotically give their votes for that principle, why is it that they are taunted with the epithet of Black Republicans? What more do you want than the principle for which they voted? What more have you ever demanded? What other principle have we ever stood upon than the very principle which that vote asserted? We have stood upon it because it reached a platform upon which every honest man, from every section of this country, could stand. That vote fulfilled the conditions of your platform touching the slavery issue. It filled my platform; it filled the platform of all of us who advocated the principle of popular sovereignty in the true meaning of that term. And what do you now propose?

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker—

[Calls to order.]

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I decline to yield the floor.

Mr. COX. I wish to say—

[Cries of "Order! order! order!"]

Mr. PALMER. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman from Ohio has no right to interrupt the gentleman from Kentucky, except by his permission.

The SPEAKER. That is very true.

Mr. PALMER. The gentleman has repeatedly done it, and continues to do it, and I insist on the rule being enforced.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky declines to yield the floor. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. PALMER,] however, will remember that it has been the universal practice of the House for a gentleman to rise and ask another gentleman to yield the floor. The rule requires that before another gentleman may take the floor, the gentleman legitimately entitled to it shall signify his assent. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Kentucky peremptorily declines to yield.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I hope I shall now be allowed to go on and finish what I have to say.

I say that these Republicans had come up to all that we ever contended for touching the equality of the States and the right of the people of Kansas to establish their own institutions in their own way; and they have come up to it with the intent to make it the law. Had the people of Kansas received the Crittenden amendment; had they chosen to adopt the Lecompton constitution, and to establish slavery in that State, then these gentlemen have provided all the instrumentalities necessary to the procurement of such a result. But when the Republicans yielded this, you, gentlemen of the Democratic party, would not have it! It will be for you to go to the South and tell the South what there was in that amendment, what there was in that principle, that fell short of all your former requirements. Was it that you could not stand the proclamatory power of the President, in case the people of Kansas adopted another constitution? Then, be it remarked that when the bill, as offered by Mr. CRITTENDEN in the Senate, required that, if they adopted another constitution in Kansas, it should be sent to Congress, members of the Democratic party opposed it on the ground that it did not close the question, but kept the Kansas imbroglio open. When the Montgomery-Crittenden amendment provided for closing it, as we supposed would suit you, you then opposed it, because it would be giving too much power to the President.

Mr. Speaker, I have tried in this matter to do exactly what was right. I have kept in my mind's eye, all the time, the tendencies I see before me in this country. I knew that the Gulf States had made platforms upon which, it was said, they would feel bound to secede from the Union. I am told to go forward, lest they do secede. Now, sir, who is so bold, in this assembly, as to rise and say that he is a disunionist? Not one. Who is there, in this assembly, who will rise in his place and say that he will go to the southern States with the black flag of disunion unfurled for that people to follow? There is a silence, sir, over this House, in response to that inquiry, like the silence of the grave. Secession! disunion! Why, sir, 'tis the eye of childhood that fears the painted devil." I have no fear of disunion. I have no fear that the people of the South will listen for a moment to the whispers of disunion. They are chivalrous, brave, and true; and woe to the politician who proclaims himself a disunionist!

But, sir, I had heard of discontents, and I was careful; and I choose to say to the South, that, when I exerted myself to get these Republican members to put themselves upon that vote, I did so with an eye to the fact that there were platforms formed at the South which I did hope that vote would sink forever and forever. Now I am here to render also to that party the tribute of my hearty and sincere thanks, my honest and profound obligation, that their patriotism was equal to the task of giving that vote, which I believe they did with a wish to establish peace and concord between all sections, and with the hope that that vote would accomplish it.

Now, sir, who in the South wants to establish a sectional southern party? The Democrats are not content with the proposition that the doctrine of popular sovereignty shall be carried forward, and that the people of Kansas may have a State free or slave, as they prefer. They now proceed one step beyond that. I read from a paper of Tuesday, April 27, the Richmond South. I will read a single sentence, to let you see the manner in which the progress of this controversy is regarded, and the point which we have reached:

"In the mean time, if the Senate bill pass, Kansas may come into the Union as a slave State, or she cannot come at all. That is the issue."

You who represent the South, I ask you in the most solemn earnestness if that is the issue upon which you propose to go to the country? I ask you if that is the issue upon which you are prepared to precipitate the South? Your platform made the declaration that the people of Kansas might determine this matter—that the people of Kansas were to have the right to vote whether they would be a free State or a slave State.

But you are understood in the country by this bill to have made up the issue, as I understand it, that she shall come here as a slave State, or she is not to come at all. Does it not result from that proposition that you are attempting to inaugurate in this country an aggressive pro-slavery party—a party that does not stand upon the constitutional rights of the people of all sections, but a southern pro-slavery party which proposes to flaunt its banners in the face of the other sections, and to say to them that they must bow down to your Juggernaut? The people of Kentucky are not ready to go that far. I have never in the whole course of my legislative experience understood a point in controversy better than I do this which you Democrats propose, and never before were my conclusions so firmly fixed as to the absolute propriety of my political course. I am willing that the principle, the philosophy, the morality, and the prudence of my action may be judged of by the people of my native State; and as I only seek to do to others what I would they should do to me, I shall abide in the confidence that Kentucky will sustain my feeble effort to act with justice, with moderation, and with fairness in those acts of legislation which relate to the rights of all, but which are to be illustrated by our course in the case of Kansas, as an exponent of the principles we follow. I yield the floor.

Mr. GARNETT. I move that the further consideration of this question be postponed until the second Tuesday in May next, at one o'clock.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I hope not, and I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. I ask to be heard before that question is taken.

Mr. MILLSON. I ask the same favor.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that motion.

Mr. GARNETT. So far as I am concerned, I would be perfectly willing to withdraw the motion if we could at this time determine upon what day the vote on this question shall be taken. If I withdraw it for one of these three gentlemen I must withdraw it for the other three. It opens the debate and leaves us to come back to-morrow and try over the same thing. I therefore feel constrained to press my motion.

Mr. HUGHES. I call the previous question.
Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I move that the motion be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. That would carry the bill with it.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Then I withdraw the motion.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. COBB. I object to gentlemen asking questions of the Chair.

Mr. BENNETT. I rise to a question of order. I ask whether, if the previous question is sustained, it would not cut off the motion to postpone?

Mr. COBB. I object to the Chair answering any such questions.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand that as a question of order. The Chair has already given an intimation as to the effect of sustaining the previous question, two or three times.

Mr. ENGLISH called for tellers.
Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WRIGHT, of Georgia, and WALDRON were appointed.

Mr. GROW. I desire to inquire whether the motion to postpone is pending?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. GROW. Then the previous question, if sustained, cuts off that motion?

The SPEAKER. It does.

The House divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 99, noes 105.

So the House refused to second the previous question.

Mr. GARNETT. Is the question now upon the motion I made to postpone?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. GARNETT. But the previous question cannot be called so as to bring the House to a vote upon it?

The SPEAKER. The previous question would cut off the motion to postpone.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I am tired of this mode of getting along, and I intend now to do what I have never done before, to my recollection—to make a motion which will bring up this question directly, and which I shall vote against. I move to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. HOUSTON demanded the yeas and nays.
The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 101, nays 113; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Eufimion, Burlingame, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Horace, Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cragin, Curtis, Danrell, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Edie, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Goach, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, J. Morrison Harris, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hickman, Hoard, Howard, Kellogg, Kehey, Kluge, Knapp, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, McKibbin, Humphreys, Marshall, Samuel S. Marshall, Morgan, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murny, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Shaw, Ricard, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Aaron Squire, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Robert Smith, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Tompkins, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Ellihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, and Wilson—101.

NAYS—Messrs. Ahl, Anderson, Atkins, Avery, Barkdale, Bishop, Bocoek, Bonham, Bowie, Boyce, Branks, Bryan, Burnett, Burns, Caruthers, Caskie, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Corning, Cox, James Craig, Burton Craigie, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Dewar, Jewett, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Eustis, Florence, Foley, Garnett, Gartrell, Gillis, Gilmer, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, Hatch, Hawkins, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glauzy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Lamar, Landy, Lawrence, Leidy, Letcher, Macalay, M. Queen, Mason, Maynard, Miles, Miller, Millson, Moore, Niblack, Pendleton, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Quittman, Ready, Reagan, Reilly, Rufin, Russell, Sandidge, Savage, Scales, Scott, Searing, Seward, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Sickles, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, Talbot, Trippie, Ward, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, John V. Wright, and Zollcoffer—113.

So the House refused to lay the bill upon the table.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, stated that Mr. STEWART, of Maryland, had gone home, and had paired off with Mr. THOMPSON, of New York.

Mr. HOUSTON stated that Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana, had requested him to say that he was necessarily absent from the House, and had paired off with Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. GREENWOOD said: My colleague, Mr. WARREN, has been called home by the indisposition of one or two members of his family. He requested me to state that he had paired off with Mr. MONTGOMERY, of Pennsylvania, until next Monday week upon the conference report on the Kansas bill, and everything growing out of it.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon the motion of the gentleman from Virginia to postpone.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. From the vote just taken, it is certainly evident that there is not a majority of this House against the bill; and that is very gratifying to me. I have no reasons to offer to gentlemen in reference to the manner in which they shall vote. All I desire is, that we shall have a vote and dispose of this question. I desire its passage, and to get clear of it, and therefore I demand the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine, called for tellers.
Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. JOHN COCHRANE and EDIE were appointed.

Mr. GARNETT. I desire to inquire whether, if this motion is sustained, it will cut off my motion to postpone?

The SPEAKER. It will.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 103, noes 107.

So the House refused to second the previous question.

Mr. GARNETT. I hope we shall now have a direct vote upon my motion.

Mr. BISHOP. I move to lay the whole subject upon the table; and upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The Chair doubts whether, at this stage of the proceedings, the motion of the gentleman from Connecticut is in order. The report is in the same legislative condition, and there has been no debate upon it since the last vote was taken, by which the House refused to lay it upon the table.

Mr. GARNETT. I just wish to say one word. I have no desire factiously to oppose the will of a majority of the House, but I appeal to gentlemen upon all sides to let us have a direct vote upon the motion to postpone. If it is lost, I shall withdraw all opposition to taking the vote when they choose. But let us have a fair test, by a direct vote on the yeas and nays, whether we will postpone or not.

Mr. SEWARD. I should like to know from the gentleman from Virginia, what he expects to accomplish by a postponement of this measure? Now, sir, I do not expect to be called up here, day after day, upon the announcement of gentlemen that this matter is to be deferred to a particular day and a particular hour, when a particular vote is to be taken. My opinion is that the conduct of this House of Representatives in regard to the Kansas bill will meet the condemnation of the people of this great country, and ought to do it. [Cries of "True! true!"] from the Republican side of the House.] It is not my side of the House that is to blame, but every species of delay has been resorted to by gentlemen upon the other side of the House in connection with some southern men. They voted to reject the Lecompton constitution by a vote of ninety-three—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must confine his remarks strictly to the question of postponement.

Mr. SEWARD. I am going to do it. I am going to show how this matter has been delayed, and why there should be no further delay, and that, I take it, is in order. It is a very difficult matter for any one to talk within a given line prescribed by the Speaker, or any one else.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield the floor to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. SEWARD. No, sir.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I wish the gentleman would permit me to ask him a question.

Mr. SEWARD. Well, sir, I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I desire the gentleman from Georgia to say whether I understood him aright as alleging that the delay which has taken place in regard to the action of the House upon this bill is chargeable to those who have opposed the bill?

Mr. SEWARD. I do not know. I think that to a very great extent both parties have been engaged in causing unnecessary delay. [Laughter.] When I am called upon to speak the truth, I always speak it.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I desire to say further, to the gentleman from Georgia, that, from the 2d day of February, when this question was introduced into Congress by the message of the President of the United States, down to this hour, whenever those who have been sustaining the bill have found themselves beaten, as they have been uniformly, they have always resorted to parliamentary tactics and side motions for delay, and they are chargeable with the delay, if anybody is. [Cries of "True! true!"]

Mr. SEWARD. As the chances have seemed to be in favor of one side or the other, that same species of movement has been resorted to, and I enter my solemn protest against it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia cannot pursue the line of argument he is now in. He must confine himself to the question of postponement.

Mr. SEWARD. I am doing so, sir.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the gentleman's remarks are not in order; and he must keep in order, or he cannot proceed.

Mr. SEWARD. I submit respectfully to the Chair, whether I have not a right to refer to the causes of the delay which has already taken place, and to show the entire want of necessity for a continuance of that delay? If I am in order, I propose to pursue that line of argument. Now how can I argue against the necessity of a postponement of this matter unless I refer to what has been the cause of delay, the various views which have been presented by gentlemen, the various amendments which have been offered, and the action of gentlemen which has induced the delay?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia lays down a very broad basis for his remarks. The Chair is of opinion that the remarks which the gentleman was indulging in were not in order. The pending question is upon the motion to postpone. The previous question cannot be called upon such a motion, nor can debate be closed upon it by any process. It has, therefore, been uniformly held that upon a motion to postpone no debate is in order, further than to assign the reasons why the particular measure should or should not be postponed to the particular day indicated.

Mr. SEWARD. Yes, sir; I understand that, and to that I will endeavor to confine my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The Chair may be unfortunate in not appreciating the force of the gentleman's remarks; but it is the opinion of the Chair that the gentleman's remarks were not in order; and the Chair hopes that if the gentleman proceeds, he will confine himself strictly to the question of postponement.

Mr. SEWARD. The Chair seems to appreciate the force of my remarks too much, and wants to restrict them. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUGHES. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HUGHES] is vindicating the remarks of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. SEWARD].

Mr. SEWARD. The gentleman from Indiana has not the floor to move an adjournment. Now, sir, we find ourselves occupying before the country a most singular position. There are certain gentlemen from the section from which I come who entertain some peculiar notions in regard to this question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that that has nothing to do with the question of postponement. [Laughter.]

Mr. SEWARD. Well, sir, then the Chair is of opinion that my remarks have no reference to the question of postponement before I have concluded the sentence, and the Chair must be exceedingly acute if he can see, from half the sentence, the conclusion at which I am going to arrive.

The SPEAKER. The Chair could not see what the peculiar position of gentlemen upon this floor had to do with the question.

Mr. SEWARD. Why, sir, the position of the two hundred and thirty-four gentlemen upon this floor has a great deal to do with it. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Georgia think that it would be in order to discuss the position of every gentleman upon this floor on a motion to postpone?

Mr. SEWARD. No, sir; and I do not intend to go into the individual motives that control the action of gentlemen upon this floor. I propose to take them in gross.

Now, I have no desire to raise unnecessary controversy about this matter, but I ask gentlemen to show what is to be accomplished by a postponement of this question. If they have got any new light upon the subject, I shall be ready most cheerfully to listen to any one of them. I am ready and willing to be enlightened upon the great principle involved in this measure, which I am not permitted to discuss now. I would like to hear from some gentleman upon the Republican side of the House, or from the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL,] or from the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GARNETT,] or from the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. QUITMAN]—these conflicting elements that are all standing together when we come to get a direct vote—if they have any new light upon this question. And, if a valid reason exists why the bill should be postponed, I will vote with those who desire the postponement. I do not wish any gentleman to vote here under circumstances such as shall compromise his opinion or subvert his judgment, or to act in the absence of any information which would enlighten him, or enable him to come to a correct conclusion. I do not think human ingenuity can present any new phase in connection with this question; nor do I think that, in the absence of any new aspect of this question, and in a business view of the legislation of the country, any gentleman can say that this subject ought to be postponed for a moment, not even for the half hour it would take to call the yeas and nays.

Mr. LETCHER. I move to amend the motion of my colleague [Mr. GARNETT] by striking out "Tuesday week" and inserting "to-morrow at one o'clock."

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Why postpone it until that time?

Mr. LETCHER. I see no reason why it should be postponed at all; but the time I have named is better than that proposed in the motion of my colleague.

Mr. KEITT. I desire very much to vote in such a way as shall gratify the member who has made the motion to postpone, and the few on this side of the House who act with him. My personal and political sympathies are almost uniformly with that member, and those now associating with him. And while I think differently from him upon the merits of this bill, I should be very glad, as far as I can consistently, to gratify him in respect to the time of postponement. If debate is closed, I think the postponement is a very long one, considering the tract of time already covered by this discussion, and the searching debate which has been had upon it.

If time is needed to make up one's mind, the bill has been before us for nearly a week, published, printed, and subjected to examination. Gentlemen have asked too much time, if they desire to debate it. If they have made up their minds, then what need is there of further delay?

If the motion of the member from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] had prevailed, the whole matter would have been in just the condition it would have been in if the bill had been defeated. We cannot get back to the House bill, no matter what course we take upon this report. We cannot get back to the Senate bill, no matter what course we take upon this report. The question is upon this bill, and this bill alone. You cannot get at either of the other bills, for the House has put itself beyond the power to get at them.

The Senate cannot get back to either of these bills except by sending to this House for them. In no other way can they be reached by the action of either House. Another conference can be had just as well after this report is laid on the table, as after it has been disposed of in any other way. Then the question upon laying upon the table was a test vote. If gentlemen had made up their minds against the bill, why there was a vote to be cast and a record to be made. If they have not made up their minds, then there is, perhaps, some need of a postponement. If it is asked for the purpose of debate, then, I repeat, the time is too long. We have agreed to adjourn on the 7th of June. We have seven appropriation bills yet unacted upon. This question has been before us for months. In some one phase or other, it has been before us for years. What new lights have we to expect? What new views can we expect to elicit? Nothing, that I can see, can be gained by discussion. If I understood the other side of the House, yesterday, they desired to come to a vote at once, upon the bill itself. Why not take the vote to-day? You wanted to vote yesterday; why does not the same reason induce you to desire it to-day? You charge us with desiring delay.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must confine himself to the motion to postpone.

Mr. KEITT. I desire that the House shall put itself in such a condition that it can adjourn finally on the 7th of June. I think the passage of this motion to postpone will defeat that object, with seven appropriation bills before us, unacted on. We all know that this exciting question attracts all the discussion to it when it is before us, and will until it is disposed of. We may go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon one of the appropriation bills, and all the speeches will be made upon this subject. That has been the result hitherto, and will continue to be, as long as the Kansas question is pending. Just as all the diseases in a city where an epidemic is raging run into that, so all discussion in this House runs into that one channel. If, therefore, this motion to postpone prevails, we must either act upon the appropriation bills without discussion, or we cannot adjourn on the 7th of June. And, therefore, as I do not see any end that is to be attained by this postponement, while I am desirous of gratifying those members with whom I usually act, I cannot, unless some reason is given for it which I have not yet heard, vote for the motion.

Mr. GARNETT. My object in moving a postponement of this question is because I believe a full, fair, and free discussion upon it is due alike to the subject, to the friends and to the opponents of the measure. I believe it is a measure differing widely from either of the propositions which were sent to the committee of conference, and unlike any which has been before the House during the session. Therefore, I think it very proper that there should be a full discussion upon it.

I moved to postpone because I foresaw that, unless a fixed time was agreed upon to take the vote, we should not have such discussion upon it. I saw what was seen before on the former Kansas bill, that the only way to get that discussion was to fix upon a certain day to take the vote, and, in the mean time, allow the discussion to go on in Committee of the Whole upon other bills.

My motion was fixed, upon consultation with numerous friends, as to the time that would be most convenient for taking the vote. I had some doubt as to whether it should be fixed for some day in the middle or latter part of next week, or whether it should be upon the day I have named. Upon consultation, I found that the day which I have named suited most gentlemen, for it was impossible to suit all.

I have no desire by any factious proceeding or by any dilatory motion to prevent this House from coming to a vote this hour or this minute, if the majority so will it. My colleague has moved an amendment to my motion to take the vote to-morrow. That would give one day's discussion. My motion to take the vote on the 11th of May, would leave ten days for discussion. It is for the House to say which of the two propositions they prefer, and I will acquiesce, although I think my motion best. But I ask gentlemen on all sides whether it is not more consonant with the fair, open, and manly way in which our whole course on this Kansas question has been conducted heretofore, to fix some day when the vote shall be taken, and postpone the question until that day? If you prefer having it to-morrow, adopt the amendment of my colleague. If you prefer having it the day I name, vote down his amendment and for my proposition. Either way, is it not fair, is it not wise, is it not politic, for all sides to take a vote on this question, and not by dilatory proceedings, or I would say by factious proceedings, prevent our having a vote?

Mr. CLINGMAN. Is not the gentleman's motion a dilatory proceeding? Does it not throw the question over to another day—a distant day?

Mr. GARNETT. No, sir. By a dilatory proceeding, I mean those motions the object of which is to prevent the will of the majority of the House from being carried out. I have no such purpose. If a majority of the House wants a postponement, that majority certainly has a right to have a postponement. I ask gentlemen to let us have a vote on the proposition.

Mr. HOUSTON. I will say to my friend from Virginia, that the House has already been brought to a direct vote on a postponement to within a day or two of the very day named by him in his motion. The proposition then was substantially what his is now. The sense of the House was taken on that proposition by yeas and nays.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. It was a postponement to the very same day.

Mr. HOUSTON. It does seem to me, that if it is the object of the gentleman from Virginia to ascertain only the will of the House on the proposition, he will, by reference to the Journal of the House, perceive that that has already been done.

Mr. GARNETT. There were, as I am informed, two votes; one by which the House agreed to the postponement, and another by which it disagreed to it; and, sir, I might be at a loss to know which of those votes to take as the sense of the House in the matter. If the gentleman has a majority here against the postponement, then let the proposition be voted down. If he is right in his impression, why then object to a vote? On the other hand, we who wish for a postponement, why should we be prevented from having a vote on the proposition to postpone, if it is not the purpose to defeat the will of the majority?

Mr. HOUSTON. I hope that my friend does not intend to give out the impression that I am trying to defeat the will of the House. If the gentleman makes his motion now, and it be defeated, then to-morrow it may be made again with the same propriety by any of the gentlemen who are acting with the gentleman on one side or the other; that is, according to the argument of the gentleman and the history of this proceeding. Then that is not a termination of it; it is not a settlement of it. The question is open to motions to postpone until the time to which he proposes.

Mr. GARNETT. I will reply to the gentleman, and I think that I can satisfy him on that point. If this motion to postpone be voted down, I, for one, shall vote against any subsequent motion to postpone. I shall receive it as an expression of the will of the majority of the House, and shall acquiesce in it. All I want is a vote on the motion to postpone. And I will say, although I am not in the habit of speaking for anybody other than myself, that I am at liberty to say that the gentlemen with whom I am acting will pursue the same course. Is not that fair? Is it not fairer than the effort to prevent us from having a vote on this motion to postpone? If the bill before the House is right and proper, has it anything to apprehend from discussion? I do not make the motion to postpone as being friendly or unfriendly to the bill. I make it because I believe that it is right and just. And, sir, while I am pained to find myself separated from those with whom I have acted—

Mr. BARKSDALE. I want to know from my friend whether he has not made up his mind as to how he shall vote on this bill?

Mr. GARNETT. I have not; and let me say that I will decide for myself the manner in which I shall make up my judgment on this or on any other question; and when I have made up my mind, when I have concluded what it is right and proper to do, what I believe to be due to my constituents and to my sense of right, though every man in the United States were on the other side, I should preserve my position unshaken.

[Cries of "Good!"]

Mr. WRIGHT, of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GARNETT] asks that this question shall be postponed for ten days. He has informed us that he has consulted with those who agree with him, and that they desire this postponement, in order that the subject may be discussed, and that they may have time to consider it. Sir, on a vote just taken, on a motion to lay the whole subject on the table, one hundred and one gentlemen have voted in the affirmative; thus indicating, in an unmistakable manner, that they have formed their opinions on the report of the conference committee, and that they are opposed to it. On another vote just taken to sustain the previous question, and bring the House to a direct vote, one hundred and three members voted in the affirmative; thus showing that they too are prepared to act now on this question, without further delay. Two hundred and four members have thus exhibited their desire that this question shall be closed and determined in one way or the other. And yet, sir, the honorable member from Virginia asks that these two hundred and four members shall postpone further action for ten days longer, to accommodate seven or eight others, whose opportunities for investigation have been as good as ours. Some want time to consider, and some desire to leave and be absent for a few days. Sir, I am opposed to this delay. I regard it as not only unnecessary, but as unreasonable. If gentlemen are not prepared to vote for this measure, let them vote against it; and to them will belong the responsibility. At any rate, sir, let us take a vote, and put an end to this question.

Mr. LETCHER. If my colleague desires to have this subject debated, all he has to do is to withdraw the motion to postpone, and allow the debate to go on.

Mr. GARNETT. How long will be given to us for debate? Will gentlemen come to an understanding that the vote shall be taken at a fixed day hereafter?

Mr. LETCHER. I have no objection to that being the understanding—that the vote shall be taken in a reasonable time. But here we are engaged in this discussion. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] made a speech this morning. Others desire to be heard in reply to the views which he presented, but the motion of my colleague cuts off that discussion, and we have now given up some two hours which might have been employed in that debate, and which would have brought it very nearly to a conclusion.

Mr. GARNETT. Before the gentleman from Kentucky made his speech, a demand was made for the previous question. How did my colleague vote on that—for or against seconding it?

Mr. LETCHER. I voted for it, and I should vote for it again unless some arrangement was entered into which was satisfactory to parties here, by which the vote shall be taken at a given time. My opinion is made up on the subject; and having it made up, I can see no reason for delaying action and allowing this measure which has consumed so much of the time of the House, to consume still more, to the prejudice of the remnant of the session that is still left.

If the gentlemen are not ready to bring this question to a close, it is manifest from the vote on seconding the call for the previous question, that the debate can be continued such length of time as may be desired. They have the majority, and they can vote down the call for the previous question whenever that matter is presented; and they can, having that power, allow this debate to run on to-day, and to-morrow, and the next day, and even for a week, if it shall seem agreeable to a majority that has the power, as is illustrated by the vote. Now, all that I desire is to get it out of the way. Let us have it disposed of. Let it be decided, either in the passage or in the defeat of the bill, and let us go to whatever is left of the duties which belong to us in our representative character, and then go home.

Mr. BONHAM. What is the motion before the House to be first voted on?

The SPEAKER. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. LETCHER], that the postponement be only until to-morrow.

Mr. BONHAM. Mr. Speaker, I had something to do with the original motion to postpone this question till the second Monday of May, and I beg leave of the House to state the circumstances under which that motion was made, and then to give the reasons why I sustain the motion of the gentleman from Virginia now. The honorable member from Georgia [Mr. HILL] moved to postpone until Thursday week, which would have been to-day week. At my instance he amended it, by saying Monday two weeks. This was why it was done, and why I now sustain the motion of the gentleman from Virginia; the honorable member from Mississippi [Mr. QUITMAN] upon my right, delivers an oration before the Palmetto association, on Tuesday next, and the honorable gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. MILES] delivers an oration on the following day at Charleston. My honorable colleague upon my left [Mr. KERR] and myself are to accompany those gentlemen to South Carolina, and my arrangements have been made to leave this evening. These are the circumstances under which the motion was made, and the reasons in part for which it was made. Other gentlemen desired time to examine the matter, and still others an opportunity to discuss the question.

I am now in favor of the motion of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GARNETT;] but if it cannot prevail, I would like to have the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee withdrawn, in order that a vote may be taken this evening.

Mr. PHILLIPS. The remarks of the gentleman from South Carolina have removed a doubt from my mind in reference to the matter of which he has been speaking. If it is the desire of gentlemen to be absent next week, it seems to me they can better accomplish their purpose by disposing of the public business before attending to private affairs. But what reason is there for postponing this matter? We were not in this Hall one week before all the questions which are now before us were introduced. On the first or second day that this House first resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union a gentleman rose, and introduced the subject of Kansas. From the middle of December down to the present time, the end of April, four or five months, there has been hardly a day upon which this subject has not been, in some manner, before this House. Is there any gentleman in this House, except the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GARNETT;] who has not made up his mind how he shall vote?

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] has shown that there are something like two hundred and five or two hundred and six members, there being in all two hundred and fourteen, who have declared their readiness to vote, and declared before this House that their minds are made up. Then why should action be delayed? Why should this agitation and excitement, and interruption of public business, be continued? We have now but thirty-two working days left between this and the period fixed for adjournment, but thirty-two working days in which to dispose of the immense mass of business before us. There was published in one of the New York newspapers yesterday, a fearful list of the bills which have been before this House, and which have remained unacted upon. There are from six to ten public appropriation bills, and there are hundreds of private bills requiring our attention; and is it asking too much; to urge gentlemen to hurry through with their politics? I do not ask them to discard politics, but to come to an immediate conclusion upon this matter, in order that they may attend to public business. Is there a man upon any side of the House who will deny that the public business, from the beginning of the session down to the present moment, has been interrupted and delayed by this matter? If this be so, can it be the pleasure of gentlemen thus to neglect their public duties in order to keep the country in agitation, when it seems to be conceded that there is a majority of this House willing to settle it in some manner? For myself, and I speak for my constituents, any result is preferable to this state of things. It stagnates business; it creates bad feelings; it divides friends; it does everything which we ought to avert. I appeal to the House to bring this matter to a vote; and for that purpose I demand the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine, demanded tellers.

Mr. GROW. Was not the previous question the question on which the last vote was taken?

The SPEAKER. It was; but there has been debate since it was taken.

Mr. GROW. Does the Chair hold that debate is action?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that if his view be correct, the House never could call the previous question after it had once been voted down, and debate would be interminable. The Chair would not entertain a demand for the previous question immediately after it had been voted down, unless debate or some action had intervened. The Chair is of opinion that the necessary action has taken place.

Mr. GROW. I believe the rule is, that business must intervene before the same motion can be repeated. I will not, however, of course, insist upon it against the ruling of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk suggests to the Chair that even in view of the gentleman's position, the motion is competent, as a motion has intervened since the last demand for the previous question.

Tellers were then ordered; and Messrs. BILLINGHURST and CLINGMAN were appointed.

The House divided; and tellers reported—ayes 103, noes 110.

So the House refused to second the previous question.

Pending the division of the House, Mr. GARNETT said: I ask the unanimous consent of the House to make a proposition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot entertain it while the House is dividing.

The question recurred upon Mr. LETCHER's amendment to the proposition of his colleague, [Mr. GARNETT.]

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE (at three minutes after three o'clock, p. m.) moved that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. GARNETT. In deference, sir, to what I believe to be the wishes of some of the gentlemen with whom I have been acting, I was about to propose that I would withdraw my motion to postpone, upon the understanding, on all sides, that this debate might continue to-day, and that we would come to a final vote upon the bill to-morrow at two o'clock.

Mr. ATKINS. I object.

Mr. GARNETT. I hope the gentleman will hear me before he objects. I have found since that the arrangement will not suit the convenience of one, at least, of my friends.

Mr. BONHAM. I withdraw any objection to it.

Mr. GARNETT. Then, sir, if there be no objection, and that can be the general understanding of both parties, I withdraw the motion to postpone.

Mr. HICKMAN. I object.

Mr. MILLSON obtained the floor.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. I believe the motion to postpone is withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. GARNETT. Well, I desire the floor to finish what I had to say.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. The Speaker will decide who is entitled to the floor.

The SPEAKER. When the gentleman from Virginia withdrew his motion to postpone, his colleague [Mr. MILLSON] rose and addressed the Chair before any other gentleman, and is, therefore, entitled to the floor.

Mr. GARNETT. I ask my colleague to allow me to make a further explanation.

Mr. MILLSON. I yield to my colleague for that purpose.

Mr. GARNETT. I was about to say that I still believe that the motion that I originally made was the best; but, for the sake of conciliation and harmony, I was willing to withdraw it, with the understanding, on all sides, that the vote should be taken to-morrow at two o'clock. I did not move to postpone the subject till that time, because that would have cut off debate upon the main question. I withdrew my motion with that understanding, in order that we might have to-day, and till two o'clock to-morrow, for debate.

Mr. BOCK. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HICKMAN] distinctly objected to such an understanding.

Mr. GARNETT. Do I understand that my proposition is objected to?

Mr. HICKMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. GARNETT. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania object to it?

Mr. HICKMAN. I do, sir.

Mr. GARNETT. Then it is impossible for me to withdraw my motion without that understanding.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia has already withdrawn his motion, and his colleague has been recognized.

Mr. MILLSON. Mr. Speaker, the motion of my colleague having been withdrawn, I have risen for the purpose for which I took the floor an hour ago. I wish to answer the complaints of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL;] and of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. HOWARD;] who spoke yesterday. They have assumed a lofty tone. They complain of wrongs! The North complains of wrongs! grievous wrongs! I see very clearly that the policy of northern gentlemen is to stir up the resentments of the North, and produce the impression that a great injury is attempted to be done to northern interests, and great violence to northern sentiments. Sir, with my consent they shall not succeed in such an effort. There is nothing in any of these propositions which have been before the House—the Senate bill, the House amendment, or the bill recommended by the committee of conference—which involves any loss or injury on the part of the North; or which involves any advantage or good to the South. It is simply a question of the degree in which the North is to be benefited; it is simply a question of the degree in which the South is to be injured. I wish to vindicate the good sense of the South; nay, sir, not even their good sense; I wish to show that they are not absolutely blind and stupid.

I do not know a gentleman here from the South who supposes that there is anything of advantage or gain to our section of the country in any one of the three propositions which have been before us for the settlement of this Kansas question. These plans leave us free to do little more than to select the mode of our execution. All that we have attempted to do is to choose the easiest death. To the South, the choice between these three plans involves only the question as to which is the most graceful form of submission. To the North, it presents only the inquiry as to which is the most offensive mode of triumph. Sir, as a representative of Virginia I have no special reason for desiring the admission of Kansas as a State of this Union under any form of government. To me there is nothing alluring in the prospect. There is nothing in the political opinions, the sentiments, or the history of the people of Kansas to make the South court an association with them as a State of this Union.

Sir, the South has, and ought to have, grave objections to the admission of Kansas—objections of a national character; objections of a political character, and objections of a sectional character. Objections of a national character, because we do not desire, nor should the people of any State desire, the multiplication of small States. We do not want the number of Senators unduly increased. It is now large enough, if not, indeed, too large already. We do not want the sense of personal responsibility to be diminished and lost among the large number who share it. We prefer, or ought to prefer, that there should be in the Senate of the United States a small number of great men rather than a great number of small men. We have objections of a political character, for, as members of the Democratic party, we are too well aware that Kansas would bring to us no strength in our political relations. We have objections of a sectional character, because we know that so long as Kansas remains in her territorial condition, she must, by an unchangeable law, remain a slave Territory; and that slavery can never be excluded until we confer upon her, as a State, the capacity to exclude it. But we surrender these grave objections for the common good of the whole country.

Let not the attempt be made, then, to fix upon the northern mind the impression that the southern members, in voting for the admission of Kansas as a State, are proposing anything which can result in loss, injury, or wrong to the North. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] this morning complained—reiterating the complaints made yesterday on this floor—that the bill reported by the committee of conference proposed to admit Kansas into the Union with one population, under a constitution allowing slavery, and to require a larger population, with a constitution prohibiting slavery. Sir, I say that no fair construction of the bill could justify any such criticism. There is nothing in the terms of the bill, there is nothing in the spirit of the bill, which could justify such a conclusion. What is it that the bill proposes? Simply that if the people of Kansas accept the terms tendered to them by Congress, they may be admitted into the Union as one of the States of the Confederacy. If they reject the terms tendered to them by Congress, they are not to come into the Union, until they have a population sufficient to entitle them to one Representative upon the floor of this House.

These are the words of the law. Now, sir, is there anything concealed beneath these words which will justify the conclusions arrived at by the gentleman from Kentucky? I defend the language of the act. But the gentleman asks, why not exclude them altogether, until they have a sufficient population to entitle them to a Representative? Why admit them now, if they accept the terms of the proposition made them by Congress? Does not the gentleman from Kentucky know that, during the last three or four years, various movements have been made to admit Kansas into the Union as a State? Does he not know that almost every gentleman upon the floor of this House, stands committed to the admission of Kansas as a State? Does he not know that the gentlemen now acting with him in opposition to this measure, all voted for the admission of Kansas, under the Topeka application? Does not the gentleman know that most of the gentlemen on this side of the House voted, or were ready to vote, for a bill to enable the people of Kansas to form a constitution and State government, and to be admitted into the Union under what is commonly termed the Toombs bill? Here, then, were inducements held out to the people of Kansas to form a constitution and State government, and apply for admission into the Union. Under these inducements, the Territorial Legislature of Kansas passed an act for taking the sense of the people of Kansas, whether they desired admission into the Union as a State.

Now, the gentleman has said, and I will not attempt to controvert the position, that that was not a rightful act of legislation; that it conferred no authority upon the people of Kansas to demand admission into the Union. But I will remind the gentleman of one thing which he seems to have overlooked: I presume the gentleman will not differ from me, when I say that, although in the organic act of the Territory of Kansas, the acts of the Territorial Legislature were not required to be submitted to Congress for revision, yet it was competent for Congress to annul any act of the Territorial Legislature of Kansas, as they may the territorial acts of Utah or New Mexico. But Congress did not repudiate any of its acts. This law was passed by the Territorial Legislature of Kansas. It might have been disapproved by Congress. It was not disapproved. If that act, then, had any validity, it owed it to the acquiescence or the implied consent of Congress, by its failure to annul it.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I would like to know how Congress is to know anything about it?

Mr. MILLSON. How was Congress to know anything about the other laws which were proposed to be annulled by the bill introduced into the Senate by Mr. Toombs, and passed by that body? It is true that there was no clause in the Kansas-Nebraska bill requiring the territorial laws to be sent to Congress for revision; but it is equally true that that does not prevent us from inquiring into their legislation. We can know their laws as a matter of history, as we may know the laws and understand the legislation of any other legislative body.

I say, then, to the gentleman that we know the existence of the law to which I have referred exactly as we have the right to know the existence of any other law passed by the Territorial Legislature of Kansas. The gentleman would have encountered no difficulty of this sort in voting for the bill, which I presume he approved, proposing to annul certain of the acts of Kansas.

Then, sir, I say that the people of Kansas had a right to regard themselves as authorized to seek admission into the Union; authorized by the general assent of both branches of Congress, at different times, and on different propositions, and all acknowledging their right to apply for admission into the Union. And they had the right so to regard it, from the fact that Congress did not interfere to annul the law passed by their own Territorial Legislature, giving them the authority. We stand committed to the people of Kansas. They would have a right to complain if they were refused admission, on proper terms and conditions. They would have a right to say to Congress, "you encouraged us to make this application; you, by your silence, approved the law which gave us the right to hold the convention which framed a constitution at Lecompton; and you will act in bad faith towards us, if you now reject our application, merely on the ground that we have not sufficient population. You knew our population when you gave an implied, if not an express, consent to our admission."

Congress, then, being committed to the acceptance of Kansas if she proposes such terms as are admissible by the Representatives of the people, we cannot refuse her admission into the Union, simply because of a want of population. But she has no right to make unreasonable exactions of us. We may refuse them, and propose reasonable conditions. If she will not accept them, we may then say, "if you will not now come into the Union, except upon terms that we cannot yield, we tell you that we give you no further authority to become a State; and we mean to treat you, as we treat all the other Territories; and you shall not be entitled to come into the Union until you have sufficient population."

I believe that it is impossible for gentlemen to give the construction to this bill which has been given by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL,] by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. HOWARD,] by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM,] and by other gentlemen in this debate. It is nothing but a simple submission of a fair proposition to the people of Kansas. If they object to it, they are no longer to demand admission into the Union. If they accept it, they come into the Union, not because they come with the constitution made at Lecompton; but only, because, before we knew what constitution they would adopt, we pledged our faith to them that they should come. That is the answer to the gentleman's complaint.

The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. DAVIS] said yesterday, and challenged the citation of any instance to the contrary, that there never had been any case in which the admission of a State into the Union was made to depend upon a precedent assent to a condition imposed by Congress. I will tell the gentleman that he will find in the joint resolution authorizing the annexation of Texas, exactly such a case as he denied to have existed. That joint resolution expressly provided, that certain conditions should be proposed to the people of Texas, and their admission into the Union was made to depend upon their acceptance of these conditions. And it was only after the acceptance of these conditions that they were admitted into the Union. Was it supposed that that was any derogation from the sovereign rights of Texas? Unquestionably not; for the act admitting her, expressly stated that she was admitted upon an equal footing with all the other States of the Union.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] asked, why not let the State of Kansas come in with any constitution she pleases? I was forcibly struck with the inconsistency of the argument of the gentleman. He said that this bill ought to have allowed the State of Kansas to form another constitution, in the event of her rejection of the conditions proposed to her. Yet a few moments afterwards he stated that the population of Kansas was hardly forty thousand. He has answered his own inquiry. If there be, as the gentleman states, only forty thousand people in Kansas, that is the reason why the alternative consent was not given. We have acquitted ourselves of our obligation to Kansas, by agreeing to admit her upon the application which she made at our own instance. If she rejects that, then we have the right to say that she shall not come into the Union except upon such terms, just and reasonable, as are prescribed by ourselves. These terms have no sort of reference to the character of the institutions of Kansas. We have nothing to do with any particular form of constitution for Kansas.

Sir, I will tell gentlemen that Congress cannot prevent them from having such a constitution as they choose. Congress has no right to judge of the constitution of Kansas. It is not one of the functions of Congress to approve or disapprove a State constitution. Gentlemen have talked here, in loose phraseology, about Kansas coming in under the Lecompton constitution, or not coming in under it. I will tell gentlemen that the power of Congress is simply to admit a State. They have no control over a constitution. I will go further, and say that it is not a part of the business of Congress, nor is it the right of Congress, in its collective or corporate capacity, to know what constitution is the constitution of the people of Kansas.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

MONDAY, MAY 3, 1858.

NEW SERIES...No. 119.

I have sometimes been at a loss to know what was the origin of this prevalent error, that the constitution of a State applying for admission into the Union, must be submitted to Congress for its approval and ratification. I have said that the power of Congress was to admit new States. What power is it that adopts a State constitution? It is the State itself. The people of a State make a constitution for a State; and if the people of a State make a constitution for a State, then you have the idea of a State without a constitution. The constitution is the work of the State; it is the result of the act of a State. If it is the result of the act of a State, then the State must exist before its constitution. There may be, therefore, a State without a constitution. The power of Congress is to admit new States; and I would like to know how you can limit and narrow that power to the admission of a State, having a constitution?

Gentlemen say that it is the duty of Congress to see that the constitution of a State is republican; and they seem to have arrived at that conclusion from the misapplication of that clause of the Constitution which declares that the United States shall guaranty to each and every State a republican form of government. To show the fallacy of that idea, permit me to suggest that the clause of the Constitution is, that "the United States shall guaranty to each and every State." Each old State as well as new. The reference to "each and every State" proves that the clause has no application, except to States already in the Union. Instead of giving that clause exclusive application to Territories applying for admission, I say it has no application at all to anything but existing States. It is a guarantee to the States of the Union.

The object of the guarantee is manifest. It was a pledge of the faith of each and all the States to one another that they would protect each other, and prevent any usurper from overthrowing the liberties of the people of any State. The expression is, that the United States shall "guaranty." The word was well chosen. It was not that the States shall confer upon any State what it has not already, but that we shall defend, protect, secure it in what it now has. This is the import of the word "guaranty," and this was the object of that clause of the Constitution.

Sir, if it be true that that clause in the Constitution obliges Congress to inquire whether the constitution of a State applying for admission, is republican, it would follow, as a matter of course, that an old State could never change her constitution, without being under the necessity of having it revised by Congress; for the provision applies to all the States. I admit that we may look into the constitution of any State which desires admission into the Union. But to what end do we look into the constitution of a new State? Because Congress, in the exercise of a constitutional power, has the right to approve or reject its constitution? No, sir; but only that the members of Congress, the individuals holding seats in Congress, may inspect the constitution of a State, as they may inspect any public document, any book, any newspaper, for the purpose of finding evidence of what may be the sentiments and character of a people desiring admission. Usually, the constitution of a State is very good evidence of those sentiments. It is presumed that the will of the people is reflected by it, and we may generally refer with confidence to a constitution to ascertain what their views are upon the subjects embraced in their fundamental law. But it is only as evidence, that we look into it.

This does not imply that Congress has the right to approve or disapprove a constitution, but only that members may read it for their own individual satisfaction; may consult the constitution, as they may a newspaper, as they may a dictionary, for the purpose of informing their own minds upon the subjects referred to in the constitution. It is only to that extent that Congress has any business with any constitution of any State. Therefore I object to the language so frequently employed, that Congress is attempting to ratify the Lecompton constitution, or is attempting to force the Lecompton constitution upon the people of Kansas. Congress is doing nothing of the sort. Congress can only admit a State. The constitution is the work of the people of that State. And so far from it being true that Kansas is to come into the Union, with the Lecompton constitution, I tell you that the constitution of Kansas is almost the only thing in Kansas which does not come into the Union at all. The constitution of Kansas does not budge an inch beyond the limits of Kansas. It stays at home; and it can be altered, modified, or destroyed, by the people of Kansas at their pleasure.

Kansas, then, does not touch the Union with her constitution at all. I will tell you where she touches the Union. She touches the Union at three points—in the House of Representatives, in the Senate, and in the presidential chair; and I take the occasion to suggest that at none of those three points have we any great reason to desire any contact with her, while the political opinions of her people remain what they are.

Mr. STANTON. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question? I understand the gentleman's theory to be that a State may be admitted into the Union with no constitution at all, if it has a corporate form. Am I right?

Mr. MILLSON. I mean to say that the power is to admit a new State, and as a State must be a State before it has a constitution, it follows that there may be a State without a constitution; and that the power to admit new States, generally, cannot be narrowed down to a new State, having a constitution.

Mr. STANTON. Suppose, then, that Kansas is admitted now: is there anything to prevent her from organizing her government under the Leavenworth constitution instead of under the Lecompton constitution?

Mr. MILLSON. That is a question I do not want to discuss here. I hold that the people of Kansas have the right to alter their constitution, or frame a government, whenever they can do it in conformity with the restrictions imposed upon themselves, by themselves; and no power on earth can rightfully prevent the people of any sovereignty from acting in the execution of their sovereign power, whenever it may please them so to act.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. Inasmuch as the Lecompton constitution is not in Kansas, but is here, and the Leavenworth constitution is there, is not the sequence that if they are admitted under this bill, they are admitted under the Leavenworth constitution?

Mr. MILLSON. Mr. Speaker, I have already said that a State is not admitted with, or under any particular constitution. I have already said that it is not the province of Congress to determine what her constitution is; and that we, as individual members, can only look into her constitution for the purpose of ascertaining the sentiments and character of the people. Sir, if the Mormons, now occupying Utah, should apply for admission into the Union, with a constitution allowing polygamy, that would be evidence that her people are in favor of polygamy, and you would reject them on that account, as unfit to be associated with the other States. But I go further. If they were to apply for admission into the Union, with a constitution silent on the subject of polygamy, you, knowing the character of the people, from other sources of information, would reject them on that account. I go further still. If they were to come here with a constitution prohibiting polygamy, then, regarding the constitution only as evidence, and knowing that evidence to be deceptive in this case, we should reject them on that ground.

Now, what is it that is done when a Territory comes to be admitted into the Union as a State? I took occasion to say, some weeks ago, that the application of a State for admission into the Union, is a sort of declaration of independence. A State must have the capacity to contract with the other States before she can be admitted. She must accede to the Federal Constitution. Before she can make a contract, she must have the capacity to contract.

The transformation of a Territory into a State is, if I may so express myself, a sort of peaceful revolution. If the State is admitted into the Union, Congress simply acknowledges the independence of that State. If the State is denied admission into the Union, Congress refuses to recognize the independence of that State. But whenever a Territory forms for herself a constitution and State government, she proclaims her independence of the power which has held her in subjection. This, I think, is the only theory which will explain the relations between a Territory, becoming a State, and the old States. We need not resist, by force, her attempt to establish her independence. We may accede to it. If we do so, we acknowledge her independence from the time she made the declaration. If we refuse to acknowledge her independence, we simply decline to regard her as holding any other relation to us than the relation of a Territory to a parent Government. When we admit a State into the Union, and thus acknowledge its independence, the acknowledgement relates back to the time when she declared her independence—that is, when she formed her State government. Sir, it is a common and familiar case. The United States declared their independence on the 4th of July, 1776. For seven years England endeavored to compel their submission, but she was foiled. She regarded us in the light of revolted colonies during the whole of that time. When she afterwards acknowledged the independence of the United States, it was an acknowledgment that we were independent on the 4th of July, 1776; the acknowledgment related back to the time when we originally declared our independence. So, when a State is admitted into the Union, we admit her to have been independent from the time she formed her State government; and, having made that admission, it is no province of ours to determine what her constitution is.

I say, then, sir, that gentlemen have endeavored to mislead the people of the North, by producing the impression that some great wrong is attempted to be done them; some great advantage to be secured by the people of the South. I repeat that there is nothing of gain to us, and nothing of loss to the North, in any of the proposed plans of admitting Kansas. Do gentlemen suppose that we of the South are deceived by paper constitutions? Do gentlemen suppose that southern men upon this floor, intelligent as many of them are known to be, are pleasing themselves with the idea that a new State will be added to the Union, identified in interest and sympathizing in sentiment, with the people of the South? No, sir; we look through the Lecompton constitution; we know the circumstances under which it was formed; we know the political character of the present people of Kansas; we look upon a State, not as a paper constitution, but as a community of men, women, and children; and we know that that community of men, women, and children, which we are about to bring into the Union, is a community having no interests and no sympathies identical with our own. We are making concessions; we are not pressing demands. I may almost say we are making sacrifices. Gentlemen of the North, instead of applying reproaches, should give us credit for magnanimity.

While gentlemen on the other side of the House complain of this bill, there are objections to it also upon this side of the House. The distinguished gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUITMAN] has objected to it. He has not indicated the character of those objections, but I know him too well not to understand that they are perfectly consistent with his devotedness to State rights, and to the principles of the Democratic party.

But it is fancied by some gentlemen that there are restrictions imposed upon the people in Kansas, in prescribing the qualifications of the voters who are to vote upon the acceptance or rejection of the terms submitted to Kansas, and in design-nating the officers who are to receive the votes. If gentlemen deny the authority of Congress to exercise this power, I might adopt the Socratic method of argument, and inquire who, then, is to determine the qualifications of voters, and who shall appoint the agents to receive the votes? If it is answered, the people of Kansas, I ask, again, by what authority? The Territorial Legislature? Now, the Territorial Legislature derives its authority from Congress; so that, at last, you are brought to Congress, as the source of all the power which can be exercised in determining whether they shall be a State, or in making the constitution under which they desire to be governed.

It is eminently proper, in my view of this case, that we should submit this question to the people of Kansas, to be assented to or rejected by them, before they come into the Union. Suppose we bring Kansas into the Union, upon her present application, but without accepting her ordinance. She may say, "I never asked for admission into the Union, except upon the terms indicated in my ordinance." What, then, would be the condition of the people of Kansas? Would they be a State in the Union or not? The people of Kansas never assented to the proposition contained in the act of Congress. They have asked admission upon certain terms; and if you reject those terms, then I ask whether they are a State in the Union or not? If she is a State in the Union, then has she the right to secede from the Union in consequence of having never assented to the terms on which she was admitted?

Mr. QUITMAN. Will the gentleman allow me to say a few words in reply to his speculations on my position?

Mr. MILLSON. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. QUITMAN. I had not intended, after seeking the floor yesterday without success, to trouble the House with stating the reasons why I opposed this bill; but I can give them in a few words. I construe the bill reported by the committee of conference as an express submission of the question of the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution back to the people of Kansas, and thus virtually referring to them the adoption or rejection of the constitution, the more objectionable because that reference is not made to the quasi sovereignty which acted upon that instrument originally, nor to the people acting under an organized government, but to a disorganized mass of voters, who cannot speak for the sovereignty of a State.

I oppose the measure, in the second place, because it is a concession upon this question which I, as a southern man, am not prepared to make. I regard this contest as a mere incident to the slavery question. I am desirous of seeing this great issue between the North and South brought to a fair, honest, and final settlement, which shall forever recognize the full constitutional equality of the slaveholding States. If we can come to terms, no man in the House will rejoice more than I. If we cannot, let us separate. These are the main reasons why I oppose this bill.

I will answer the other question propounded by the gentleman, that I look upon the act of the people of Kansas as complete—as an act of quasi sovereignty, with the consent of the United States, in the formation of a constitution. I regard that act as complete and binding upon the people of Kansas, and as the only voice that we have received here in regard to their will. I have opposed the reference of the whole question back to the people of Kansas, or even to any political power in Kansas; and I oppose it now the more because it is simply a reference back to the individual men who may be entitled to vote at the time this vote is to be taken. These are, in short, some of the reasons why, with all respect for the opinions of my political friends, I cannot support this bill. I will not take any more of the gentleman's time by saying more.

Mr. MILLSON. The House will now, I trust, perceive the application of the views I was endeavoring to present at the time the gentleman from Mississippi asked me to yield to him. The gentleman says he regards the act as complete, and Kansas entitled to admission. Would he yield to her demand for admission upon the terms proposed by her, claiming twenty-five or thirty million acres of the public land?

Mr. QUITMAN. I ask the gentleman to allow me to say that I have never regarded these prop-sitions in respect to land grants as forming any of the conditions on which a State is admitted into the Union. I wish to make this single other remark: that Congress either has or has not the right to restrict the entire rights of a State. If she does restrict them, then they are not binding upon the State, because she can only admit the State upon one condition or the other.

Mr. MILLSON. I have no disposition now to go into an inquiry whether the gentleman is right or wrong in the belief that there is no authority or validity in this ordinance claiming land. The point which I presented was, that if the people of Kansas ask for admission into the Union, upon certain conditions, whether, if we reject those conditions, she is bound by her application? And I made this further inquiry: whether the act of admission upon these modified terms on the part of Congress, will, of necessity, bring her into the Union against her protest? Will you consider her in the Union if she says, "I asked for admission into the Union upon the terms which I have proposed, and upon no other terms?" And if she is in the Union, then I ask as to her right to withdraw or secede from it?

I will not appeal to the gentleman from Mississippi upon this point, because I know his views upon the general question of the right of a State to secede; as he, doubtless, knows mine. But I submit, that if Kansas should exercise this right, the southern Democratic members would be placed in a very anomalous position towards her. They might be tempted to resist the exercise of this power, and thus do violence to their own constitutional opinions;—while gentlemen upon the other side of the House, whose normal position is against the right of a State to secede, might be found sustaining Kansas in the exercise of this right. I say, therefore, let us avoid these possible difficulties, by submitting the question to the people of Kansas before they come in. Where is the objection to that? If they avail themselves of the occasion, to withdraw their application altogether, because of objections they may have to their own constitution, we cannot help that.

A word more as to the objections of gentlemen, on the other side of the House, who say they have no confidence in the fairness with which these elections will be conducted. Gentlemen tell us of the frauds that have been perpetrated in Kansas, and some of them seem to suppose that these frauds have been sympathized in, if not openly defended, by gentlemen on the Democratic side of the House. Sir, I rejoice to say, I have never met one man from the South, who has attempted to justify or defend these frauds; and I hope no one will ever be found to defend or justify them. I hope the South will be too mindful of her fair character, to tarnish it by any complicity with fraud or crime. A "good name," sir, is our "immediate jewel." If, in order to secure the admission of a State, so hostile to our interests, and so foreign from our sympathies, as Kansas will be, the South should sully her ancient reputation by defending or excusing the frauds that have been committed on her behalf, she would imitate the foolish prodigality of the royal harlot of Egypt, and dissolve her pearl in vinegar, only that she might drink the unpalatable mixture.

But the South knows too well her duty to herself, she knows too well the condition of Kansas, to tempt her to any sacrifice of her reputation. We know that Kansas is not an ally of the South. We know that we are only supporting a measure which must bring material advantage to the North and loss and disadvantage to the South; and we have been moved as much by a desire to maintain the good faith of the Government, and to restore harmony and peace to the country, as by any other consideration. We have desired, too, to repel the efforts made on the other side of the House to produce injurious and erroneous impressions upon the public mind, at the North, by representations that their honor is insulted by a dominant majority in Congress, sustained by a Democratic Administration. That is not the true state of the case. We know and feel that we have no practical interest in this controversy; but that we are simply choosing that method of terminating it, which will be most acceptable to our people, in being least injurious to their interests, and least repulsive to their sensibilities.

Mr. CLARK, of New York, obtained the floor, but yielded to

Mr. LETCHER, who moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. CLINGMAN demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 120, nays 81; as follows:

So the motion was agreed to.

Pending the above call,

Mr. KNAPP stated that Mr. GIDDINGS had paired off with Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, asked to have entered upon the Journal a motion to reconsider the vote by which the House laid upon the table Senate bill (No. 151) further to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Provident Association of the clerks in the several Departments of the Government of the United States, in the District of Columbia."

Mr. ENGLISH stated that he voted for the adjournment, understanding that in the morning the gentleman from South Carolina would call for the previous question.

And then the House (at twenty minutes past four o'clock, p. m.) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, April 30, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. P. D. GURLEY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, transmitting a report from the Secretary of State, in answer to the resolution of the Senate of the 24th ultimo, requesting information relative to the seizure in the valley of Sitana, in Peru, by the authorities of Chili, of a sum of money belonging to citizens of the United States; which was, on motion of Mr. HUNTER, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Interior, in answer to a resolution of the Senate relative to the United States reserved sections in township eighty-nine, range forty-seven, in the State of Iowa; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (No. 542) to authorize the vestry of Washington parish to take and inclose certain parts of streets in Washington city, for the purpose of extending the Washington Cemetery, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. BROWN presented the petition of Thomas W. Jordan, late captain's clerk on board the United States ship Fredonia, praying to be allowed the difference between his pay, as captain's clerk, and that of purser, during the time he acted as such; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, presented a petition of citizens of the town of Fort Scott, Kansas, remonstrating against special legislation in relation to the lands upon which that town is situated; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a petition of inhabitants of Bourbon county, Kansas, settlers on lands known as the New York Indian lands, praying that the Indian title thereto may be extinguished, and that they may be allowed the right of preemption; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. KENNEDY, it was,
Ordered, That James Conrad have leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

On motion of Mr. MALLORY, it was Ordered, That the adverse report in the case of the seamen on board the United States steamer Missouri, destroyed by fire at Gibraltar in 1843, be recommitted to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BROWN. The Committee on the District of Columbia have had under consideration, by reference from the Senate, a memorial from a committee of the Levy Court of Washington county, asking for the improvement of certain roads in the neighborhood of the navy-yard. The memorial is accompanied by profiles. As the subject is before the committee of the House of Representatives, I move that the papers may be withdrawn for the purpose of being presented there.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. KING, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of James Smith, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 302) for the relief of James Smith. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MALLORY, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Isaac Varn, sr., submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 303) for the relief of Isaac Varn, sr. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

NORTHERN WAGON ROAD TO THE PACIFIC.

Mr. DOOLITTLE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of constructing a wagon road from Fort Benton, on the Missouri river, to the navigable waters of the Columbia river, at or near Fort Wallawalla, and report by bill or otherwise.

WILLIS A. GORMAN.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I ask the Senate to take up, for consideration, a little resolution to pay Governor Gorman a certain amount of money. I wish to have it taken up merely for the purpose of suggesting an amendment, and then asking its reference to a committee.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution submitted by Mr. SEBASTIAN, on Wednesday last:

Resolved, That there be paid to the Hon. Willis A. Gorman, Governor of Minnesota Territory, the sum of $820, as compensation for his services as commissioner to investigate the alleged frauds of Alexander Ramsey, late superintendent of Indian affairs for the northern superintendency, and reimbursement of his necessary expenses incurred therein.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I wish to suggest an amendment, which was a mere inadvertent omission in the original resolution, to say "out of the contingent fund of the Senate," and then ask its reference to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUNTER. If the resolution is to be referred to the committee, I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be referred.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I understand it goes to that committee according to the rule of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, sir.

CAPTAIN JAMES MAC MINTOSH.

Mr. IVERSON. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives (No. 80) for the relief of Captain James Mac McIntosh, of the United States Navy, have instructed me to report back the bill with a recommendation that it pass; and I am instructed by the committee to ask that it be put on its passage immediately. I will state, in explanation, that it is a claim for only $204 95 of Captain Mac McIntosh for arrears of pay withheld from him by an erroneous and obstinate decision on the part of the Fifth Auditor, although allowed by the Secretary of the Navy. It has gone to the Court of Claims, and been reported favorably upon by them. It has gone to the House of Representatives, and been decided on favorably by that House. It now comes here, and the committee are unanimously in favor of it. I move that the bill be considered and put on its passage. It is only to pay a very small amount which has been withheld along time from Captain Mac McIntosh, and it is just and due that it should be paid to him.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 80) for the relief of Captain James Mac McIntosh, of the United States Navy.

It provides for the payment to Captain Mac McIntosh, of the Navy, of the sum of $204 95, being the difference between the sum paid to him at the Treasury as commander "on other duty," and that which was due to him as such officer "attached to a vessel for sea service," and being in full for his services as an officer of the West India squadron from the 14th of August, 1837, to the 3d of September, 1838.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LAND DISTRICTS IN MICHIGAN.

Mr. STUART. I ask the indulgence of the Senate to pass a couple of public bills that I reported yesterday, of great importance, although there is no dispute about them. They are simply to change the boundaries of some land districts.

The Senate proceeded as in Committee of the Whole to consider the bill (S. No. 286) to enlarge the Detroit and Saginaw land districts in Michigan.

It provides that from and after the 1st of July, all that part of the Cheboygan district, in the State of Michigan, which lies south of the line dividing townships twenty-eight and twenty-nine north, and east of the line dividing ranges two and three west, shall be attached to and form a part of the present Saginaw district, and all that part of the Cheboygan district which lies north of the line dividing townships twenty-eight and twenty-nine north, and east of the line dividing ranges one and two west, including the island of Mackinac, shall be attached to and form a part of the Detroit district.

Mr. POLK. I should like to ask the Senator from Michigan if the effect of the bill is to divide one land district so as to attach a part of it to another, and still another part to another, so as to make three districts instead of two?

Mr. STUART. No, sir. It leaves the number of districts the same as it is now, but merely rearranges them. It does not add to the number of districts or the number of offices, but rearranges them for convenience.

Mr. POLK. I will ask the Senator another question, whether, unless this division takes place, one of those districts will not be reduced in the quantity of land in it to an amount less than that which by law entitles it to have land officers?

Mr. STUART. No, sir. I will simply state it is an arrangement made with the concurrence of the General Land Office simply for the convenience of those buying land, without any view to continue existing districts, or anything of the sort.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LAND DISTRICTS IN MINNESOTA.

Mr. STUART. The other bill which I propose to have considered now is on the same subject in regard to the land districts in Minnesota.

Mr. POLK. Is it to accomplish the same object?

Mr. STUART. Yes, sir.
The Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill (S. No. 296) amendatory of an act entitled "An act to establish two additional land districts in the Territory of Minnesota," approved July 8, 1856.

It provides that, in lieu of the southern boundary of the northwestern land district of Minnesota, on the west side of the Mississippi river, the following boundaries are established, to wit: commencing at the point on the eastern side of the Mississippi river where the present south line touches the river, thence down the river to the point opposite the intersection with the river of the eighth standard parallel; thence along that parallel to the point of intersection of guide meridian number four; thence along that guide meridian to the seventh standard parallel; thence west along the seventh parallel to the Sioux Wood river; thence north to the line heretofore established. It also provides that the line dividing ranges twenty-three and twenty-four shall be the boundary line between the northwestern and northeastern land districts, in lieu of the range line between eighteen and nineteen, as heretofore established.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. TOOMBS submitted the following report:

The undersigned managers of the conference between the Senate and House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the House bill (No. 306) entitled "An act to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1858," report that, having taken the subject of the disagreeing votes into full and careful consideration, they are unable to come to any agreement thereon.

R. TOOMBS,
W. F. FESSENDEN,
ASA BIGGS,
Senate Managers.
J. LETCHER,
M. H. NICHOLS,
House Managers.

Mr. HUNTER. I give notice that when the Senate is full I shall call up the House report, and submit a motion to recede. It is useless to be delaying this measure.

MEXICAN PROTECTORATE.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move to take up the resolution which I introduced some time since, with a view to amend it and refer it to a special committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. IVERSON. If this resolution is to give rise to no discussion I shall not object; but if anybody is to debate it, I must object, and insist on the special order.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move the amendment which I send to the table, and which has been printed, to strike out all after the word "whereas," and insert:

The events connected with the numerous efforts of the people of Mexico to establish, upon a reliable basis, an orderly system of self government, have invariably resulted in complete failure; and whereas the condition of Mexico is such as to excite alarming apprehensions that she may precipitate herself into a wild condition of anarchy, and the more so, as she has demonstrated, from time to time, her utter inability to suppress intestine commotions and to conquer the hordes of bandits by which she is infested; and whereas the United States of America, on account of the continental policy which they cherish and desire to enforce, can never permit Mexico to be subjugated by Spain, or placed under the dominion of any foreign Power; and whereas one of the most important duties devolving upon civilized governments is to exact from adjoining nations the observance of good neighborhood, thus shielding themselves against impending, or even remote injury to their border security: Therefore,

Resolved, That a select committee of seven be raised to inquire into and report to the Senate whether or not it is expedient for the Government of the United States of America to declare and maintain a protectorate over the so-called Republic of Mexico, in such form and to such an extent as shall be necessary to secure to this Union good neighborhood, and to the people of said country the benefits of an orderly and well-regulated republican government.

Mr. WILSON. I have no objection to the amendment; but I do not wish this resolution to pass now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that the hour has arrived for the consideration of the special order, which will now be taken up, unless the Senate otherwise determine.

Mr. HOUSTON. I only wish this resolution to be referred to a committee so that it may be taken into consideration by them. The gentleman will have an opportunity of stating his objections when a report is made, which brings the subject more directly before the body for discussion. I hope he will withdraw his objection, and permit the subject to be referred to a special committee.

Mr. WILSON. I should like very much to gratify the Senator from Texas, and refer this matter to a special committee without any further debate or consideration; but it seems to me that it is a gross insult to Mexico for the Senate of the United States to pass a resolution worded as this resolution is worded. I think it a resolution that ought not to pass in this form. If a proposition of this kind is to pass at all, I think it should be worded in language that certainly could not give offense. I hope the matter will be allowed to pass over to-day, as the hour has arrived for the consideration of the special order.

Mr. HOUSTON. The Senate is not asked now to indorse the statements of fact in the preamble, but merely to refer the subject to a committee that it may be examined; and if the facts reported to the Senate do not sustain the proposition of the resolution, it will be for the Senator then to object to it, but not as a matter of reference. I believe no objection has ever been made to a subject of this kind being referred. I intended, in the first place, that it should be referred to the appropriate standing committee; but the disinclination of the chairman of that respectable committee as well as other members of the body, seemed to indicate that it should go to a special committee. Deferring to the suggestion, I have introduced the amendment for that purpose, and I do trust the gentleman will permit its reference.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope this will go over. The hour for the special order has arrived.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator from Texas that there is no motion pending upon which discussion can be entertained, unless the Senator moves to postpone the special order. That motion not being made, the special order comes up as a matter of course.

Mr. HOUSTON. With a view to save time, for I wish this subject disposed of, and do not wish to be annoyed by it any longer, I move that the special order be postponed.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope not. We have fixed the hour by agreement when we shall probably take the vote, and I hope we shall go on now with the special order. This subject will come up to-morrow.

Mr. MASON. When the resolution of the honorable Senator from Texas was before the Senate on a former occasion, I moved, according to my recollection, that it should be laid on the table, from a belief that it would be injurious and insulting to the Government of Mexico for the Senate to entertain the proposition—I say it in all courtesy to the honorable Senator, who differs with me in opinion. This proposition is now to refer it to a select committee. If it were referred at all, I am satisfied the true reference should be to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I will not ask that reference, but I move to lay it on the table.

Mr. HOUSTON. I will make a remark, if the gentleman will for a moment withdraw that motion.

Mr. MASON. I withdraw it.

Mr. HOUSTON. It was my expectation and desire, in the first instance, to refer it to that respectable committee, but as a disinclination was expressed, on the part of the chairman, that the reference should be made to that committee, I thought it was proper to have recourse to another expedient that would be more acceptable to him, and perhaps would produce—

Mr. MASON. The disinclination I expressed was to any reference; not to the Committee on Foreign Relations, but to a reference at all; and I entertain the same opinion now. If there should be any, however, I think it ought to be to that committee.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman stated that to refer it to a standing committee of this body would be disrespectful. Then I wished a special committee, if it were the judgment of the Senate that it should be referred to a committee. Disinclination being evinced on the part of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations to take charge of the subject, I thought it best not to incumber the committee with any motion that was unacceptable to it; and I was desirous that the matter should be thoroughly investigated by those who were friendly to or had originated the measure, and not to throw a bantering so young, and one of such suspicious character as it is, into the arms of stepfathers. I had no disposition to do that; and, as there seemed to be very little sympathy for the bantering on the part of the standing committee, I was disposed to adopt a father for it, or let it have its proper legitimate one. I will submit to the action of the Senate: but I believe this course is unusual. I do not expect any degree of deference to be paid to me that would not be paid to any other Senator in this body; but I think it is an act somewhat disrespectful, and not according to the courtesy which has been extended to Senators who have introduced resolutions in this body, merely resolutions of reference, to refuse to refer them; but the gentleman may renew his motion to lay it on the table.

Mr. MASON. I will renew the motion to lay it on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

KANSAS—LECOMPTON CONSTITUTION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The special order is now before the Senate.

Mr. IVERSON. The order of to-day is the Private Calendar.

Mr. HOUSTON. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to lay my resolution on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is too late to call for the yeas and nays now. The decision of the Chair has been announced.

Mr. IVERSON. It will be remembered by the Senate that to-day, being Friday, is set apart by special resolution for the Private Calendar, and no order can supersede it without a vote of the Senate; but I am willing to yield to-day to the Kansas question, with the general understanding that it shall be disposed of to-day, and we shall be allowed to devote to-morrow to the Private Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The gentleman is right in his view. The Chair had forgotten that to-day was private bill day.

Mr. IVERSON. I give notice that I will call up the Private Calendar to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will regard that as the sense of the Senate. The special order is now under consideration, being the report of the committee of conference on the bill (S. No. 161) for the admission of Kansas into the Union.

Mr. BRODERICK. Mr. President, the Senator from New York, [Mr. SEWARD,] before the Senate adjourned yesterday, announced that he believed all the Senators had spoken upon the question who wished to speak, except himself and the Senator from California. The Senator, I believe, alluded to me. I stated to the Senator a few minutes before he announced to the Senate my intention to speak, that I would, before the yeas and nays were called on the bill, state in a very few words why I intended to vote against it; but I did not intend to make a speech. I am not so vain as to think, after this subject has been so ably discussed by the Senators from Kentucky, Tennessee, Illinois, Vermont, Massachusetts, Ohio, Wisconsin, Michigan, and others, that I could say anything which would be instructive to the Senate. With the permission of the Senator from New York, however, I will briefly state why I will vote against this bill. I find, Mr. President, in the first section of the bill reported by the committee of conference, this language:

"That the State of Kansas be, and is hereby, admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever, but upon this fundamental condition precedent, namely: that the question of admission with the following proposition, in lieu of the ordinance framed at Leecompton, be submitted to a vote of the people of Kansas and assented to by them, or a majority of the voters voting at an election to be held for that purpose, namely: that the following propositions be, and the same are hereby, offered to the people of Kansas for acceptance or rejection, which, if accepted, shall be obligatory on the United States and upon the said State of Kansas, to wit:—"

Senators on the Administration side of the Chamber, who have spoken on this bill, have all contended that it does not submit the constitution to the people of Kansas. I contend that it does, although it is accompanied by a base condition.

I shall not weary the Senate by giving a history of this proceeding; for, as I have said, it has been fully exposed by the Senators who have preceded me; but I have another objection to this bill, and it is, that it provides that Kansas shall be admitted into the Union with a population of thirty-five or forty thousand inhabitants, if she will come into the Union with a slave constitution, while she is debarred from coming into the Union as a free State as long as this Administration are in power. I will try to show why there is no possible chance for Kansas to be admitted as a free State while this Administration are in power.

If Kansas rejects this constitution, she will have to wait until she has a population of ninety-three thousand four hundred and twenty. How is the population of Kansas to be ascertained? By a census taken in 1860, and the census-taker is to be appointed by the President of the United States. We have seen, sir, what the instruments of the Administration have already done in Kansas, and if it can be ascertained in 1860 that a majority of the people of Kansas are in favor of making it a free State, they will fall short of the requisite population; for I do not believe that the men who have taken the management of this contrivance will ever permit Kansas to come into the Union as a free State, if it is in their power to prevent her admission.

I am sure that this bill will be considered by thousands as providing for the submission of the constitution to the people of Kansas; no other construction can be given to it; but, as I have already said, it is accompanied by a base condition. If they accept this premium they will be admitted at once under the Leecompton constitution; but if they refuse it, they are to remain out of the Union as long as there is power to keep them out of the Union by a majority of the Administration Senators.

I believe that there are not more than thirty or thirty-five thousand inhabitants to-day in Kansas, men, women, and children, and no one in my hearing believes she will have ninety-three thousand for five or six years at least, if she does not increase her population more rapidly than she has increased it within the last two or three years. Therefore I can see no possible chance for Kansas to come into the Union as a free State if she rejects the Leecompton constitution, and with it rejects slavery.

I have stated my objections to this bill, and I shall vote against it. I believe it is an unfair measure; it is calculated to arouse a bitter and indignant prejudice in the minds of the people of the North; and I think it will result in no good to the South. I also believe that it will fill the other branch of Congress with men instructed against this proposition. I believe, at the election for the next Congress, every free State in this Union, without exception, will send men to Congress instructed against this contrivance. I would have preferred it in its original shape. That would have been less objectionable to me, and I think it would have been less objectionable to the people whom I represent. For these reasons, I shall vote against this bill.

Mr. SEWARD. Mr. President—

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the honorable Senator will allow me, I desire to make a correction of a statement of fact in relation to the history of certain matters transpiring in Kansas, which arose between the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. PUGH] and myself the other day. As we both spoke from recollection at the time, I did not know but that I might be mistaken. I have, however, looked into the history of Kansas, and I desire to state that I am supported in what I then alleged, by reference to the "History of Kansas," written by the private secretary of Governor Geary. The honorable Senator from Ohio read from a speech made by the honorable Senator from New York, [Mr. SEWARD,] on the 9th of April, 1856, and also from a speech made by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] on the 20th of May, 1856, in which those Senators, basing their calculations upon facts within their knowledge, stated that in their opinion the existing population in the Territory of Kansas at that time was about forty or fifty thousand, and ventured to make the prediction that in a very short period of time it would have a population sufficient to entitle it to a Representative in the other branch of Congress; and then the honorable Senator from Ohio put the question in these words:

"Well, sir, has all this population got to Kansas? This was the pretext made for forcing the Topeka constitution through the Congress of the United States. When they wanted Topeka carried, there was no limit to their assertions of fact, or to their imagination and their prophecies. Then Kansas had forty, fifty, or sixty thousand; and she was to have ninety-three thousand before the bill passed the two Houses, and one hundred thousand in a few months. When it comes to Leecompton, whenever somebody else's bill comes up, they object, because Kansas, two years after all these statements and prophecies, has only forty thousand people. Had she forty thousand then? Had she those magnificent numbers promised us by the Senators from Massachusetts and New York two years ago? If she had, she has been decreasing in population ever since. I think we had better admit her very quickly, for after a while there will not be anybody there, at this enormous rate of decrease.

"This shows that when it comes to any assertion of fact that it is necessary for a political purpose, there will be somebody to manufacture it, and that even Senators representing the sovereign constituencies of this Union will stand up here to assert as true that which turns out to be a great perversion."

In the reply which I made to the honorable Senator, I stated what I understood to be the facts from my recollection then, that the principal troubles which occurred in Kansas occurred after the delivery of those speeches in the Senate of the United States by the honorable Senator from New York and the honorable Senator from Massachusetts. I will refer to the "History of Kansas," as published by the private secretary of Governor Geary, to show the time when certain transactions occurred in that Territory. It was on the 19th of May, 1856, that the forces were gathering about the city of Lawrence. On the 20th of May, 1856, on the very day when the honorable Senator from Massachusetts delivered his speech, this occurred:

"On the following morning, the 20th, several young men, hearing of this transaction, left Lawrence to visit the scene of the tragedy. One of these was named Stewart, who had but recently arrived from the State of New York. They had gone about a mile and a half, when they met two men, armed with Sharpe's rifles. Some words passed between them, when the two strangers raised their rifles, and, taking deliberate aim at Stewart, fired. One of the balls entered his temples. The work of death was instantly accomplished, and another accusing spirit stood before the bar of God."

"Soon after sunrise, on the morning of the 21st"—the day after the honorable Senator from Massachusetts delivered his speech—

"an advance guard of the marshal's army, consisting of about two hundred horsemen, appeared on the top of Mount Oread, on the outskirts of the town of Lawrence, where their cannon had been stationed late on the preceding night. The town was quiet, and the citizens had resolved to submit without resistance to any outrage that might be perpetrated. About seven o'clock Dr. Robinson's house, which stood on the side of the hill, was taken possession of, and used as the headquarters of the invaders." * * *

"Atchison then addressed his forces, in language not sufficiently well selected for ears polite, and then marched the whole column to within a short distance of the hotel, where they halted."

After proceeding with the particulars of the manner in which the deed of destruction was accomplished, the historian further states:

"And then followed scenes of reckless pillage and wanton destruction in all parts of that ill-fated town. Stores were broken into and plundered of their contents. Boils and bars were no obstacles to the entrance of drunken and infuriated men into private dwellings, from which most of the inhabitants had fled in terror. From these everything of value was stolen, and much that was useless to the marauders was destroyed." * * *

"The closing act of this frightful drama was the burning of the house of Dr. Robinson, on the brow of Mount Oread. This was set on fire after the sun had gone down, and the bright light which its flames shed over the comity illuminated the paths of the retreating army, as they proceeded toward their homes, pillaging houses, stealing horses, and violating the persons of defenseless women. All these dreadful deeds were done by human authority. There is yet an account to render to a Higher Power."

It was in the month of June, 1856, that Whitfield gathered his army for the invasion of the Territory. Let us see what happened on the 5th of June, 1856. He states:

"This was the state of affairs near Hickory Point, on the morning of the 5th of June. Whitfield was encamped behind Palmyra with near three hundred men." * * *

"Early on the following morning, (June 6th,) this army separated into two divisions"—speaking of the army of Whitfield—

"one half of it under General Reid, with Captains Pate, Bell, Jenigan, and other prominent leaders, moving towards Osawatimie, whilst the others, under Whitfield, started for Westport."

And again:

"On the 7th, Reid, with one hundred and seventy men, marched into Osawatimie, and without resistance entered each house, robbing it of everything of value. There were but few men in the town, and the women and children were treated with the utmost brutality." * * *

"On the 21st of June, an Indian agent named Gay was traveling in the vicinity of Westport, and was stopped by a party of Buford's men, who asked him if he was in favor of making Kansas a free State. He promptly answered in the affirmative, and was instantly shot dead. Such was the only crime for which this soul was hurried into the eternal world."

"Whilst these events were transpiring on the south side of the Kansas river, Colonel Wilkes, Captain Emery, and other prominent pro-slavery men, were actively employed in persecuting the free-State citizens of Leavenworth. Notices were served on them to quit the city; some were violently seized and imprisoned, and still others carried to the levee, having been deprived of all their property and the greater part of their clothing, placed on board of steamers, and thus compelled to leave the country. At the same time, the steamboats coming up the river continued to be boarded at every stopping place, the free-State passengers insulted, their trunks broken open and robbed, and their arms taken from them; after which, they were put upon return boats, and forced to go back."

But, Mr. President, I will not detain the Senate by reading at length. I rose simply to refer to the facts as stated by the private secretary of Governor Geary, in his "History of Kansas," to show that it was after these speeches and predictions were made by the honorable Senators from New York and Massachusetts, that these transactions occurred in that Territory which aroused that people and prevented an inpouring of that immigration into Kansas, which, if it had not been interrupted in the spring and summer of 1856, would have realized, and fully realized, in my opinion every prediction which was made by those honorable Senators. Mr. President, I have done.

Mr. PUGH. The statement which the Senator from Wisconsin has taken so much pains to read, instead of helping him out of the difficulty which he undertook to correct, in my judgment, precipitates him further into it. What was the point of fact which he undertook to controvert with me the other day? I read from a speech of the Senator from New York, delivered in April, 1856, alleging that there were then forty thousand inhabitants in Kansas, and that his information as to the immigration pouring into the Territory at that time, satisfied him that probably in four months, certainly in a very short period, there would be one hundred thousand. That was his statement. The Senator from Massachusetts, on the 20th of May, 1856, in his speech, estimated that there was not, at the lowest calculation, less than forty thousand, and he cited a calculation, made by a Boston newspaper, which carried the population up to sixty thousand, and said that the immigration pouring into the Territory, according to his information, would give ninety-three thousand before the bill could pass the two Houses of Congress. These statements, being in part assertions of fact then true, and in part prophecies based on information which they said was correct, were made in April and May, 1856:

The Senator from Wisconsin said that the reason why the prophecies were not fulfilled, was that great troubles occurred in Kansas afterwards, and he located them in the winter of 1856-57. That was his excuse. I said to him then that all these allegations—for I do not take them for truths; there may be some truths in them and probably are—were made during that session of Congress repeatedly, and every Senator heard them. All this story about Lawrence, all these allegations of the interruption of highways through Missouri, were repeated here in every form and shape which the imagination of men could suggest at that very session. All these allegations relative to the troubles in Kansas, or many of them, were before the Senate at the very time the Senators from Massachusetts and New York spoke. They were before us in answer to the President's special message of January, 1856. Now, how late does the Senator place the latest disturbance on which he relies? The 7th of June, 1856; that is the latest period.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I could read—

Mr. PUGH. Well, the whole month of June then; will that satisfy the Senator? The Toombs bill was introduced on the 24th of June, and was committed to the Committee on Territories, and came back here soon after, and after these other transactions to which he alludes, those Senators nevertheless persisted in offering the Topeka constitution as an amendment to the Toombs bill, and they carried on the discussion during the whole month of July, and in the latter part of that month the House of Representatives passed the Topeka bill and sent it here. If the population had been driven out of Kansas, if she no longer had the number which they suggested, or if their prophecies were not to be fulfilled, why did they persist in the Topeka constitution at a period subsequent to the very disturbances of which the Senator speaks?

But I did not care about this. How many men were driven out of Kansas? I recollect that natter was alleged then; and in July, while we were debating the Toombs bill, I think, on a motion to print copies, when this allegation was made, I asked the Senators where were all these people who had been driven out. I called on several of them, by name, to tell me how many of them were in their States. Nobody answered. There might have been half a dozen people driven out; but does any Senator seriously pretend, does any man pretend, with the least regard to truth, that twenty thousand people were driven out of the Territory? If such a transaction as that occurred; if such a body of people had been driven out of the Territory, everybody would know where they were. I say it was upon the faith of those representations as to population, (and I stated so at the time), supposing those Senators to be well informed in that regard, it was in the expectation that the population of Kansas, at that time, was about forty thousand, and was increasing very rapidly, that I yielded against my convictions of right, and voted for the Toombs bill; otherwise, I would not have voted for it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. A single word, Mr. President. The question I put to the honorable Senator was, whether he had forgotten that it was during the summer and fall and winter of 1856 that these troubles occurred. I read, it is true, only of troubles which occurred in the months of May and June; but I excused myself from reading further, for I did not desire to trespass on the patience of the Senate. I will, however, read, now, one or two sentences further from the same history of Kansas affairs:

"A detachment of Atchison's army under General Reid, numbering about three hundred men, with one piece of artillery, attacked Osawatimie on the 30th of August."

That was the last day but one of the summer of 1856. Again, in speaking of these same transactions on the 4th of September, and from that period onward, he says:

"At Leavenworth and vicinity outrages had been renewed and were being committed, if possible, with increased ferocity. As Governor Shannon afterwards remarked, 'the roads were literally strewn with dead bodies.' A United States officer discovered a number of slaughtered men—thirteen, it is stated—lying unburied, who had been seized and brained; some of them being shot in the forehead, and others down through the top of the skull, whilst some were cut with hatchets and their bodies shockingly and disgustingly mutilated. On the 1st of September"—

That is the beginning of the fall of 1856—

"On the 1st of September, Captain Frederick Emory, a United States mail contractor, rendered himself conspicuous in Leavenworth. At the head of a band of ruffians, mostly from western Missouri. They entered houses, stores, and dwellings of free State people, and, in the name of 'law and order,' abused and robbed the occupants, and drove them out into the roads, irrespective of age, sex, or condition. Under pretense of searching for arms, they approached the house of William Phillips, the lawyer who had previously been tarred and feathered, and carried to Missouri. Phillips, supposing he was to be subjected to a similar outrage, and resolved not to submit to the indignity, stood upon his defense. In repelling the assaults of the mob, he killed two of them, when the others burst into the house, and poured a volley of balls into his body, killing him instantly, in the presence of his wife and another lady. His brother, who was also present, had an arm badly broken by bullets, and was compelled to submit to an amputation. Fifty of the free-State prisoners were then driven on board the Polar Star, bound for St. Louis. On the next day a hundred more were embarked by Emory and his men, on the steamboat Emma. During these proceedings, an election was held for mayor, and William E. Murphy, since appointed Indian agent by the President, was elected 'without opposition.'"

"At this time civil war raged in all the populous districts. Women and children had fled from the Territory. The roads were impracticable. No man's life was safe; and every person, when he lay down to rest at night, bolted and barred his doors, and fell asleep grasping firmly his pistol, gun, or knife."

This was the condition of things in September, 1856. If I could take up the time of the Senate, I could read the whole history of the transactions of the fall and winter of 1856, and prove beyond all dispute that the civil war raging in that Territory broke up the immigration to it, drove out hundreds of people from the Territory of Kansas, and prevented thousands from wintering in it; but I have already taken up more time than I intended.

Mr. POLK. I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin if he does not know that the man who wrote that book, Dr. Gihon, did not get into Kansas until the fall of 1856? The Senator has read of transactions that are said to have occurred, some of them, as early as May, 1856. Does he not know that Dr. Gihon, the secretary of Governor Geary, who wrote that book, did not arrive in Kansas until late in the fall of 1856?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will not take up time now, but I could refer to the book and state the exact date when he went there.

Mr. POLK. My point is, that it was after all these transactions.

Mr. SEWARD. Mr. President, this debate has manifestly lost some portion of its interest, although we are approaching a yet undetermined conclusion. The length of time which it has occupied might well account for the decline of excitement, and the repetition of the same topics, and the same arguments—repetition not too often for duly enlightening the minds of the people of the United States in regard to this great question, but still too often for patient endurance here will account still further for that decline. I think, however, that something is due also to the change which has occurred in the form the question has at last assumed. We began with a high-sounding theme. It was, at least, one so noble and so generous as that of popular sovereignty, and it speedily and justly rose into the region of human rights. In that imposing shape it was sent to a committee of conference. It now comes back from the conference chamber in the shape of an artifice—if it were respectful to say so, I should say a trick—of legislative legerdemain. Assuming that one or both of two factions is to be deceived, all that seems to be left for us to discuss or the public to consider, is, who is the dupe? In both ends of the Capitol, to-day, ingenuity is taxed to take to pieces this machine, which has been gotten up solely for the purpose of a legislative puzzle.

Now, Mr. President, that is a kind of debate for which I have the least taste, and, as I think, the least talent. I have no curiosity for such investigations. Among my first recollections, is one that a person named Redheifer invented and put in operation a curious machine, which was given to the world in the city of Philadelphia, and in the neighborhood of Congress. It was a perpetual motion which was to supersede wind, and sail, and steam, and every other motive power. The machine worked effectively, beautifully, perfectly; but when the public expectation was satisfied by this success, immediately Congress and the Legislature of Pennsylvania, and everybody else throughout the whole country, wanted to see the machine taken to pieces. Knowing that there was a human agent within, or connected with it, they wanted to see whether that secret actor was concealed in the upper, or in the nether compartment of the machine; whether in the chamber above, the cellar beneath, or in an adjoining street or house. I remember well that I took no interest in that question. The machine was a very good thing as it was; it would be a very worthless thing when the secret should be found out.

So, also, I remember, in later years, that a German, with invention peculiar to his race and nation, exhibited and put into action, in the city of New York, an automaton chess-player. It was constructed so skillfully, and mysteriously endowed with such intelligence, that though a creature of human hands, it would not only beat every adversary, but would even cry "check!" over the defeated competitor. *Just so soon as it was certain that the machine was perfect, all the world demanded that it should be taken to pieces, to ascertain in what part of the machine, or in what part of the house, or in what part of the city, the human agent dwelt which mysteriously directed the movement of the emblematic figures on the chess-board. I took no interest in that question. I was satisfied with the chess-player as it was, and I knew all the world would like it less when they came to know more of what remained to be known about it. I acted in those cases on this principle: that no one was deceived by Redheifer's perpetual motion but those who wanted to be deceived; nobody was blinded by the automaton chess-player except those who wanted to be duped. So it is with the bill of the conference committee on Kansas. It was gotten up to answer a purpose of self-deception—gotten up with care, so that it could not be explained satisfactorily by the one faction to the other, or even to itself.

Mr. President, with this explanation I might suffer this bill to pass. I might also suffer it to pass on the ground that the puzzle has been explained satisfactorily, triumphantly by the very astute Senator from Vermont, [Mr. COLLAMER,] by the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE, always effective, and by all my associates on this side of the House, as well as by the distinguished Senators from Illinois and Michigan, who have performed this task with more complete success than I could hope to do it. I shall therefore be very brief in my analysis of the bill.

I have to state, in the first place, that the bill makes up and presents to the people of Kansas, and to the country, a fictitious or false issue. When I say false, I mean a foreign or fictitious question substituted for the true one. The true issue before Congress and the country, is the question whether the people of Kansas shall or shall not, as a condition of coming into this Union, have a right to accept or reject the Lecompton constitution. Now, be it understood, that Congress gives to every new State, when it comes into the Union, a dowry taken from the public lands within its borders. Every new State receives it in every case. Upon the giving of such a dowry, or upon the quantity or extent of it, speaking practically, no question is ever raised in Congress. The Lecompton convention sent an application or a demand for a large dowry, one larger than is usually allowed. The Senate passed a bill putting aside, thrusting out of the way altogether, not only the amount of the dowry, but the giving one at all, postponing it until another day; and contented itself with barely disclaiming, in the bill for the admission of Kansas which they passed, an assent to the demand which the Lecompton convention, speaking in the behalf of Kansas, had made.

The House of Representatives, in their bill for the admission of Kansas, treated the matter in the same way. They turned to the Minnesota bill, and copied from it into their Kansas bill, which they sent to the Senate, a provision by which Kansas should receive a dowry exactly equal to that of Minnesota.

From the beginning of this debate to the end, there was no discussion, no question raised about the amount of the dowry, or the giving it, or the withholding it, and it was never heard of. Each House was prepared to acquiesce on that point with the other. From the 7th day of December, when this debate began in both Houses, until the 25th day of April, no voice ever raised a question in regard to the form, nature, character, or amount of that dowry; and thus entirely ignored by both Houses, as that subject was, the whole question was sent to a committee of conference.

When it came back from the conference chamber, we found a recital in the bill to the effect that there is a difference between Congress and the people of Kansas about the amount of the dowry, and that upon that Congress desires to make a proposition to the people of Kansas. The bill, therefore, submits that proposition to their votes. I have asked the reporter this morning, and have learned from him that the debates of this Congress, as published in the Congressional Globe, occupy now eighteen hundred quarto pages, and that of this immense volume of words which has been poured out here, and is now running in rivers over this broad land, nine hundred pages are occupied with the debates on the Kansas question. Now, sir, I will listen with respect and with kindness to any Senator who will show me, in the pages of that debate, in either House of Congress, one word, not to say one page, occupied with the dispute which the committee of conference have now announced as perplexing Congress, and which they propose, by their report, to refer to the people of Kansas for settlement.

This question about the dowry is, therefore, a feigned issue, a fabricated issue, a false issue substituted for the true and real one. It is a resort in legislation to the old practice of the lawyers in the times of black-letter learning. When an honest man who was the owner of a freehold was ejected or turned out of it by an intruder with violence, they would not let him bring an action in his own name against the intruder, but would oblige him to copy out from the book of forms a summons or declaration in the name of James Jackson, an imaginary man, who happened to be in possession under an imaginary lease from the true owners, and was supposed to be ejected therefrom by a casual and imaginary intruder named John Stiles. The lawyers made up the issue in due form between these purely fictitious persons, and so the honest man tried his title to his freehold and recovered it, not against the man who evicted him, but against a man of straw, and recovered it not in his own name, but in the name of a man of hay. In all the States of this Union I believe they have abolished these miserable artifices which anciently figured in the conduct of legal proceedings. What earthly necessity is there for resorting to them in legislation? Sir, I have no patience with such devices. Though a man generally of gentle dispositions, some good nature and much endurance, I feel, when I meet such a false issue as this put into the place of a true one, in the course of our legislation, very much like that chivalrous Virginia gentleman who happening to be abroad in his neighborhood when the sheriff came through it serving summonses in ejectment in the name of James Jackson against John Stiles, everywhere, and leaving them around to disturb good, quiet freemen with their mysterious portents, pursued and overtook the sheriff and asked if he could tell him where that James Jackson lived, because if he could only find out where he lived he would send him a challenge. [Laughter.]

I show the Senate next, a second false issue presented in this new bill, an issue raised concerning the actual amount of population in Kansas. The committee of conference find that there is just population enough to make a slave State, and by no means enough, not one half enough, to make a free State. There is just population enough to admit the State at once if it will accept the Lecompton constitution, and not population enough at all to admit it under any other. When did this question of numbers arise in this debate? It arose just in that day and hour and moment when the report of the committee of conference was brought into the Senate and Representatives' Chambers.

We are required now to investigate this fact, and to decide whether there is population enough to entitle Kansas to be admitted as a free State, if she shall choose to be a free State. I would not dwell on this false issue, if I had not evidence that it is effective here. It seems to carry with it the vote of the honorable Senator from Ohio who has spoken this morning, [Mr. PUGH;] at least I can find no other explanation of his course upon this bill. The honorable Senator from Ohio, under instructions from his Legislature, voted against the Senate's bill for the admission of Kansas because it did not submit the Lecompton constitution to the people. The honorable Senator tells us that this new bill does not submit the Lecompton constitution to the people, and yet he votes for it.

Mr. PUGH. I should like to ask the Senator where his authority is for stating that that was the reason for my going against it?

Mr. SEWARD. I am arguing, sir.

Mr. PUGH. That was not the instruction. The instruction was not based on that ground.

Mr. SEWARD. As the honorable gentleman has left his course obscure, I am endeavoring to arrive at results by such lights as shine along our way. I hope to do him no injustice. I infer that he votes for this bill on the ground that Kansas has got just numbers enough to make a slave State, and not numbers enough to make a free State. The honorable Senator has taken more pains to refer to the speeches that I have made in the Senate heretofore, than I ever took for myself. He has so presented remarks taken from these speeches as to imply that, in 1856, I stood upon the ground that there were votes enough to make a State in Kansas, and if there were not, there soon would be.

Sir, I have heard the extracts from those speeches which have been read. I ask, when I ever promised the rapid settlement of a new State under the ravages of invasion and amid the desolations of civil war? I spoke for the advance of Kansas under the Topeka constitution, which I urged the Senate to recognize—in other words, as a free State. I ask, again, did I stand up here and promise a vernal, a luxuriant growth, to a slave State planted anywhere, much more to a slave State planted north of 36° 30' of north latitude? No, sir. Continue civil war and slavery in Kansas, or even continue slavery there alone, and my promises that she shall have population enough to make a State entitled to a Representative in the House of Representatives will be postponed as long as the promises made in the same respect in regard to Florida, for aught I know. I know better, sir, what it is that makes States stand and flourish, or droop and decline. I do not think I was ever so young when I saw the play of Othello opened on the stage, and saw the odious scene of amalgamation there—the Moorish general married to the fair daughter of the Senator of Venice in the first act—I did not know that contentions and strifes would follow in the second, and that desolation and death would be the dénouement of the drama.

Sir, I stood here in 1856, as I stand here now, advocating the admission of Kansas into the Union as a free State—advocating it not upon the ground of a superabundant, or even sufficient population, but simply upon the ground that it was necessary, even though I confessed it to be a revolutionary movement, under the forms of the Constitution, to arrest evils for which there seemed to be no other remedy. It would have been well if you had listened to my counsel then. I stand on that ground now. It is immaterial to me, totally immaterial, whether Kansas has ten thousand or ten hundred thousand people; I shall vote for her admission under a constitution of her own choice that secures equal and impartial liberty to all her people, with her present population, be it what it may. You may pile numbers up until you reach the population of China and the myriads of the teeming East, yet I will not give a vote to admit the State in violation of its own will, or its own just convictions of its interest in the dignity of human labor.

Mr. President, I have to allege against this bill a third fault, namely, that it is indirect; it bears the stamp of equivocation upon every page and every line. The issue which was directly raised between the two Houses, as I have already said, was whether Kansas should be admitted into the Union with or without the submission of the Lecompton constitution. Parties in Congress, and in the country, had committed themselves upon that issue, as they thought, irrevocably.

Does this bill submit the Lecompton constitution to the people, or does it not? There is the riddle. The party who objected to the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution because the constitution was not submitted, are expected to say, and some of them do say, that their difficulty is removed because this bill submits the constitution to the people. The party who were committed to vote against any bill by which it should be submitted, say that it is not submitted.

Here is a question which I must solve. It lies right across my way. Well, sir, I have made up my mind upon it. I have reached the conclusion that the bill does not submit the Lecompton constitution to the people. No, sir, not at all! I think so because its two senatorial fathers of the committee of conference, the honorable Senator from Missouri, [Mr. GREEN], and the honorable Senator from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTER], reject that construction, and say it is unfounded. Certainly this is the best authority. Their construction is the interpretation given by the framers of the bill itself. Then I look into the bill and I find that it carefully defines and limits what it does submit. And what it submits is the question upon the dowry; nothing more, nothing less, nothing else: dowry or no dowry, pure and simple. But I look further, to see if Lecompton is not smuggled away in some other part of the bill. I go back, of course, to the beginning. I find that the bill begins with a recital of the only point of difference there is, and that is about the amount of the dowry. Thus I have shown that the bill most clearly does not at all submit the Lecompton constitution to the people of Kansas.

But, in pursuing this subject, I have made up my mind Mr. President, on the other hand, that the bill does submit the Lecompton constitution to the people. Of course I must prove that fact also. I will prove that in this way: there is to be an election held in Kansas, and at that election the question is to be submitted to the people, will you accept the dowry proposed by Congress, or will you not? If you accept the dowry, then the Lecompton constitution, with all its hideous features, and ferocious, blood-stained hands, stands erect in Kansas now; and except as God may preserve the people there from seduction and intimidation, it stands forever. But if the people say nay to the dowry, then the monster Lecompton perishes and dies in the agony of its birth. Now, Mr. President, how can this consequence, this result, follow unless a question which involves it has been submitted to the people? I submit, sir, without fear of contradiction, that I have shown that this bill does submit the Lecompton constitution to the people of Kansas.

I am confirmed in this by the construction given to the bill by those to whom it is addressed, for recollect it is to be passed upon by the people of the North and the people of the South. We have seen, on behalf of the people of the South, that they say that the constitution is not submitted. But they are not to testify for this, the Northern construction. Here is the language of a Democratic paper in the State of New Hampshire:

"We present, in another column, the bill agreed upon by the conference committee for the admission of Kansas, which was reported on Friday last. It will be seen that it submits to the people of Kansas the simple and direct question, whether they will be admitted into the Union under the Lecompton constitution, or remain a Territory until they number inhabitants enough to entitle them to a Representative in Congress." "It seems to us that this bill ought to satisfy every Democrat who has opposed the original bill for admission with the Lecompton constitution, for the reason that the people were not allowed to decide for themselves whether they would have that constitution or not. By this bill, the people are allowed to decide that question; it is to be fairly and squarely submitted to them."

Now, I find myself in a dilemma. I have proved that the Lecompton constitution is not submitted to the people by this bill, and I have proved also that it is so submitted. Here is a paradox; that is, a case in which the propositions are both true, and yet they are as irreconcilable as free-will and fate, which perplex so much the theologians. I am not willing to stop where the theologians stop, without trying to reconcile the difference; I am determined to find out how it is that both these propositions are true, and therefore both false. I think I have found it. The honorable Senator from Missouri, the chairman of the committee, has helped me out of the dilemma. He has told us that although the life or death of Lecompton hangs on the acceptance of the proposition of the dowry by the people of Kansas, yet that is a consequence only of their acceptance or rejection of that dowry; and what have Congress to do with such remote consequences as that? The consequence which Congress looks to is the first consequence merely—dowry or no dowry. If, after that, there comes a further consequence for good or evil, Congress has nothing to do with it at all. It is a convenient way, and I refer it to the theologians for their uses. Just limit the responsibility of the Creator to the first consequence, and let all later consequences go to the arch one of evil to explain, defend, or answer for.

This explanation of the honorable chairman, although it is perfectly clear to me, yet was not quite satisfactory until I cast around me to see how effectual it was in convincing other minds that had been perplexed. Sir, the first member of Congress in the House of Representatives who broke ground against the Lecompton constitution was an honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Cox], representing, I think, the capital district in that honored State. He denounced this Lecompton outrage in language so strong, with a tone so bold, with a logic so triumphant, that I was disposed to contribute something from my own means to give a circulation to his impassioned and conclusive address. It has gone, therefore, broadcast over the land. He is a man that could not be convinced of his error by any inconclusive argument; yet he is converted to this proposition, and I think it due to him that, in this poor way, I should give to the world, as far as it is in my power, his explanation of this bill:

"Mr. Cox said he was first in the House to oppose the Lecompton constitution, yet he had come to the conclusion to sustain the report. Proper considerations had actuated him throughout. Though the constitution was not to be submitted, the report provided for obtaining the sense of the people upon it."

There is an explanation, Mr. President, that is an explanation—an explanation most satisfactory, most triumphant; a process has been provided for obtaining the sense of the people on a proposition which is not submitted to them! Sir, there is no State but Ohio that could have suggested a solution of this problem like that.

Well, Mr. President, being a little inquisitive, I have looked further to find out the nature, the form of this process by which the sense of the people, in regard to the Lecompton constitution, is obtained without submitting the constitution to them. I have found out the secret. I will show it by an illustration: I suppose the case of a Knew Nothing or a Masonic lodge, where it is proposed that a candidate shall be admitted. The society are unwilling to give offense by rejecting him, and yet a portion of its members are unwilling to accept him. They have in those societies, I understand, two kinds of balls—black balls and white balls; votes are cast in favor of a proposition with white balls, against it with a black ball. Now, the society declare that whereas there is a difference of taste among its members, some preferring to use black balls and others white, they submit the choice between the two kinds of balls, ignoring altogether the question of any candidate who is to be voted for. But they say that the members of the society shall deposit their balls in the box, and if there are more white balls than black, the candidate comes in; if there are more black balls than there are white, then it shall be taken and deemed that the lodge prefer black balls to white; and not only that, but it shall also be deemed and taken that the candidate was a very unworthy person, and shall never be admitted at all, or at least till he grows ten years older. [Laughter.] That is the process, I think, by which you are going to obtain the sense of the people on this proposition which you do not submit to them.

Mr. President, the use of equivocation, or the double entendre, is an act of immorality in legislation, deserving of severe censure. What respect, what submission, what obedience can you expect from the citizen, if legislators resort to such a practice in making their laws? There are worse consequences beyond this immorality. The measure before Congress will draw after it, not only the entrance of Kansas into the Union as a slave State, but all the consequences which will follow from the establishment of a slave State in the center of this continent, on the highway between the Atlantic and Pacific north of 36° 30'—a slave State that we are, for our present purposes, to consider is to be perpetual and immortal. You have only, by this or by any other course of action, direct or indirect, to introduce slavery there, and extend it across our whole domain from north to south, to raise a barrier between the East and the West, between the Atlantic and Pacific portions of the Republic, I was going to say as enduring, I will say more insurmountable, than the ridges of the Rocky Mountains or the snow-capped range of the Sierra Nevada.

Sir, it amuses me much when I hear patriotic and sagacious men predicting the removal of this capital from the falls of the Potomac to the junction of the Alleghany and the Monongahela, or sometimes, with a broader forecast, to Cincinnati, the queen city of Ohio, or further on to St. Louis, and so settling the center of Federal power in the valley of the Mississippi. Sir, if you will only confine this institution of slavery within its present boundaries, give it no further room nor verge, the capital of this country may remain where it is, but the center of the Union will be nearer the valley of Mexico than the valley of the Mississippi. Then that power will grasp the equator on the one side and the northern pole on the other. But no such promise, no such hope awaits the Republic if you separate the free Atlantic States from the free Pacific coast.

Sir, while this bill ignores the real question, it suppresses, with double care, the great, leading, actual political fact, which lies everywhere just beneath the surface of the whole debate. If Kansas comes into this Union under the Lecompton constitution, she comes as a slave State. If she comes under any other constitution, it is hoped, by those who advocate freedom, that she will come as a free State. This bill gives Kansas the choice of being a slave State, and only that choice. You have already induced the Supreme Court of the United States to expound your Constitution so that the President, on their authority, declares that Kansas, so long as she remains a Territory, is a slave State as much as South Carolina. The change you offer her is, that if she will accept the Lecompton constitution she shall be recognized in form, as well as in fact, as a slave State. Sir, your bill gives no alternative but this. It does indeed say that in the future—God knows how far off it may be—if slavery be now recognized there, the people of Kansas may make another constitution, and send it to you here for your consideration. Sir, the postponement is a mockery. When they come here with a free constitution, they will do only what they did two years ago; you refused them then. They will only have in that constitution what they had in the Missouri prohibition, thirty-eight years ago; and you struck that prohibition from the statute book. They will only repeat what they demand now, to be admitted as a free State; you refuse now to admit them in this character. Sir, it is offering a wager against chance, backed by device and fraud. Here is a piece of silver of the coinage of the United States. On the one side is the eagle, on the reverse is the emblem of liberty; you say to Kansas choose, wager, whether the eagle or liberty is uppermost; say eagle and it is slavery; say liberty is uppermost; still slavery wins the wager. Sir, this bill is nothing but Lecompton over again. Lecompton with a new variation, but the abhorrent air pervades the entire arrangement of this composition.

I beg now to ask the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BIGLER,] himself a representative of the first State in this Union that, after the Revolution, moved for universal freedom, what Kansas has done that her people shall not be indulged at least in an equal choice between liberty and slavery? I ask my venerable and esteemed friend from Rhode Island, [Mr. ALLEN,] the land of Roger Williams, how he supposes he can reconcile that proud and patriotic free State, most and earliest completely free of all the States of this Union, to this bill, which gives State power, State prestige, and a dowry in lands, to Kansas, if she will choose slavery; and gives her provincial degradation and debasement, with poverty, if she elects freedom? I ask my excellent friend from Iowa, [Mr. JONES,] he that represents a State carved out of that rich and beautiful domain dedicated to freedom by the Missouri compromise, by the same great act which originally guaranteed freedom to Kansas, but which guarantee was broken to Kansas, though preserved to Iowa—I ask him what answer he will give to that gallant people for having planted on their borders a State which was denied the liberty to choose on equal terms between freedom and slavery? I will not ask the honorable Senator from California, [Mr. GWIN,] whose State was saved to freedom by efforts other than his own, but who knows that California has been, by that very salvation, further saved, with all its advantages of power and of strength and wealth, to the Pacific coast, and made so strong that it is self-sustaining, and almost defiant—I will not ask him for an explanation. I said, when California was admitted, that the slave States need not fear her; that California, though filled with immigration, chiefly from the free States, would prove for years to come the strongest slave State in this Union. I will not ask the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PUGH,] for I have already interpreted, according to my humble ability, the views by which he reconciles this measure to the judgment of his great constituency. I would, indeed, ask the honorable Senators from Indiana; but they may have that question to settle at home, speedily, without being prematurely interrogated here.

My honorable friend from Vermont [Mr. Foor] reminds me that I have forgotten New Jersey. Sir, I will speak for New Jersey myself. The blood of men who hazarded life, fame, and fortune, for freedom in the Jerseys, courses through my own veins. I know the blue hills of the Jerseys well. They are mingled with all the fond recollections of my childhood. I will answer, that votes which are given here for this Lecompton bill are the last votes in ten years that will be given for slavery by Representatives of New Jersey.

Mr. President, I have shown that this bill gives to the people only a show of choice between freedom and slavery. I have next to show that it provides for overriding, counteracting, and defeating that very shadow of a choice if it shall be in favor of freedom. The bill provides, not that the people of Kansas, or their Legislature, or their authorities, shall appoint the commissioners under whom the contemplated election shall be held, and its results ascertained, but it constitutes a board, to consist of five persons; and while it allows two to be named by the people of Kansas, it asks three for the President of the United States. Now, sir, there have been five agents appointed by the President of the United States to hold elections, and return results in the Territory of Kansas already, and every one of them has been dishonored and disgraced for having struggled to prevent fraud, and to certify the truth about these elections. The ghosts upon the banks of the Styx constitute a cloud scarcely more dense than the spirits of the departed Governors of Kansas, condemned to exile and ruin by the President for having certified the truth against falsehood in regard to the elections between freedom and slavery in Kansas.

Sir, I am accustomed to measure my word when I speak of other men, even of public men. I know how liable I am to err myself. I think that I have so much of charity as will induce a favorable judgment of a political adversary to the full measure that I expect and ask it for myself. But, sir, though it is with pain, and shame, and mortification, yet I do confess that I cannot trust the President of the United States. It is the most humiliating confession I have ever made in the presence of my countrymen and the world; for, when I have looked over the long roll of kings, princes, doges, and emperors, and have seen how their careers began in fraud, culminated in assassination, and ended in violence, I have said a complete demonstration of the success of the American Constitution is found in the fact that, with all the defects of the instrument, and amid the often tumultuous movements of the people, there is a roll of names of those who have filled the Presidency whose virtues outshine those of any dynasty that has ever ruled any nation on the face of the whole earth. Sir, if the President of the United States had, even allowed, not to say if he had enforced, fairness in the elections in Kansas, she would not be a suppliant, trembling with dismay and apprehension, in the Senate of the United States to-day. I know that, in speaking thus plainly, I shall wound the sensibilities of some public and patriotic men. They will cry shame upon me, when I disparage the fame of the President of the United States. But, sir, I am used to that. The world is used to that. I remember that there were patriots in Virginia who cried shame on Patrick Henry when he denounced George the Third. There were not wanting patriots in the Senate of Rome who heard with pain Cato denounce the first Caesar. Sir, those who have brought liberty down and trampled it in the dust have never been those who, in Senates, accused emperors, kings, or Presidents.

Upon what grounds is this bill, thus shown to be so deeply objectionable, recommended to us? First, it is recommended as a compromise. The honorable chairman tells us that when there is a difference there can never be a settlement unless there is compromise; the House of Representatives has given away something; the Senate has given away something, though everybody, except myself, has failed in finding out what there is given or gotten. Still we are to accept it as a compromise. If it is a compromise at all, to be urged on me, it must be a compromise that gives me something of freedom in exchange for much of slavery. What do I get for freedom in Kansas? The privilege for that people to make a constitution when they shall have a population of one hundred thousand, and coming here and presenting it to Congress. Very well; what then? Is it to be a free State then? No. Then it shall be "admitted free or slave, just exactly as the people shall desire." Well, sir, that is just what we had in 1854, when the original Kansas-Nebraska bill was passed. We have had that privilege ever since. We could always make a constitution, and come here and obtain admission free or slave, as we pleased, according to the text of your statute-book; but we have come here and demanded freedom, and have been contumeliously spurned from your presence. They refuse to be admitted as a slave State, and they are remanded home to try it over again, and reconcile themselves to slavery, on the penalty of coming no more, or not until they number one hundred thousand souls. If Kansas shall do this, and be docile and quiet, you think you will admit her when she comes as a free State, a half dozen or a dozen years hence, but you hope, nevertheless, that in the mean time she will be demoralized, and come at last a slave State, I tell you, moreover, that when she shall come as a free State, as she will, you will be unable to satisfy yourselves upon the forms she has gone through with in attaining that happy condition. Sir, we shall not deceive ourselves. There is no freedom for Kansas under this bill.

But, sir, a compromise offers equivalents to two contending parties, and it is made by and between representatives of those parties. Who are the parties here? The real parties in this dispute are, on the one side, the free-State party of Kansas and the Republican party of the Union; and on the other side, the slave-State party of Kansas and the Democracy of the Union. The Democracy of the Union are, by the creeds of their party, the recognized defenders, and only defenders, of slavery in the Union. This compromise is a compromise made between two factions of the Democratic party, excluding every free-State man of Kansas and every Representative of the free-State or Republican party in Congress. There is not one in our whole number who consents to this act.

It is, therefore, just no compromise at all; it is a pretense of compromise. Sir, I was born suspicious of legislative compromises. That temper has grown on me more and more every day of my life. I have seen the dangers and the evils that have followed them; and I made up my mind when I came here, that I would harden my face as a flint against any compromise whatever between freedom and slavery. This compromise, however, inspires me with hope unknown before. I look on it with more complacency than on any other, for it is such a miserable imitation of the compromises which have been hallowed in the respect and affections of the people of the United States for generations, that it will bring the whole system of compromise henceforth and forever into ridicule, and unmitigated contempt.

The honorable Senator from Virginia, and the honorable Senator from Missouri, commend this bill to us as a measure of peace—at least the honorable Senator from Virginia promises that it will bring a truce for four or five years. Sir, there is no peace in this world for compromisers; there is no peace for those who practice evasion; there is no peace in a republican land for any statesmen but those who act directly, and boldly abide the popular judgment when it may be fairly and clearly and fully ascertained, without attempting to falsify the issue submitted or to corrupt the tribunal. Sir, beneath the white gauze that is spread over this signal of truce I see distinctly the mingled stains of fraud and blood—black spots and red, the true, unerring marks of a piratical flag. If you mean, by troubles, apprehensions of civil commotion, of violence, of turbulence, of sedition, of faction and civil war, I tell you frankly you need be at no pains to avert those dire evils. This cause of equal and impartial freedom in the States has at last become strong enough to work its way through constitutional forms to its destined and final triumph. But if you mean agitation, which is to be avoided or suppressed by this legislative or any other device, then let me assure you plainly that you reckon altogether wildly.

I smile when I hear Senators talk about the people getting tired of Kansas and tired of this eternal agitation about slavery. They look into the city press of Philadelphia, of Baltimore, of Washington, and of New York, and of Boston, and they find there assurances that the people are getting tired of agitation, and willing to have the Kansas question settled with freedom or with slavery, one way or the other. Sir, they look only at the eddy while they overlook the tide. They make the mistake that the felon did a few months ago upon the banks of the Genesee when he slew his brother and precipitated him from the bank into the river, just below the first fall and just above the other, thence to float down the last cataract, and be buried forever in the lake below; but when the morning came the corpse of the victim lay floating on the river side. He had mistaken the eddy near the shore for the full and ever swelling tide which man, by no art can compress or restrain. But, Senators, you shall have peace in Kansas; you will have peace in Kansas; it will come to you in spite of yourselves; but it will come only in the triumph of peace-giving principles. How do you expect to get peace by this bill? You will get a slave State one way or another. You will get a slave State by the popular election if you get it fairly under the operation of bribes and menaces. Will the people of Kansas remain corrupted, after they have accepted your bribe and escaped your terrors? That is not the character of the American people. You will get it by fraud, by a certificate from the President, that popular sovereignty has gone in favor of Lecompton, when, in fact, it has gone the other way. Will that make peace? I think I should like to be near by and see this slave State attempted to be organized under the Lecompton constitution. I remember that legislators as wise as we—the world thought them much wiser—who had seats in the British Parliament, and had a President, whom, however, they called a King, insisted that the people of New York should live under what, to them, was a slave constitution, while they had made up their minds to have in its place a free one, established by themselves. The provincial British government went on board the brig Halifax, and sent forth its remonstrances and denunciations safely from the decks of his Majesty's armed ship. They were, however, brutum fulmen. After a short time, the British Government and the ship disappeared below the Neversink, to return no more forever. The British Government undertook to rule Virginia under a slave constitution, as it was regarded by them. But, as the strife rose higher, the whole provincial government, with the prestige and power of the British Empire to back it, took refuge on board the schooner Fowey, and descended to the Hampton Roads. There it committed a few pitiful invasions upon the property of the patriotic planters and citizens of that great State, and then disappeared forever.

Sir, your Lecompton government of Kansas will be afloat on the Missouri river; when it begins. The Missouri river will not be wide enough for it; it must go down for safety until it reaches the broader channel of the Mississippi, and when you next look for it, you will find it stranded on the beach of the Gulf of Mexico. There is to be no Lecompton State, no slave State in Kansas. Nevertheless, you enact, by this law, that there shall be a slave State in Kansas, and there shall be no other. Well, sir, if you pass the bill to-day as you say you are going to do, it will reach Kansas in about ten days; in about ten days after that, the new State of Kansas will be organized under the new Leavenworth free-State constitution, and about the 7th day of June, when you are impatient to go home, Kansas will be beleaguering you here for admission as a free State. She will be telling you she does not know anything about your slave State that you have ordered to be erected within her borders; you will, of course, spurn her from your path, and will go home. The people of Kansas will then appeal to the popular elections which are to elect twenty Senators and a whole House of Representatives about the first Tuesday in November next. Now, I ask the honorable supporters of this bill here, belonging to the free States, about how many Democratic Senators are going to be returned into this body through the action of the State Legislatures, to be chosen this year just after you have passed this bill. I ask for information. The honorable Senator from California has spoken of the only State that I thought was hopelessly lost to slavery. For all the rest, I think, if it were not presumptuous, that I might speak myself; but I leave the representatives of those States to speak for themselves.

Mr. BIGLER. Will the Senator from New York allow me to interrupt him for one moment?

Mr. SEWARD. Certainly.

Mr. BIGLER. I do not desire to interrupt the Senator more than one moment; but I thought perhaps it would be well for him to know that the bill which we are discussing here has passed the other branch of the Legislature.

Mr. SEWARD. Well, Mr. President, then the people of Kansas will come here under the Leavenworth constitution, and meet you on the first Monday in December next when you assemble here, and they will ask you to admit them as a free State. Have you any law that will prevent their coming here in that character? The Constitution of the United States says that the people of the United States may petition, and they may petition for what they please. The people of Kansas can petition to be admitted as a State under the Leavenworth constitution. Then there is no obstacle in the way of their coming here. Have you any constitutional prohibition to prevent me from voting for them? I shall vote for them as a free State, in spite of a thousand such laws as this. I tell you more, you yourselves will vote for them too, a large number of you, in order to prevent the question going over to the next Congress, then already elected, because that Congress will vote for them if you do not, and you will then seek to save for yourselves the credit of stanching the wounds of bleeding Kansas, and establishing forever the cause of freedom.

All this will happen, unless you invoke armies to suppress such proceedings by the people of Kansas. Well, I should like to see the bill introduced into Congress now to levy an army or provide supplies for an army to control freemen and extirpate freedom in Kansas. You cannot even pass a bill to maintain your authority in Utah, against polygamists, without infinite trouble. I think I can take up the list of yeas and nays, and call them over. I think my honorable friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BIGLER] will vote ay, because he always stands squarely up to the Administration. It is a tower of strength to the patriotic statesman! It is calculated to fortify his courage and sustain his devotion to human rights and popular liberty!—so long as it lasts. I think that my honorable friend from California [Mr. GWIN] would also give it his vote, for, like myself, he is apt to favor appropriations, and not very particular about the object to which they go. But when these responses are pronounced in favor of the measure, there will be an end. I rather think my honorable friend from Ohio [Mr. PUGH] will hesitate for want of instructions. My two excellent friends from New Jersey would be found in the negative on that vote, because things are already coming to a head at home. As to my honorable friends from Indiana, they will, of course, be absent, securing a reelection.

Mr. President, you will fail in this contest, because for the first time you will go before the people of the United States stripped naked of every pretense of equality or impartiality between freedom and slavery, much more of that virtue which is the only mantle that can cover the faults of parties in this country—devotion to freedom. The honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS], the honorable Senator from Michigan, [Mr. STUART], and the honorable Senator from California, [Mr. BRODERICK], with their associates in the other House, and the honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN], and the honorable Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL], have stripped you bare of all pretenses to fairness in the maintenance of popular sovereignty. You go before the people, no longer in the character of a party that balances equally between freedom and slavery, but in the detested character of a party intervening for slavery against freedom. When you go before the people now, you will meet there not as heretofore, two or three factions, dividing and giving you a triumph by reason of their divisions, but you will meet one party only, and that party combined, resolute, and directed by a sincere and common devotion to the principles it maintains. Of course I speak of the Republican party, and no other. But you go not only in that way, you go for the first time divided into two parties, two factions, one of you maintaining slavery absolutely and without regard to parties or popular consent, the other hesitating and standing upon the position of no slavery anywhere, unless the people choose it.

Mr. President, let me try for a moment to lift this debate up from these temporary, ephemeral incidents, to the height of the argument where it belongs. The sixteenth century dawned on the decay, throughout Europe and the world, of a slave civilization derived from an early antiquity, and left as a legacy by the Latin or southern States of the continent of Europe on the fall of the Roman empire. But it dawned also upon the rise of a new and better civilization—the civilization of freedom; the civilization, since developed, of the German and Slavonic races; the civilization of Germany and of England, of Scotland and Ireland, and Switzerland, the modern civilization of western Europe. The principle of the old Latin civilization which was passing away, was that labor must be involuntary; must be secured by fraud and force, and must be converted into property. The new civilization was based upon the principle of the freedom of labor, that it must be voluntary, and that it should be not only a political power, but that it should become the ascendant and dominating political power throughout the world. While Spain and Portugal proved themselves competent to open the way of discovery at the beginning of the sixteenth century, and the one revealed Africa and the other America to the eyes of an astonished world, these two nations were of all others those who were least fitted, least qualified to inaugurate civilization on either continent. The Portuguese doomed Africa to remain in the perpetual barbarism with which she had been cursed from her earliest history, by establishing there the odious and atrocious slave trade; and the Spaniards doomed America to receive, and for a while to be incumbered with the civilization of African slaves, captured and brought there by the Portuguese. Our Constitution and our Union came into being seventy years ago, when it was necessary to decide between these two systems of civilization which were found among us. The States which were founded upon the new civilization stand before you. Contemplate them; say whether the world has ever seen such States? You see also the States which were founded on the old declining civilization of the Roman empire. All new States have to elect between the two systems. We have a voice and influence in determining their decision. You are determined to force that old and effete and obsolete civilization upon regions where it has never been known.

This question ought to have been decided fifty-five years ago, in 1803, when Kansas was added to the national territory by the treaty with France, as part of the Louisiana purchase. It was omitted then. Again, the question returned in 1820, and then it was well and wisely settled by dedicating Kansas forever to impartial freedom. In 1854, you repealed that law; but the law of Kansas was written in the very rocks and upon the rivers and prairies of Kansas, as well as in the constitution of American society. All you have done since has consisted in fruitless efforts to carry that ill-judged repeal into effect in defiance of the laws of nature. For what you have done heretofore you have had what the whole world received as an excuse. It was the action of the slave States; but it was not on their own motion; the suggestion came to them from Senators from the free States, and it was not in human nature that the slave States should resist it.

So in 1856, when Kansas came here as a free State, under the Topeka constitution, and you rejected her, you still had the show of excuse, for these same Representatives of the free States advised that the people of the free States, as well as of Kansas, would acquiesce. But you are now, after having failed in these two efforts, persisting, without that excuse. Two of the Senators, one the leader in the repeal of the Missouri compromise, the other hardly less effective in that transaction, now remonstrate with you against the further prosecution of this attempt as impossible. Still another, from Michigan, remonstrates; I mean the late distinguished Senator from Michigan, now at the head of the Department of State. I do not say that he remonstrates in words, but I do say that the retirement of that eminent man from this Chamber, so suited to his talents, his genius, and his fame, into a closet in the Department of State, under an appointment of the President of the United States, is a louder remonstrance than any words he could utter, if his constituents had allowed him to retain his place among us, the representatives of the States.

That is not all. At last a new voice issues from your own region, from the South, from the slave States, and protests against your further persistence in this mad enterprise, and admonishes you that it must and will fail. The cohorts are gathering in the South; the men of moderation and conservatism, who, as they have heretofore moderated in favor of slavery against freedom, will now be obliged, in consistency with their just and well-established character, and their habitual patriotism, to moderate against you in favor of freedom, when the people demand freedom, and rise up unanimously against slavery.

Sir, this whole controversy is contracted into a quarrel for revenge against these wise advisers. Instead of listening to their counsels, it results in this: that you will suppress their remonstrance, punish their authors as mutineers. Well, sir, that is a matter of small consequence to me. To me, personally, the future of these distinguished Senators and their associates in the House of Representatives is nothing, except so far as the political positions which they maintain in the country and before the world shall bear on the future of the country. I know not whether, hereafter, I shall be found laboring with them in efforts for the welfare of our country, or whether they will be found in your councils again, and laboring in your ranks. Nevertheless, I am sure of this, namely, that you will not succeed in discrediting and punishing them; for, either you provoke upon yourselves the defeat which the signs of the times indicate, or in lieu you will come down to 1860 under the influence of sentiments and feelings very different from those of 1858. A party in power, in the first year of an Administration, is bold and violent. A party going out of power, at the close of an Administration, is timid and hesitating. You will search the summits of the mountains in New Hampshire, the plains of Mexico, and the privileged courts of St. James, in London, to find a candidate in 1860 who was against the conference Lecompton-Kansas bill in 1858; and then, if these honorable associates with whom I have labored for a short time so pleasantly, shall be found remaining in your communion, I think I can promise them and you, you will come to a much better understanding with them than you have now.

Mr. President, while I am speaking I learn that this bill, of so much evil omen, has passed the House of Representatives, and that the battle there is ended. I confess to you, sir, that it produces on my mind, if some disappointment, no discouragement. I confess that I was prepared for this conclusion, and that now when it has come (for what remains to be done here is a matter of course) it is to me utterly indifferent. This I have known all the while; that this was to be our last defeat or our first victory. Either result would have been welcome. For Kansas, for freedom in Kansas, I have not so much concern as I have about the place where I shall sleep to-night, although my home is hard by the place where I stand. Kansas, sir, is the Cinderella of the American family. She is buffeted; she is insulted; she is smitten and disgraced; she is turned out of the dwelling, and the door is locked against her. There is always, however, a fairy that takes care of the younger daughter, if she be the most honest, the most virtuous, the meekest, and the most enduring inmate of the domestic circle.

Kansas will live and survive your persecution; she will live to defend, protect, and sustain you; and the time will come when her elder sisters, now so arrogant, Louisiana, Virginia, and Pennsylvania, will repent all the injustice they have done her. Her trials have not been imposed on her for nought. She has been made to take the position, the dangerous and hazardous position, of being the first to vindicate practically by labor, by toil, through desolation, through suffering and blood, the principle that freedom is better for States and for the Republic than slavery. She will endure the trial nobly, and as she has been the first, so she will be the last to contend and to suffer. Every other Territory that shall come into the Union hereafter, profiting by the sufferings and atonement of Kansas, will come into the Union a free State. Sir, this unnecessary strife draws to its end. The effort to make slave States within our domain is against reason, and against nature. The trees do not spring up from the roots and seeds scattered by the parent trunks in the forest more naturally than new free States spring up from the roots projected and the seed scattered by the old free States. New stars do not form themselves out of the nebulae in the recesses of space and come out to adorn the blue expanse above us, more surely than new free States shape themselves out of the ever developing elements of our benign civilization, and rise to take their places in this great political constellation. Reason and hope rejoice in this majestic and magnificent process. Let, then, nature and reason and hope have their heaven appointed way. Resist them no longer.

Mr. BIGLER. Mr. President, I had desired to discuss this report at some length, in order to meet some views that have been presented which I know are intended to prejudice the friends of this measure in the northern States; but, as the Senator from New York has announced, the other branch of Congress having adopted this measure, the struggle is over, and I discover great anxiety on the part of my friends about me to take the vote; and as I understand there is no disposition to discuss the subject further on the opposite side, I shall forbear. I only wish to say that the report of the committee of conference, now under consideration, meets my hearty approbation. It is a measure consistent with my judgment. I believe that it is a measure wise for the people of Kansas and for the entire country. I believe its tendency will be to peace and quiet; and at this moment throughout this broad land that wonderful agent, the magnetic telegraph, is spreading, with the speed of lightning, a message of peace all over the land.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, [Mr. BIGGS.] Will the Senator suspend his remarks to allow a message to be received from the House of Representatives?

Mr. J. C. ALLEN, Clerk of the House of Representatives, appeared below the bar and delivered the following message:

Mr. President, I am directed by the House of Representatives to inform the Senate that the House has concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill of the Senate, No. 161, for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope the Senator from Pennsylvania will allow us to take the question. The hour which was fixed for taking the vote has arrived; and there is a sick gentleman here.

Mr. BIGLER. It affords me great pleasure to do so. I said I would do so as soon as the message was received.

Mr. CAMERON. Before the vote is taken I desire to say a word or two in relation to my own course. It was my intention at an early part of the session to say something upon the general subject of Kansas affairs; but I am, as you all know, not much of a speaker, having but little capacity that way, and no taste for it. I often felt disposed to take part in the debate; but when I proposed to do so, I deferred to others; and sometimes when I felt like going on, I found that some gentleman was discussing the question better than I could hope to do. I rise at this time only to say that I disapprove of the proposition now before the Senate, much more than I did of the original attempt to force on the people of Kansas a constitution which they were unwilling to take. The original bill was a plain proposition, for which men might have voted honestly, without subjecting their motives to censure. This I look upon as a very different affair. This, to my mind, is a trick to impose upon weak men, or to enable corrupt men to make the impression upon their constituents at home that they have been acting honestly. Still I should have said nothing on this subject now, if my respected colleague had not been in such hot haste to announce to the Senator from New York, while he was discussing the proposition that the vote had been carried in the other House against the wishes of the freemen of Kansas. His act was so different from what I expected from an honorable Senator from Pennsylvania that I was surprised at it. I have always heretofore understood that no man in the whole State of Pennsylvania was more positive and decided in the expression of his belief before the people that Kansas would not only be a free State, but that she should not have a State constitution at all unless it should be voted for by a majority of her citizens. His whole course in life until he came here was in favor of freemen and of the free labor of the northern States. His own history was such as naturally to make him an advocate of freemen and free labor. Why he has changed his course here is no business of mine; but it does seem to me in bad taste that he should act as he does, knowing, as he certainly does, that not only the whole Opposition party in Pennsylvania, but a very large majority of the party to which he belongs in that State are opposed to this measure, and opposed to the conduct of the President of the United States in regard to it; and I cannot permit him to come here and make the impression that he believes the people of Pennsylvania are in favor of it; nor can I remain quiet, much as I dislike to talk in public, when the impression is attempted to be made that the people of Pennsylvania are with him or with the President of the United States upon this subject. If the vote were to be taken tomorrow the people of Pennsylvania, by a majority of a hundred thousand, would decide that the President of the United States had deceived them in regard to this matter, and would prove also that my colleague is misrepresenting his constituents on this great question.

The people of Pennsylvania are conservative, and on all questions connected with slavery they have always taken a moderate course; but, sir, I tell you that if any man, who was in their confidence in the year 1856, could have convinced them that, by any possible means, a constitution could be forced upon the people of Kansas, in opposition to their wishes, and without a vote of the people, Mr. Buchanan could never have received the electoral vote of Pennsylvania. He owes it to the conduct of himself and the active influence of his friends all over the State, asserting that by nature Kansas must be free, and that no man would dare, no matter what his position was, to attempt to put upon her a constitution unless her people had the free and full right to vote for or against it. The President himself thought so until lately. Everybody knows that so late as the 7th of July last, he wrote a letter to a distinguished man in Kansas, telling him that the constitution must be submitted to the people of the Territory for their fair and free vote, or it would not be adopted or sanctioned by the Government.

I repeat that I do not desire to occupy the time of the Senate now. I am desirous that the vote shall be taken. A majority, by some means or other, has decided against us in the other House; the majority here, we know, is against us, and it is idle to talk when a strong majority will vote against us.

Mr. BIGLER. Mr. President—
Mr. HUNTER. I hope my friend will let us have the vote. ["Yes, let us vote."]

Mr. BIGLER. Just one single word. ["Go on."]
I have no issue to make with my colleague; I shall not pretend to reply to his remarks. He, doubtless, heard me distinctly announce that I would give way for the purpose of allowing the vote to be taken. He, therefore, has seized the opportunity of making what I may designate as an attack, when I had deprived myself of an opportunity of replying. It matters not what my history and my views may have been on this subject. That is of very small importance. To all that I shall attend hereafter. I only wish at this time to say to the Senate, and to the country, in response to what my colleague has said, that I believe, so far from the people of Pennsylvania being against the measure now pending here, an overwhelming majority of them would indorse it to-day. I do not mean to say by that, that they would prefer that Kansas should be a slave State. That is not the issue involved; but the people of Kansas having decided the question for themselves, the people of Pennsylvania are content to let the State come into the Union. ["Question!" "Question!"]

Mr. PUGH. I would suggest that the Senate lay on the table the report of the committee, and take up the message of the House. That will obviate all dispute.

Mr. HUNTER. It is the same question. The parliamentary question is on concurrence in the report of the committee. ["Question!" "Question!"]

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. BIGGS in the chair.) The question is, will the Senate agree to the report of the committee of conference?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I should like to know, however, which is under consideration—the report of our committee, or the bill returned from the House? There is a very large portion of the Senate, though a minority, who conscientiously believe that, under the law and under the rules, we cannot vote on the report of the Senate committee until the papers are here. If, however, you lay down this report, and take up the message of the House, you run counter to no man's judgment as to the regularity and lawfulness of the proceeding. I trust that course will be pursued.

Mr. HUNTER. I can agree to that. It is a matter of indifference to me. It is all the same either way; and, if gentlemen prefer the course just suggested by the Senator from Illinois, very well.

Mr. GREEN. There is but one question that the Senate can vote upon; and that is, concurrence or non-concurrence in the report of the committee of conference. Whether you choose to consider that question after having received the bill from the House, or before, is a matter that I shall not take time now to inquire into. That is of no importance; but the only question is, shall we concur in the report or not?

Mr. PUGH. In order that there may be no difficulty, I hope the Senate will leave no question open. I hope we shall just lay the report of the committee of conference on the table, take up the message of the House, and then make a motion to concur in that. ["No, no!"]

Mr. GREEN. I object to that. If we lay the report on the table, the bill is lost, unless we take it off the table again, and pass it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, will the Senate agree to the report of the committee of conference?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I move that we proceed to the consideration of the message from the House of Representatives.

Mr. GREEN. There is a question pending, and that motion is not in order.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I suppose I am in order in moving to postpone this subject informally, for the purpose of considering the message from the House of Representatives. That will relieve the difficulty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to postpone the pending report of the committee of conference.

Mr. HUNTER. We cannot postpone the report without postponing the whole subject. Here is the condition of the question: It is a joint committee, which committee reports the same thing to the two Houses; and the universal mode in which the question is taken, is upon concurrence in the report of the committee. We have accomplished all that the Senator from Illinois and those who think with him desired, by waiting to take up the question until we received the message from the House of Representatives. The papers have come back. The report refers to those papers. They are before us. The only objection made before to taking the question on the report was, that the papers were not here. That was the objection taken by the Senator from Michigan. Now the papers are here; the report refers to them; and the question is, do we concur in the report of the joint committee of conference? It is the same in both Houses.

Mr. DOUGLAS. There is this difference, however: we were considering the report of the committee of conference separate from any bill, or any other paper. It is announced now that the House of Representatives have concurred in the report, and send us the papers, and it is not proposed to take them up. Therefore, they are not before the Senate for action; they are absent from us as though that message had not been received, unless the Senate take up the message from the House of Representatives.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Can this be done by general consent without producing further delay?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I hope so.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I am satisfied that is all we wish; but, if it is the desire to pass from one point in this case to another, and have a new discussion, of course this side of the house cannot consent to it. If the Senator from Illinois only asks general consent to take the vote in the mode he suggests, I doubt whether there will be any opposition.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am not aware that there is a Senator on the floor who desires a moment's delay. I am not aware that there is a Senator here who wishes to utter another word on this subject except to record his vote. My only object in making the suggestion was simply to have our proceedings regular, and take the vote instantly, without any objection from any quarter.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Well, let us have the vote.

Mr. GREEN. The parliamentary law does not permit us to vote upon concurring with the House of Representatives, but the parliamentary law makes it our duty to vote upon the report of the committee of conference, to concur or non-concur in that report. There was a question whether we could vote on that report before we had the papers from the House. That objection is now removed; but if you lay the report of the committee of conference on the table and vote to concur with the House according to parliamentary law, this bill is not passed. I do not care to raise technicalities. I do not believe any Senator here desires to interpose any obstacle to the passage of the bill. Since there is so general a sentiment here in favor of taking the vote, let us take the vote in the ordinary way. I have precedents here showing that that is the only question which can be put; it has uniformly been put, and no other form of question ever has been put.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am informed by parliamentarians around me, that the strict motion is to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill number so and so, being the Kansas bill, and the report attached to it. That course would obviate all difficulty. I modify my motion that we proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 161, for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union. By taking that up we shall avoid all difficulty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is, "Will the Senate agree to the report of the committee of conference?"

Mr. DOUGLAS. I move to postpone that, and take up the bill.

Mr. HUNTER. We can take up the bill by general consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. KING. I do not consent.

Mr. BROWN. Then I move to postpone.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi moves to postpone the pending question.

Mr. DOUGLAS. For the purpose of considering Senate bill No. 161.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. For the purpose of considering the bill which has just been returned from the House of Representatives.

Mr. HUNTER. If we postpone the conference report and take up the bill, what becomes of the conference report? The two go together, undoubtedly. The universal practice is to take the question on the conference report.

Mr. DOUGLAS. When the bill is taken up, the question will arise on the conference report. That accompanies the bill, and is an incident to it.

Mr. HUNTER. But you propose to postpone it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. No; we only postpone the consideration of this paper at this time; and by doing that, we bring up the bill with the conference report from the House of Representatives, as an incident. There is no trouble or confusion. I propose to take up the bill and report.

Mr. SLIDELL. Say so.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Well; I will alter the motion, to consider the bill and report.

Mr. BAYARD. I cannot see that we have anything to do with the bill. The question formerly raised was, whether the papers were here. Now they are here. The only question we have to decide is, whether we will agree or disagree to the report of the committee of conference. That has been the invariable form of putting the question. We cannot act on the original bill unless we dissent from the report of the committee. Then the bill will come up; but in order to reach it, we must first dispose of the report of the committee.

The objection formerly made was, that the papers were not here, and that therefore we could not act upon the report of the committee. Now we have the papers here; but because the papers are here, I do not see that there is any other subject to be considered than the one which was under consideration before—the report of the committee. If you assent to that, then the subject is ended. If you dissent from it, then of course the bill of the Senate will come up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi, as the Chair understands him, moves to postpone the consideration of the pending question.

Mr. BROWN. I withdraw the motion. I want to take the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, "Will the Senate agree to the report of the committee of conference?" and on this question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I have not withdrawn my motion to postpone the subject which was under consideration at the time this announcement was made, and to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 161, and the report accompanying it from the House of Representatives.

Mr. GREEN. I hope that will be voted down.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois, to postpone the consideration of the pending question.

Mr. GREEN. I ask for the yeas and nays on that.

Several SENATORS. Oh, no.

Mr. KING. Let us have them.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion to postpone was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is: "Will the Senate agree to the report of the committee of conference?" On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I have been requested by Mr. BELL to say that he would vote, if here, against the bill; but he has paired off with Mr. PEARCE on this subject.

Mr. HALE. I have been requested by my colleague, [Mr. CLARK,] who has been taken suddenly sick, and is confined to his room by sickness, to make that excuse for his not voting. If he were here, he would vote against the bill.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. FIRCH, of Indiana, has paired off with Mr. SUMNER, of Massachusetts. He has been called home on account of illness in his family, and Mr. SUMNER has been detained in Philadelphia by a relapse in his case.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 31, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Bright, Brown, Clay, Davis, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Slidell, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Wright, and Yulee—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Douglas, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, King, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—22.

So the Senate concurred in the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. CLAY. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. MASON. I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion, and move to adjourn over to Monday. I move that when the Senate adjourns, it be to meet on Monday.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama moved to adjourn.

Mr. CLAY. I withdraw that motion for the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. MASON. I move that when the Senate adjourns, it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope not. To-morrow we ought to act on the deficiency bill, and I am waiting for the papers to be sent here from the House of Representatives. The bill is there. We ought to give one day to private bills.

Mr. IVERSON. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion of the Senator from Virginia.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 21, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Benjamin, Broderick, Chandler, Clay, Crittenden, Dixon, Evans, Green, Hale, Hamlin, Hammond, Kennedy, King, Mason, Seward, Simmons, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Trumbull, and Wade—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Biggs, Bigler, Bright, Brown, Cameron, Collamer, Doolittle, Douglas, Durkee, Fessenden, Fitzpatrick, Foot, Foster, Gwin, Harlan, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Mallory, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Slidell, Stuart, Wright, and Yulee—29.

So the motion was not agreed to.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. HUNTER. I rise for the purpose of submitting a motion that the Senate recede from its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 306) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893. It is true the papers are not here; they are in the House; but it is obvious that the motion I make puts an end to the question, and it seems to me that we have the right; it certainly has been the practice heretofore.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will inform the Senator that the papers are here.

Mr. HUNTER. Then I move that the Senate recede from its amendments.

Mr. TOOMBS. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion. I hope the Senate will not recede from its action.

Mr. STUART. When the question was taken before upon the motion to recede, I did not vote at all, and I cannot vote to-day. I do not wish to detain the Senate; but I desire to explain, in a word, the reason why I did not vote. I am opposed to this bill as a whole. I am, however, in favor of the House amendments, under the circumstances. I cannot vote to recede without voting for the bill—that is if the Senate recede, that action passes the bill—therefore I cannot vote at all.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 26, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bigler, Bright, Brown, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Sebastian, Slidell, Thompson of New Jersey, Wright, and Yulee—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Broderick, Chandler, Dixon, Doolittle, Douglas, Durkee, Foot, Foster, Hale, Harlan, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Pugh, Seward, Simmons, Toombs, Trumbull, and Wade—21.

So the motion to recede was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SLIDELL. I hope my friend from Arkansas will give way for an instant. I voted against the adjournment over until Monday, because I desired to have the deficiency bill disposed of. That having been done, I will now, if the Senator from Arkansas will yield me the floor, make the motion that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I know we ought to have an executive session; but I will yield to the motion of the Senator from Louisiana, as my motion can be made after his has been disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Louisiana, that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. IVERSON. I trust the Senate will not entertain that motion. The Senate will remember that they agreed some time ago to devote every Friday to the consideration of the Private Calendar; but I yielded this morning, that the Kansas question might be taken up, with the understanding that to-morrow should be allowed for the consideration of private bills. I trust if we are to do anything with the Private Calendar we shall meet to-morrow. ["We will give you two days next week."] That is not a promise I can rely upon. I trust the Senate will sit to-morrow; I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn over, that we may see who are disposed to do the public business and who are not.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. KING. Is that motion now in order? Has not the motion to fix the time to which we shall adjourn precedence?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to adjourn is always in order.

The motion was not agreed to.

The question being taken by yeas and nays on Mr. SLIDELL's motion, resulted—yeas 24, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Bigler, Broderick, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Dixon, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Green, Hale, Hammond, King, Mason, Pugh, Sebastian, Seward, Slidell, Thompson of New Jersey, Toombs, Trumbull, and Wright—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Biggs, Bright, Brown, Chandler, Colamer, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Harlan, Houston, Iverson, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Mallory, Polk, Stuart, Wade, and Yulee—20.

So it was ordered that when the Senate adjourns to-day, it be to meet on Monday next.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, April 30, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. W. D. HALEY.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate by Mr. HICKY, their Chief Clerk, notifying the House that that body had agreed to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. No. 76) "to incorporate Gonzaga College, in the city of Washington, and District of Columbia;" and that that body had passed a resolution (S. No. 21) devolving upon the Secretary of War the execution of the act of Congress entitled "An act supplemental to an act therein mentioned," approved December 22, 1854; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

ADMISSION OF KANSAS.

Mr. ENGLISH. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The first question in order is the conference report on the Kansas bill, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. CLARK] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. Mr. Speaker, when I sought the floor yesterday, it was my intention to occupy my hour in giving briefly the reasons why I should vote against this conference report; but I find myself this morning physically unable to undertake the task. I shall seek the floor to discharge this duty on another occasion; but, sir, lest the call for the previous question shall be made before I shall again obtain the floor, and thus put it beyond my power to make the remarks which I design, I will in one word say that I regard this new scheme as eminently objectionable in form, and as still more dangerous in substance. If I live, I shall vote against it; and if opportunity be afforded me, I will, on some other occasion, assign my reasons for that vote.

Mr. BONHAM. Mr. Speaker, the honorable member from Mississippi, [Mr. QUITMAN,] with whom I have acted on this subject, is not in his place. I understand that he would, if here, have sought the floor this morning with a view to call for the previous question. I now seek the floor for that same purpose, and I therefore call for the previous question.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I move that there be a call of the House.

Mr. BRYAN. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the call for the previous question for a moment. I will renew it.

Mr. BONHAM. I withdraw it for the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, it is due to myself and due to the people whom I represent, who have passed through the ordeal of revolution, and all the consequences of asserting the rights which belong to a free people, that I should be heard as to the position I have occupied on this question. I have acted, upon collateral questions, with a gallant band from the South in opposition to the majority of the members from that section. One of them, the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. QUITMAN,] has his hair silvered through long years of service, and has fought in behalf of the interests and the rights of his sunny land. Another, with whom I have acted, has been ever true to the South—the accomplished author of the "Union, past and future, how it works, and how to save it." I have acted also with one who represents the district of Preston S. Brooks, whose brother gave up his life in fighting in the van of the war for the extension of the institutions of the South—the associate of Travis, and of Crockett, who fell at the Thermopylae of Texas. "Thermopylae had her messenger of defeat; the Alamo had none." I have acted with a Goode from Virginia, a STALLWORTH and a SHORTER from Alabama; and higher than this, I have acted under the resolutions of the sovereign State of Texas. I will read those resolutions:

Joint resolution in response to the Governor's message on Kansas affairs.

Whereas there exists, and has existed, a violent determination, on the part of a portion of the inhabitants of the Territory of Kansas, to exclude by force the citizens of the slaveholding States from a just, equal, and peaceful participation in the use and enjoyment of the common property and territory of the members of the Confederacy: and whereas, this determination, owing to the state of political feeling in the northern States of the Confederacy operating upon the Federal Government, may become effectual, and the exclusion perpetual: Therefore,

First, Be it resolved by the Legislature of the State of Texas, That the Governor of this State is hereby authorized to order an election for seven delegates to meet delegates appointed by the other southern States in convention, whenever the Executives of a majority of the slaveholding States shall express the opinion that such convention is necessary to preserve the equal rights of such States in the Union, and advise the Governor of this State that measures have been taken for the appointment of delegates to meet those of Texas; and that the sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as is necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay the mileage and per diem of such delegates, which shall be paid at the rate paid to members of the United States Congress, according to the law in force in the year 1854.

Second, That, should an exigency arise, in the opinion of the Governor, in which it is necessary for the State of Texas to act alone, or by a convention representing the sovereignty of the State, he is hereby requested to call a special session of the Legislature to provide for such State convention.

Third, That the Governor is requested to transmit copies of these resolutions to the Executives of each of the slaveholding States, and to our members of Congress.

Sir, upon what were these resolutions based? Upon the declarations of the President of the United States; upon the language of the southern Democratic Senators in the other wing of the Capitol; upon the language of the southern Representatives here, and the Democratic Representatives of the North, who acted with them early in the session, when they declared that the legal will of the people of Kansas had been expressed in the Lecompton convention which framed their constitution.

Sir, in our own State of Texas, a few months since, an election was held to fill a vacancy for a judge of the supreme court. Out of sixty thousand votes in our State, not more than twelve thousand votes were cast to fill that office. The judge who received the majority of those votes is now upon the bench, deciding the rights of the people of that State. If a majority of the people of Kansas stayed away from the polls, they did what the people of Texas did. As I said before, the action of the Legislature of Texas was based upon the language of the Representatives of the South, and the Democratic Representatives of the North, who acted with them upon this floor; upon similar language uttered in the other wing of the Capitol, and upon the language of the Chief Executive, that Kansas should be admitted under the Lecompton constitution, without referring the question of admission back to the people of Kansas. Sir, what is the state of the case now? In the proposition that is presented to us, we refer back the question to the people of Kansas. I, for prudential considerations, which can be understood by southern members here, will not enter into the discussion of that proposition. But I intend to acquiesce in the action of the majority of the Representatives of the section from which I come, for this reason: I find, since I have been in Washington, that new party ideas are promulgated, and, to some extent, a new party doctrine has been established. The great party which prevails in the North, through their great leader in the other end of the Capitol, has said:

"I regard this battle as already fought; it is over. All the mistake is that the honorable Senator and others do not know it—we are fighting for a majority of free States. There are already sixteen to fifteen. If that is so, what dangers are we exposed to? And whatever the Administration may do, whatever anybody may do, before one year from this time, we shall be nineteen to fifteen."

Again, he says:

"Let the court recede; whether it recedes or not, we shall reorganize the court, and thus reform its political sentiments and practices, and bring them into harmony with the Constitution and with the laws of nature."

Speaking of free States, he says:

"They have an easy and simple remedy, namely: to take the Government out of unjust and unfaithful hands, and commit it to those which will be just and faithful. They are ready to do this now. They want only a little more harmony of purpose and a little more completeness of organization."

"Freedom is the common right, interest, and ultimate destiny of all mankind. All other nations have already abolished, or are about abolishing slavery. Does this fact mean anything?"

Again he says:

"Free labor has at last apprehended its rights, its interests, its power, and its destiny, and is organizing itself to assume the government of the Republic. It will henceforth meet you boldly and resolutely here; it will meet you everywhere, in the Territories or out of them, wherever you may go to extend slavery. It has driven you back in California and in Kansas; it will invade you soon in Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, Missouri, and Texas. It will meet you in Arizona, in Central America, and even in Cuba. The invasion will be not merely harmless, but beneficial, if you yield seasonably to its just and moderate demands. It proved so in New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and the other slave States, which have already yielded in that way to its advances. You may, indeed, get a start under or near the tropics, and seem safe for a time, but it will be only a short time. Even there you will find States only for free labor to maintain and occupy. The interest of the white race demands the ultimate emancipation of all men. Whether that consummation shall be allowed to take effect, with needful and wise precautions against sudden change and disaster, or be hurried on by violence, is all that remains for you to decide. For the failure of your system of slave labor throughout the Republic, the responsibility will rest, not on the agitators you condemn, or on the political parties you arraign, or even altogether on yourselves, but it will be due to the inherent error of the system itself, and to the error which thrusts it forward to oppose and resist the destiny, not more of the African than that of the white race."

I take it that this is the doctrine of the great party which is, I fear, to rule this country. The union of the South, for the protection of the South, is what will be required to stay the progress of these doctrines; and that I may not throw a straw in the way of that union, I shall acquiesce in the action of the South; at the same time, however, not withdrawing my objections to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina demands the previous question.

Mr. SHORTER. Will the gentleman yield me the floor? I will renew the demand.

Mr. BONHAM. With that understanding, I will.

Mr. SHORTER. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise for the purpose of discussing the merits of the bill—

Mr. BONHAM. I have been appealed to to yield the floor to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SHORTER] on account of the peculiar position which he occupies, coming as he does from a State which has spoken upon this question; and those appeals have been so earnest that I feel constrained to yield to him for a few moments. But I take occasion to say that when he has concluded I shall insist on the previous question. I have desired to make some remarks upon this question myself, but I have waived the privilege.

Mr. SHORTER. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to discuss this question at length; but I feel that justice to myself requires that I should be allowed a few moments to explain to my constituents and to the country at large the reasons that have operated upon my mind in adopting the course that I have seen proper to pursue during the last week, and also in vindication of the vote that I intend to give when this question is brought to a final issue. It is well known to those who are around me that in company with four other southern gentlemen I have, for some days past, voted with the opposite side of the House against the enforcement of the previous question.

Sir, what were the motives that prompted me in taking the position which I occupied, and what the motives that influenced gentlemen upon the opposite side of the House in their course in this matter? While in ordinary cases we cannot undertake to judge of men's motives, yet the discussion which has ensued in consequence of the postponement of this vote, has tended clearly to define the position occupied by the Republican party, and their allies upon the opposite side of the House. My objection to the bill was, sir, that the language employed in referring the question as to the grant of lands—the ordinance, as it is called—is either by accident or by design, left so ambiguous, I was fearful that, after the law was passed, it might be construed one way at the North, and another way at the South. Sir, I am tired of that system of legislation. I remember the discussion that sprung up in the South growing out of the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, owing to its peculiar phraseology, one portion of the people contending that it embodied squatter sovereignty, and the other party denying it. One wing of the party, with which I was acting, contended at the South that it meant one thing, and the other wing, at the North, that it meant another. If it was the purpose of the committee of conference to leave this question beyond doubt; and, if it was their intention, as they assert here upon this floor and in the Senate Chamber, not to refer the constitution back to the people of Kansas for their ratification or rejection, it occurs to me that it would have been a very easy thing to have made it plain and unmistakable. But, sir, if there was any doubt as to the true construction of this bill, the discussion which we have had here has in part accomplished my purpose in voting against the previous question. I wished the records of Congress to show, whether the bill was passed or defeated, that the party with whom I cooperate construed it all in one way. I was unwilling that a portion of the northern men who act with me should go home and contend that this bill meant a direct submission of the constitution to the people; while I, at the South, would contend that it meant no submission of the constitution.

Well, sir, the Republican party now deny that it submits the constitution; they claim that it attempts to force the Lecompton constitution upon Kansas, by telling the people that they may come into the Union as a slave State, but that if they are unwilling to do that, they shall remain out of the Union as a slave Territory. Those are the prominent objections that the Republican party urge to the bill. Now, I do not object to that feature of it at all. Whatever there is in the bill that I approve, the Republican party condemn; whatever there is in the bill that I condemn, the Republican party approve. Thus it is that, in voting against enforcing the previous question during the last week, extremes seem to have met; but our motives have been different—very different.

Well, sir, my object in resisting the enforcement of the previous question was that we might have discussion, in order that we might see how the Democratic party of the country, North and South, construed this bill—how its framers construed it; and, sir, I find now that the general construction of the bill is, that it does not refer, and is not intended to refer, the constitution back, but the ordinance only, to a vote of the people of Kansas. If it did—if I believed that it did, though I stood solitary and alone upon this side of the House, I would continue to vote with the Black Republicans against the bill. But the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS], on the part of the House committee, declares emphatically here in his place, that it was not his intention, in agreeing to the report, to refer the constitution back to the people. He says that the bill does not refer it back, but that it recognizes the validity of the Lecompton constitution. This position was not controverted by either of his associate conferees—

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman from Alabama yield to me?

Mr. SHORTER. No, sir.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I would like to know whether my colleague, [Mr. Cox,] who spoke yesterday, did not understand that the constitution was to be submitted?

Mr. BONHAM. I must ask the gentleman from Alabama to confine himself to the understanding he made with me. If he continues to urge the views which he is now urging, he will constrain me to present my views upon this question.

Mr. SHORTER. I thank the gentleman for calling me back to the recollection of my promise. Mr. Speaker, every State-rights Senator from the South favors this bill. Every State-rights Representative in this House from the same section, with the exception of only two, intend to vote for it; and, whatever doubt may exist upon my mind as to its propriety, I intend to sacrifice to this perfect unanimity among the Representatives of my section.

I have thus stated the reasons which operated on my mind in changing the position which I have been holding for the last few days. I shall to-day cooperate with the friends of the measure in enforcing the previous question, and shall vote for the bill. I now move the previous question.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I would ask the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BONHAM] to allow me to say a few words. He has yielded to gentlemen upon his own side of the House.

Mr. BONHAM. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SHORTER] demanded the previous question.

Mr. CLINGMAN. As the gentleman from Ohio desires only a few moments, I hope that by general consent they will be conceded to him.

Mr. BONHAM. As I have yielded the floor to gentlemen upon this side of the House, I think it only fair that it should be yielded to the gentleman from Ohio for the same purpose, to make a few remarks and not to make a speech. I have some views myself that I have wished to present to the country, but I have waived the privilege.

Mr. HOUSTON. I understand my colleague [Mr. SHORTER] to have demanded the previous question, and the gentleman from South Carolina has, therefore, no power to withdraw it. I object to any further yielding of the floor to anybody. I want to make a speech myself, if I can get a chance.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I asked the gentleman from South Carolina to yield the floor. I am not dependent upon the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] for the courtesy.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am aware that the gentleman is not asking me, but I have the right to object to any such arrangement, and I insist upon my objection.

Mr. SHORTER. I cannot withdraw my demand for the previous question.

Mr. GOODWIN. I move a call of the House.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I think the only difficulty on this side of the House is, that the same privilege of debate has not been extended to this side of the House that was extended to gentlemen on the other side.

Mr. ENGLISH. I appeal to the gentleman from Alabama to withdraw the demand for the previous question for five minutes, for the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HARLAN. We want more than that.

Mr. MORGAN. Five minutes will not answer.

Mr. SHORTER. Will the gentleman from Ohio renew the demand for the previous question?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I will accept the floor upon the same terms as the two gentlemen who last occupied the floor, and upon no other terms.

Mr. COBB. What are the terms?

Mr. SHORTER. I took the floor upon the condition that I should renew the demand for the previous question. If the gentleman from Ohio will renew the demand for the previous question, I will yield the floor to him.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I accept the floor upon the same conditions. I want terms of equality, and nothing else.

Mr. SHORTER. Then I withdraw the previous question.

Mr. GOODWIN. And I withdraw the motion for the call of the House.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I have no disposition whatever to prolong this unfortunate controversy. I have not spoken upon the subject of Kansas affairs during the present Congress, for reasons which I do not think it necessary or proper now to give.

In 1854, when it was proposed that a time-honored compromise upon the subject of slavery, of thirty-three years' standing, should be repealed, I resisted it; and, in the course of the debate upon that measure, I recollect well saying to the honorable gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] who was one of the leaders in that controversy, that I believed the measure was full of evil to our common country, with the promise of no good to any party or section of it. The friends of the measure declared that it was their purpose to remove an odious restriction, in order that the principles of the great compromise of 1850 might be carried out and spread over that Territory, by which the people, when they came to form a State constitution, might regulate their own domestic affairs in their own way.

Subsequently, the Supreme Court of the United States, the highest judicial tribunal in the land, and beyond whose decree there is no other remedy but revolution, asserted that that restrictive clause of 1850 was unconstitutional.

I therefore did not enter this Congress with any hope or any purpose of proposing the reenactment of that clause; but finding that the people of Kansas had been refused the right of forming their State constitution in their own way, I readily united with the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] and his compeers of the Democratic party in this House, in asserting their right to vote upon their constitution prior to their admission into the Union.

A scene was presented by my honorable colleague from the metropolitan district of my State [Mr. Cox] the morning when we first entered this new Hall. He then took the banner of popular sovereignty, and nobly defended that principle up to a very recent period. His debut in this Hall commanded the admiration of his former political enemies as well as many of his political friends. On yesterday morning, in full view of the glorious triumph of those principles, he beat a retreat.

Mr. COX. The gentleman will allow me to say a word?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I will.

Mr. COX. I wish to say here, and in reference to the remarks which were made by my venerable colleague [Mr. GOODWIN] yesterday—amid the exciting scene which then took place, in which he had my fullest sympathy, I wish to say—for myself and my colleagues on this side of the Chamber, that we stood by the House bill reported here, so long as we could, in good faith, until the last hope of carrying it was gone. I stood with them as long as I saw any hope of carrying it. But, sir, now that this conference report has cut off every chance of seeing my views on the subject carried out, with no opportunity of amending the report itself, I will do the best I can under the circumstances, and I hope the gentleman will give me the credit at least of honest motives in the course I have taken.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I am not here to question the motives of my colleague or of any man upon this floor; but I desire to put a question to him. He occupies a prominent position in the Ohio delegation, and a distinguished position in this movement against the Lecompton constitution. I understood my colleague, when he became the pioneer leader of the Douglas Democracy, to assert in his speech that he exacted the right of the people of Kansas to vote on their constitution before they should be admitted into the Union as a State; and I ask him now, whether he construes the present bill reported by the committee of conference to be a submission of the constitution to a vote of the people?

Mr. HUGHES. I object to an answer.

Mr. COX. I will answer the gentleman.

Mr. HUGHES. Stop! I object.

Mr. COX. I will answer in the language of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. Davis,] who spoke day before yesterday, and with whom the gentleman acts, that although the constitution is not submitted in so many words, yet the effect of it is, as I claim and he claims, and the gentleman himself must confess, when he reads the bill, to give the people of Kansas an opportunity to strike down this constitution if they do not want it. I conceive that that is the effect of it. Gentlemen may differ with me in that, but I take the bill. I will go to the bill for its interpretation. I care not for the construction of anybody.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The gentleman does not answer my question. I wish a direct and unequivocal answer. Notwithstanding we may be defeated here to-day on this great principle of popular sovereignty, yet, sir, we shall take an appeal to a higher tribunal—that of the people. Before that high court the gentleman must stand, and before it he and I must meet.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman allow me to read the bill?

Mr. CAMPBELL. No, sir. I have not time, and we have all read it. I want an answer to my question.

Mr. COX. You will not let me read the bill? Mr. LETCHER. I rise to a question of order. I hope the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CAMPBELL] will be allowed to proceed with his remarks without interruption.

Mr. CAMPBELL. That is a question which ought not to be evaded.

While Mr. LETCHER, Mr. COX, and Mr. CAMPBELL were speaking, Mr. LAWRENCE, careless of all noise and cries to order, made these remarks:

Mr. LAWRENCE. Will my colleague permit me to answer the question which he propounds to our colleague from the capital district, [Mr. Cox?] I say to the gentleman emphatically, that it is an effectual and substantial submission of the Lecompton constitution to a vote of the people of Kansas—they may either adopt it or reject it. The manner or form of submission is not such as I would have preferred; but it is nevertheless a submission. Without so understanding it, I am free to say that I never would have voted for it.

I have deemed it due to myself to say this much now, and will, just in conclusion, say to my colleague that I hope to have much more to say on this subject before our common constituents, the people of Ohio.

Mr. LETCHER. The three gentlemen from Ohio have been upon the floor and talking at the same time; now I raise the question of order, that not more than one member has the right to address the Chair at one time; and I insist on its enforcement.

The SPEAKER. The Chair fails to enforce order with his voice or with his gavel.

Mr. LETCHER. Then I say, call for the Sergeant-at-Arms.

The SPEAKER. Two or three gentlemen object to interruption. The Chair will enforce the rule, and no interruption will be allowed unless it is for a personal explanation, or by unanimous consent.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I wish the gentleman from Ohio to yield the floor for a moment.

Mr. LETCHER. I object.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I wish to reply to a remark made yesterday by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL.]

Mr. LETCHER. I object. The gentleman from Ohio has the floor. Let him make the reply.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Then I will take some other opportunity to do so.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I trust that neither of my colleagues will suppose that I am actuated by any unkind feelings towards them. I merely desire to learn how they and others construe the pending bill.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Certainly not.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I see that a difficulty is already arising in regard to the construction of this bill, which arose after the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, as to what was squatter sovereignty. In the question which I propounded to my colleague, [Mr. Cox,] and which I intended to propound to my colleague, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] and others, I am actuated by no other motive but that we may have, before we give a final vote on the measure, a true understanding of what we are going to do.

Mr. COX sought the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot interrupt his colleague.

Mr. COX. With his permission.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Not by me.

Mr. HUGHES. I object to anything out of order.

Mr. FOSTER. I rise to a point of order. I understood the proposition distinctly to be that the gentleman from Ohio should occupy the floor upon the same conditions and terms as it had been occupied by those on the other side. They were not cramped as the gentleman from Ohio is now attempted to be cramped.

Mr. COX. Do I understand that there is objection to my interrupting the gentleman from Ohio, my colleague?

Mr. HUGHES. Yes, sir, I object.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Objection having been made by the Administration side, by which I am prevented from having a clear and explicit answer to my question to my colleague, who is the pioneer of the anti-Lecompton movement in this House, I will send to the Clerk's desk a letter written by him, to be read:

The letter was read, as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
WASHINGTON CITY, February 6, 1853.
GENTLEMEN: Your invitation comes to me in the midst of an unexampled midnight struggle in the popular branch of Congress. I can only say that if the same spirit which here inspires the Democratic members with whom I act, will inform and energize your own expression on the 8th instant, there will be a potential emphasis in favor of the right of the people of our own States and Territories to do as they please in their own business, untrammelled by cabals and unincumbered with fraud.

Mr. BOWIE, (interrupting.) That was on the original amendment.

The Clerk, (resuming:)

A border oligarchy have not shown themselves to be such angels that they should arrogate to themselves that scepter of authority which alone belongs to the people of Kansas. While I have a vote in this Congress, it shall never be dragged in the Lecompton mire. That is my deliberate judgment, and my irrevocable will. I cannot say or do otherwise—so help me God! Not while Douglas stands in the Senate; not while Wise speaks from his Virginian vatic; not while Walker can give us wisdom, or Stanton can utter truth, or Stuart can argue the law, or Forney can wield the pen, or the Northwest can echo the aggregate thunder of these tribunes of the people—shall this great wrong be done in the face of thirty millions of freemen.

Yours, &c., SAMUEL S. COX.
Colonel J. W. FORNEY, D. WEBSTER, Esq., JAMES M. LEDDY, and others, Committee.

Mr. COX. I indorse all that yet. That is all I have to say about that.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I have not only the promise of my colleague's vote for the submission of the constitution to the people of Kansas, but I have his promise, as heard read from the Clerk's desk, sworn to with the same solemnity with which he took the oath of office when he entered this Hall—so help him God!—he will vote for no proposition that does not submit to the people the right to vote upon their constitution.

In addition to that—and I feel bound to allude to it, because I owe an apology to ninety-one, so termed, Black Republicans—when the bill came from the Senate, an arrangement was made by members of all the old political parties, who were anxious to take this question forever from the Halls of Congress, to adopt, in substance, an amendment which had been proposed by a venerable and patriotic Senator from a slaveholding State, [Mr. CRITTENDEN, of Kentucky,] The friends of Mr. DOUGLAS were pledged, by those who were authorized to speak for them, as I understand, upon the high point of personal honor, to go for that proposition, with slight amendments agreed upon, to the last extremity, and to the bitter end of the controversy, and to vote for no other proposition. If I am mistaken in this allegation, the honorable gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARRIS,] the honorable gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. DAVIS,] the honorable gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ADRAIN,] and others I might designate, will correct me now. Both of my colleagues [Messrs. COX and LAWRENCE] were understood to be in this arrangement. Placing the most implicit confidence in their pledge, and the like confidence—

Mr. GROESBECK. Will my colleague allow me to say a word?

The SPEAKER. Interruption is objected to by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. LETCHER,] and the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HUGHES.]

Mr. HUGHES. So far as I am concerned, I withdraw all objection.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I certainly will yield to any of my colleagues.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I object.

Mr. SEWARD. Has not the gentleman the right to yield? Is there any rule restricting him?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio can yield to a personal explanation; that is the extent to which the practice of the House has gone, where there is objection.

Mr. SEWARD. The gentleman's [Mr. GROESBECK's] motives have been assailed, and on that point he wishes to be heard.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman desires to make a personal explanation, it is admissible with the objection; if it is not a personal explanation, it is not admissible.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I object to anything not strictly in order.

Mr. GROESBECK. I suppose my remarks will take the form of a personal explanation. I find, in reading the Globe this morning, that in the debate yesterday an intimation was made, similar to that now made by my colleague, that every one of the gentlemen who voted in favor of the Montgomery-Crittenden amendment pledged themselves to the gentlemen upon that side, in some way or another, to stand by that to the end. Now, I do not desire to go into any discussion. I would like to speak to this proposition myself, and explain it; but I will not. I wish, however, to say to my colleague, that never once, during the whole of this controversy, from the beginning to the end, did I make any such pledge, or give any such understanding, or have any such consultation.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I did not assert that you did.

Mr. GROESBECK. I had no conversation with the Republicans. I concurred with them in the movement. Certainly I did; but there was no conference, no understanding, no arrangement.

Mr. CAMPBELL. In justice to my colleague, I will say I never had any conversation with him in which he pledged himself at all. But I wish here to inquire of my colleague whether he understands the bill reported by the committee of conference, as submitting the constitution to the people of Kansas?

Mr. GROESBECK. In effect it does.

Mr. CAMPBELL. My colleague thinks it does. The gentlemen from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] a member of the committee reporting the bill, asserted in most distinct and unequivocal language, that it did not. The grand idea of the day is that agitation on this question shall cease and determine; that we are to have no more of it; yet we are on the eve of passing the bill by the votes of men, some of whom construe it to mean one thing, and others a very different thing.

Mr. OWEN JONES. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment for a personal explanation? In the course of the gentleman's remarks—

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield? If the gentleman from Pennsylvania rises to a personal explanation, it is admissible if the gentleman yields.

Mr. OWEN JONES. I see in the report in the Globe of the debate yesterday, some remarks of the gentleman from Ohio—

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I yield to the gentleman if he be very brief. I promised to be brief myself. These interruptions necessarily consume much of my time, and extend the debate.

Mr. OWEN JONES. The gentleman intimated that he had pledges from sundry gentlemen upon this floor, some of whom he designated as friends of Mr. DOUGLAS, and some by the States from which they came, and then said "from other gentlemen." I wish the gentleman to understand that, in the whole course of this controversy, I have never given a pledge to him or to any other gentleman upon this floor, that I would stand by the Montgomery bill, or by any other bill, to the last.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I would inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether he did not repeatedly meet in caucus with that portion of the Democratic party known as anti-Lecompton men? and whether a committee was not appointed with power to represent and speak for the entire body?

Mr. OWEN JONES. I met with those gentlemen on one or two occasions, but to my knowledge no committee of any kind was ever appointed; and no committee was ever authorized to pledge my vote upon this floor upon any subject.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania another question. I wish to know how he construes the pending proposition? Does it submit the constitution, in his judgment, to a vote of the people of Kansas?

Mr. OWEN JONES. I am willing to let the people of this country construe this bill for themselves. [Great laughter on the Opposition side of the House.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. I desire, just here, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania will so far accommodate me, to have the benefit of his judgment upon the subject.

Mr. HUGHES. I object. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. SEWARD. I think this system of interrogations is all wrong, and I object to it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it very irregular, and will enforce the rule according to the practice of the House. When a gentleman rises to a personal explanation, it has been customary, even when objection was made, for the floor to be yielded to him for that purpose, but for no other, as the gentleman from Ohio well knows.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I desire to be courteous to every gentleman upon this floor, and am willing to yield the floor; but I have no wish to violate any rule of the House.

The fact can be no longer concealed, Mr. Speaker, that the friends of this measure, who, within the next hour, intend to vote it through, sending it to the North, South, East, and West, as a great peace measure, and as a final settlement of this Kansas imbroglio, put entirely different constructions upon it. Sir, it will but increase the agitation, and I say of it, as I said of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, that I believe it is full of evil and without promise of any good to any party or any section of the country.

The gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. ENGLISH,] the chairman of the conference committee on the part of the House, remarked yesterday that the bill was couched in very good English. If it is in order, I should like that gentleman to declare here before the House and the country, as we approach the final vote, whether he agrees with the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] that this bill does not submit the constitution to a vote of the people of the Territory. I await a reply.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order for the gentleman from Indiana to reply to the gentleman from Ohio, half a dozen objections being made to such interrogatories being propounded and answered.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Then, Mr. Speaker, we shall meet at Philippi, and discuss this question where the rules of the House do not prevail. My colleagues and the gentleman from Indiana, and others from the North, who are voting for this measure, alleging that it submits the question to the people; and the gentlemen from the South, who assert that it does not, will have to meet the question before that tribunal whose sovereignty makes and unmakes us all—the people.

My colleague from the central district of Ohio [Mr. COX] made a very eloquent and pathetic allusion to the bonds which unite Ohio and Kentucky, and referred to the fact that Kentucky united with her younger sister in the war of 1812 to drive back the enemy to the shores of Canada. I have a somewhat indistinct recollection of that war. I served in it, young as I am; and for that reason I doubt very much whether, under the rules of the House, I can vote for the bill of the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. SAVAGE,] proposing to give pensions to the soldiers of the war of 1812. Sir, I was actually in arms upon the frontier during that war—in my mother's arms—[Laughter]—upon the banks of the beautiful Miami, which has its confluence with the Ohio at North Bend, where the gallant Harrison lived and where his remains now repose. I recollect reading, subsequently, in the history of the times, and hearing from the lips of my good mother, that when the merciless Indians, who had been employed by the English to murder the pioneer mothers of the Northwest, and dash out the brains of their infant children, were within but a few miles of the rude hut where I was so in arms, an express rider came announcing the fact that the Kentucky volunteers had arrived. It was the most joyous hour in the lives of those who were unprotected at that time, to learn that the Kentucky volunteers had come to the rescue. The gallantry of Kentucky has again come to the rescue in the Senate and in the House of Representatives, and so has the gallantry of Maryland; and I extend the right hand of fellowship from the interior district which I represent, over the districts of my honorable colleagues, who represent the queen city of Cincinnati, to Kentucky. I unite with them cordially, as do those who have been acting with me hitherto, in this grand movement which, upon fair terms, nationalizes the elements of opposition to that power which has brought this disaster upon us. Sir, Kentucky aided Ohio in the war of 1812, to resist the English movement then; she unites with Ohio to resist the English movement now. [Laughter.]

Mr. FLORENCE. That is personal. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope the gentleman will be allowed to proceed without interruption.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the gentleman has not the right to yield.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for one moment.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will be allowed to proceed. These interruptions must be very unpleasant.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I would willingly yield the floor to my colleague if I can have the permission of his party friends.

Mr. GROW. I object, unless the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ENGLISH] is allowed to respond to the question propounded to him by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CAMPBELL.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. When I rose yesterday, perhaps somewhat excited by the demonstration which I had witnessed upon the part of my colleagues, and made a motion that there be a call of the House; the Chair, rather peremptorily, told me to take my seat. I was not aware that I was out of order. I certainly do not wish to put myself again where it will be the right of the Chair to command me to take my seat. I am perfectly willing, nay more, I am anxious to give gentlemen on all sides of the House, particularly gentlemen who propose to vote for this bill, some of them for one reason, and some for another, an opportunity to propound questions to me, and to answer my interrogatories. The Chair, however, has decided it to be out of order, and without the unanimous consent of the House, it would not be in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say to the gentleman from Ohio, in reference to the call to order yesterday, that he did not intend to be even uncivil to the gentleman from Ohio. Several gentlemen were addressing the Chair out of order; and as the eye of the Chair fell upon the gentleman from Ohio, he thought, as he was one of the older members of the House, that he might as well commence with him as with any other member.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I am very willing, whenever it is necessary to quell a storm in this House, for the Chair to call me by name, whether I am violating the rules or not. [Laughter.] Now, Mr. Speaker, in carrying out the promise which I made to the gentleman from Alabama—

Mr. MASON. Before the gentleman from Ohio takes his seat I desire to ask him whether the gentleman from Massachusetts is good authority—

[Loud cries of "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky cannot interrupt the gentleman from Ohio; objection being made.

Mr. CAMPBELL. This bill, I suppose, is to pass. Ninety-two members, called Black Republicans, perhaps, in stultification of their past record, pledged their honor to vote for a bill for the admission of another slave State, even north of the line 36° 30', if the people desire it. If, in my quiet operations in bringing about that state of affairs, I have induced any member to violate his pledges to his constituents or his conscience, in any way, I wish now publicly to ask his pardon, and to say that I was actuated solely by a desire to remove this thing forever from the Halls of Congress, in order that the Representatives of the people might go on in the transaction of that business, and the passage of those measures, in which every section of the country has a deep and lasting interest.

Gentlemen from the South have united in pressing this matter through. I desire to warn them of this fact, that they have inaugurated a new principle that may, in the end, prove fatal to their institution. It is an unjust discrimination between the two different sections of the Union—the proposition that Kansas may come in as a slave State, but that she may not come in as a free State—coupled with another proposition indorsed by the very message which originated this measure, indorsed by every gentleman who has spoken upon this subject except the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. KERR,] and the honorable gentleman from Kentucky before me, [Mr. UNDERWOOD,] that, regardless of the restricting provisions of a State constitution, the majority of the people may, at any time, change the constitution, and drive slavery from the State. That principle thus adopted, thus tendered, thus forced by the South upon the North, will reach further than Kansas in the future. If it is the law in Kansas that when she is admitted into the Union under the Lecompton constitution, her people, embracing unnaturalized foreigners, may hold a convention, change the constitution, and abolish slavery, it may be well for Virginia and other slave States to look to the consequences. It would be an easy thing for the North to send down hordes of emigrants from foreign lands, who desire to engage in mining, in manufacturing, and in agricultural pursuits, to cross the Ohio river and enter the district of my friend from Wheeling, [Mr. CLEMENS,] pass through the State, and when they get the power, call a convention, change the constitution of the State, and drive the slaveholders further South. This, Mr. Speaker, is the doctrine proclaimed by the gentleman representing the border district upon the south bank of the Ohio. It is a principle recognized by every gentleman from the South, with the exception of the gentleman from South Carolina and the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BOYCE. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. CLINGMAN. I object to the gentleman yielding the floor.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I see that my friend from North Carolina is anxious that I should close.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Not at all; I desire to hear the gentleman.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I was always desirous of accommodating him, and I will therefore now renew the demand for the previous question.

Mr. GROW. I move that there be a call of the House; and I make the motion for the reason that the gentleman from New York [Mr. HASKIN] desires to speak on this question, and if the House will permit him to be heard, I will withdraw the call.

Mr. DEAN. I call for the yeas and nays.
The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ADRAIN. I have a word to say.

Mr. HUGHES. I object.

Mr. ADRAIN. I hope the House will give me its unanimous consent to proceed.

Several MEMBERS. Object!

Mr. ADRAIN. I was going to say that the gentleman from New York—

[Loud cries of "Order!"]

Mr. HASKIN. I desire to address the House for five minutes; and I hope I will have its consent to do so.

Mr. LETCHER. I object.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order. The Clerk will proceed to call the roll.

Mr. CLEMENS. I presume it is in order for the gentleman—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CLEMENS] is not in order.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 85, nays 130; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Bennett, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Bratton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Horace F. Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cragin, Curtis, Dannel, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Iowa, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Eide, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foster, Gilman, Goodell, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Harlan, Thomas L. Wright, and Zollieffer—130.

So the motion for a call of the House was disagreed to.

Pending the above call,

Mr. POTTER said that he hoped that it would be the last time that he would be called on to vote that there be a call of the House.

Mr. GROW. I rise to a privileged question, but will not make it if the gentleman from New York [Mr. HASKIN] can be heard. Let him be heard, and I believe we can settle this question to-day.

Mr. HASKIN. I wish to be heard.

Mr. KEITT. I hope that the House will give the gentleman from New York [Mr. HASKIN] an opportunity to be heard for five or ten minutes.

Mr. BURNETT. I do not agree to that. If gentleman want to filibuster, let them do it.

Mr. GROW. I move, then, that the House adjourn.

Mr. EDIE. And I move that when the House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. ADRAIN. I have a word to say to the House. When I rose a minute ago, it was not my intention to ask of the House the courtesy to make a speech. I should liked to have done so this morning, explanatory of the reasons which operated in inducing me to give the vote I shall give on this conference report.

Mr. HUGHES. I am constrained to object.

Mr. ADRAIN. I have risen only to ask of the House that the gentleman from New York [Mr. HASKIN] be allowed an opportunity to say what he wishes to say—he will not occupy more than five minutes. Then I am willing that the question shall be taken.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I will make a proposition which I think is a fair one—that it be the understanding of all sides that the vote shall be taken to-day at three o'clock.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Only one gentleman from

New York desires to be heard, and he only wishes to speak for five minutes.

Mr. MORGAN. I object to my colleague being limited in time.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I trust that this side of the House will allow my colleague to be heard. We will get at the vote more readily.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I trust so, too.

Mr. HASKIN. I shall confine my remarks to the pending question, and in reply to the remarks made this morning by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Cox.]

A MEMBER. How much time are you going to occupy?

Mr. HASKIN. Five or ten minutes.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I hope the main question will not be ordered until everybody who desires to be heard shall be heard.

Mr. BURNETT. If there can be any understanding by which we shall come to a vote on this question in five, ten, or twenty minutes, then I will withdraw my objection. I was anxious to speak on this subject, as were others, perhaps. But if the gentlemen on the other side want us to give way for the purpose of prolonging this discussion, and filibuster generally, I say let them take the responsibility, and let the facts go to the country. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. MORGAN. I object to any limitation on my colleague. While the gentleman talks of responsibility thrown upon this side of the House, let him be reminded of what that side has been doing from week's end to week's end. I insist that my colleague shall be allowed to occupy the floor as other members have. I ask and take no concessions from the other side.

Mr. HASKIN. If I had been allowed to go on with my remarks, I would not have consumed the time that this colloquy has consumed. When I reached here this morning, I did not intend to speak on this question, thinking that my colleague, [Mr. CLARK], as he had the floor yesterday, would proceed with his remarks this morning—

Mr. HOUSTON. Is there any understanding on this question—that the vote shall be taken at a fixed hour?

Mr. BURNETT. Is the call for the previous question withdrawn?

The SPEAKER. It is still pending. The Chair will see how the matter stands. Does the gentleman from Ohio withdraw the call for the previous question?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I was indebted to the kindness of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. BONHAM], and also the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. SHORTER], for an opportunity to address the House, with the understanding that when I finished my remarks I should renew the call for the previous question.

I refused to take any other terms than those which they had had. I now understand that both of these gentlemen consent that I shall withdraw the previous question.

Mr. BONHAM. For the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CAMPBELL. For the gentleman from New York, with the understanding that he renews the demand for the previous question.

Mr. HASKIN. I will renew it, but I will not vote for it, because I am not in favor of stifling discussion upon this important question.

Mr. CAMPBELL. In the hope that all sides of the House will come to a vote, and meet their responsibility—

Mr. BONHAM. Am I to understand that this is to be the end of the debate?

Mr. HASKIN. Oh, no.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope, now that the previous question is withdrawn, that the gentleman from New York will be allowed to proceed.

Mr. HASKIN. I was about remarking that I had not intended to address the House on the pending question, inasmuch as when the House adjourned yesterday my colleague [Mr. CLARK] had obtained the floor, and I had supposed that he would have been well enough on this occasion to have given to the country and to the House those views which the anti-Lecompton Democrats, still remaining true to their original proposition, entertain. But the illness of my colleague has prevented this, and has compelled me to make these remarks; and especially has the debate this morning between the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CAMPBELL], on the Republican side of the House, and the member from Ohio, [Mr. Cox], on the Democratic side of the House, rendered it necessary that I should say something in reply to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Cox.] A letter was read here, purporting to have come from the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Cox], denouncing the Lecompton constitution. The impression might rest upon the members of this House, and upon the country, that that gentleman was, at a certain time, opposed not only to the Lecompton constitution as it was asked to be voted on in the Senate bill, but to the Lecompton constitution as it was referred to in the Crittenden-Montgomery amendment. I desire to state to the House, and to the country, that on Monday last, late in the afternoon, that gentleman came to this desk and read a letter addressed, I believe, to the Ohio Statesman, denouncing the report of the committee of conference as the most infamous which had been or could be made upon the subject, and denouncing the chairman of the committee of conference for having made such a report.

Mr. COX. That is not true.

Mr. HASKIN. I will prove it by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARRIS.]

Mr. COX. I can furnish the letter, and show it is not so.

Mr. FLORENCE. Is this in order, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. It is out of order.

Mr. FLORENCE. The gentleman from New York is not in order in assailing the motives of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HASKIN. I am proving the fact, so that the country may judge when it was that the gentleman from Ohio obtained his new lights.

Mr. FLORENCE. I insist that it is not pertinent to the question before the House.

Mr. HOUSTON. I rise to a point of order. I understand we are now in the House in debate, and under the rules of the House debate must be relevant, and pertinent to the issue before the House.

Mr. FLORENCE. And further than that—

[Calls of "Order!"]

Mr. HASKIN. The remarks I have been making are only in reply to the remarks addressed to the House to-day by the gentleman from Ohio, in explanation of his remarks yesterday.

Mr. HOUSTON. I insist on my point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will suspend until the gentleman from Alabama states his point of order.

Mr. HOUSTON. I have stated substantially my point of order—that the remarks of the gentleman from New York are irrelevant, and do not relate to or touch the question before the House, and as such I insist that they are not in order.

At this juncture Mr. Cox approached the seat of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HASKIN.]

The SPEAKER, (amid much confusion, excitement, and calls to order.) The gentleman from Ohio will please resume his seat.

Mr. COX, (resuming his seat.) I hope, Mr. Speaker, I shall have an opportunity to answer the gentleman.

Mr. HASKIN. I desire to say, further, that on Tuesday night following, I met the gentleman from Ohio, when he said to me, distinctly, that he and his colleague [Mr. LAWRENCE] were against the proposition of the committee of conference. [Interruption and great confusion in the Hall.]

Mr. BURNETT. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman from New York has no right to proceed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York must perceive that his remarks are assuming a personal character, and that they are not admissible under the rules of the House. The gentleman can proceed, and give any reasons for or against the passage of the bill, of the amendment, or of the report of the committee of conference; but he cannot indulge in personalities.

Mr. HASKIN. I am not impugning motives, but am simply giving facts and circumstances in regard to the change of views of anti-Lecompton Democrats.

Mr. HOUSTON. I rise to a question of order. I insist that the gentleman from New York shall be required to take his seat, as being out of order.

Mr. HASKIN. Well, I will refrain from any further continuance of these remarks. What I have stated thus far is true, and I will now

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

TUESDAY, MAY 4, 1858.

NEW SERIES.....No. 120.

address myself to what pertains to the bill before the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York will proceed in order.

Mr. HOUSTON. It is for the House to give the gentleman permission to go on.

The SPEAKER. But it is usual for the House to give that permission.

Mr. HOUSTON. It is hardly usual to give it under such circumstances, when the gentleman abuses the privileges of the House.

Mr. HASKIN. I thought that what I was saying was pertinent to this occasion. As there were twenty-three of us anti-Lecompton Democrats who started out against the Senate bill, and voted to adhere to the Crittenden-Montgomery amendment, I thought that I should state to the House that though that number has been decimated, and though but twelve—the number of the Apostles—[cries of "Order!" "Order!"] remained, that there was not remaining among them a Judas, and that we would to the last maintain our honor. And I thought it was pertinent to this case that I should show to the House, and to the country, that the gentleman from Ohio, and some others acting with him, have seen new light within a few days upon this subject, and should ask him to give that light to the country.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman allow me to answer him here?

Mr. HASKIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. COX. I stated to the House very frankly yesterday, that my first impression was against the report of the conference committee.

Mr. BINGHAM. Oh yes; yes.

Mr. COX. That was my impression at first. I did not like the bill as reported from the committee of conference. I do not like it yet, as I stated yesterday. It does not meet my views fully. I discussed yesterday the objection I had to it, just exactly as I did in the letter to the Ohio Statesman, to which the gentleman from New York referred. In that letter I stated all the objections to the bill of the committee of conference that occurred to me then, and gave them also as the objections of Judge DOUGLAS. I then went on and asked the best judgment of my friends in Ohio in regard to the passage of this conference bill. I also gave my opinion upon both sides of the matter, but I am free to say that at that time my best impression was against this conference report, because I then believed it discriminated against the free States and in favor of the slave States.

Mr. HASKIN. Since that time you have got new light.

Mr. COX. Since that time I have sought the best information I could, in the discharge of my duty. I have conversed with Governor Walker in relation to this subject. I asked his opinion about it, and his opinion in relation to the population of Kansas, and his statements have controlled my views in this matter.

The gentleman from New York knows I have acted with him in good faith. He knows that I have had great reluctance in taking the ground I have taken, and he should not insinuate that I am a Judas.

Mr. HASKIN. I have not said you were a Judas.

Mr. COX. You insinuate it. The gentleman knows very well that no man, from the Administration or from any other source, has dared to approach me on this subject. Not one. I have kept myself aloof from all other influences save those of an honest mind and a pure heart. I have decided the question for myself; and any man who says to the contrary, or insinuates to the contrary, has not a worthy place upon this floor. I know that my friend from New York, knowing me as he has done for the last four months, knows that I would be unworthy of association with him, or with members of this House, if I should betray his confidence, or should prove recreant to all I have said and thought in reference to this question.

Mr. HASKIN. I know you said the other day that you were against this bill.

Mr. COX. That was my best judgment at the time; but according to my best information—and I appeal to Heaven for the rectitude of my intentions—this constitution is practically though not in form submitted to the people of Kansas. They have the choice to accept it or to reject it. On that condition being fulfilled as a condition precedent to the admission of Kansas, I was willing to come in with my party friends, and do the best I can for them, although this bill is not perfect in all respects.

My friend from New York—if the gentleman will allow me still to call him friend—does not mean to impute anything against my integrity in this matter?

Mr. HASKIN. I would like now to be allowed to proceed to give my reasons for opposing this bill.

Mr. COX. I ask the gentleman, in the presence of this House, whether he imputes any improper motives to me—any falsehood or recreancy on my part?

Mr. HASKIN. I leave that to the country to determine.

Mr. COX. If you do, sir, I have an epithet—[Loud cries of "Order!" and indescribable confusion.]

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen cannot be permitted to indulge in personalities in debate. The Chair will be under the necessity of calling upon the Sergeant-at-Arms to interpose. The Chair feels it to be his duty, after the exhibitions we have had here, to prohibit anything like personalities in debate in future, and he will do it if the House will sustain him.

Mr. COX. The trouble with me has been—[Loud cries of "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HASKIN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. COX. I had not quite finished the remark which I was permitted by the gentleman to make.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio will please resume his seat.

Mr. ADRAIN. I hope the gentleman from New York will indulge me for just one moment. I have been acting with him, and expect to act with him to the end of this struggle.

Mr. BURNETT. I object to this, unless the door is to be opened for debate all round.

Mr. ADRAIN. I have but a word to say in relation to my friend from Ohio, [Mr. Cox.] He is certainly placed in an embarrassing position here this morning. Bad and improper motives might be attributed to him. Now, from the intercourse I have had with Mr. Cox, from the first moment I became acquainted with him down to this hour, I believe him to be a pure, high-minded, and honorable gentleman. It is true he has changed his opinion upon this subject, but he had a perfect right to do so.

Mr. HUGHES. I object to this.

Mr. ADRAIN. Oh, that gentleman is always objecting. [Laughter.] I thought it due to Mr. Cox to say what I have said; and, although he differs with me upon this question, to bear testimony to his character.

Mr. HASKIN. Mr. Speaker, I desire now to give the reasons, very briefly, why I shall vote against the bill reported by the committee of conference. This little episode which has just occurred, has grown out of the desire on my part to vindicate those anti-Lecompton Democrats who have remained true to their position. I agree with the member from Ohio [Mr. Cox] in his written statement, that this proposition is the meanest bill yet proposed.

[Cries of "Good! good!"]

Mr. COX, (in his seat.) I never made such a statement.

Mr. HASKIN. I agree with the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. QUITMAN,] that under this report of the committee of conference there will be a submission of the Lecompton constitution to the people of Kansas.

Mr. BOWIE, (in his seat.) I dispute that. [Laughter.]

Mr. HASKIN. It is an alternative proposition, under which the people of Kansas can be admitted into the Union under the Lecompton constitution now, but cannot be admitted under any other constitution until they have a population of over ninety-three thousand. I say, sir, that the plan of submission is of a thimble-rigging character; that it attempts to reach by indirection what the South should always attempt to reach by direction.

We have heard gentlemen upon the floor of this House advocating the passage of this bill upon the doctrine enunciated by the Charleston Mercury three or four months since, that Kansas is now a State under the Lecompton constitution; that that constitution has been regularly adopted; that it has been conceived and brought forth legally; that the only question now is, whether the State shall be admitted into the Union or not; but that, as a State out of the Union, she is, to all intents and purposes, now in existence, with a legal constitution, to wit, the Lecompton constitution. I object to the form of submission under this bill, because it does not, in a direct manner, attain the end which I, as a northern man, should have wished to attain.

But the great objection with me is, that by the alternative proposition made in this bill, the North is degraded, while I think the South is dishonored. I can see no reason why, if over ten thousand people, on the 4th of January last, were in favor of a free-State constitution, and against this Lecompton constitution, they should be debarred the privilege, at any time hereafter, of voting in favor of a proposition which will carry out their wishes. I know that there are over thirteen millions of people in the free States, and only about six millions in the slave States, excluding the blacks. And to degrade the people of the North, by saying that a free-State constitution shall not at once be submitted to the people of Kansas, is one of those things which I, as a northern Democrat, must repudiate and protest against. Sir, in the last presidential election but little over one million votes were cast in the slave States, while over three million votes were cast in the free States; and I have yet to learn that three or four men in the North are not as good as three or four men in the South, if they are white men, and especially if they behave themselves. [Laughter.] I really and sincerely believe that in every northern State this question will be understood by the people, and that if this proposition is carried through, the Democratic party in the northern States will be dismembered. It is because I wish to see the Democratic party triumphant in the next fall elections, and in 1860, that I oppose the passage of this bill.

Mr. Speaker, in the remarks which I have made I have not designed to give offense to the member from Ohio, [Mr. Cox,] or to any one else; but I have stated facts for the purpose of vindicating the twelve or thirteen anti-Lecompton Democrats from the North, who, from consistency and pure motives, will oppose this measure to the bitter end. In accordance with my promise, I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded; and the main question ordered.

Mr. CAMPBELL demanded the yeas and nays on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 112, nays 103; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ahl, Anderson, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bocock, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Bryan, Burnett, Burns, Caruthers, Caskie, John B. So the report was agreed to.

Pending the call of the yeas and nays,

Mr. FAULKNER, when his name was called, said he regretted he could not cast his vote in the affirmative. He had paired off with Mr. MORRILL. Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, stated that Mr. STEWART, of Maryland, had paired off with Mr. THOMPSON.

Mr. BOWIE said: Mr. Speaker, is my name recorded?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's name is recorded in the affirmative.

Mr. BOWIE. Mr. Speaker, we are told that Rome was once saved by the gabbling of geese: our glorious country is now saved by the babbling of—statesmen. [Laughter, and calls to order.]

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, said he regretted exceedingly that his pair with the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. Wood,] prevented him from voting in the affirmative.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana, stated that he had paired off with Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania, or he should have voted for the bill.

Mr. NICHOLS stated that his colleague, Mr. HORTON, had paired off for the day with Mr. HULL.

Mr. GROW stated that Mr. MONTGOMERY had paired off with Mr. WARREN.

Mr. RITCHIE stated that Mr. PURVIANCE had paired off with Mr. DIMMICK.

Mr. BISHOP stated that his colleague, Mr. ARNOLD, had paired off with Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin.

Mr. BRYAN said: Because the South votes "ay," I vote "ay."

The vote having been announced,

Mr. ENGLISH moved to reconsider the vote by which the report of the committee of conference was agreed to, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, called for the yeas and nays on the latter motion.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his call for the yeas and nays. The battle is over.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not withdraw the demand. The battle is not over. I will fight it out to the last.

Mr. MORGAN. If the gentleman does withdraw the demand, I will renew it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 113, nays 100; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ahl, Anderson, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Boccock, Bonham, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Bryan, Burnett, Burns, Caruthers, Caskie, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, John Cochrane, Cockrell, Corning, Cox, James Craig, Burton Craige, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Dewart, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Eustis, Florence, Foley, Garrett, Gartrell, Gillis, Gilmer, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Sherman, Robert Smith, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Tompkins, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, and Wilson—100.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Pending the call of the roll, Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, stated that he had paired off with Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee.

Mr. BONHAM said: Upon reflection, I think I have not given the vote I should have given. As this bill cannot be amended if the vote is reconsidered, I change my vote and vote in the affirmative.

TARIFF COMMITTEE.

Mr. STANTON. I rise to a privileged question, which will occupy the House but a moment. The select committee appointed to investigate the expenditure of money to procure the passage of the tariff of 1857, have instructed me to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the select committee appointed to investigate the expenditure of money to procure the passage of the tariff of 1857, have power to authorize any two members of said committee to take the testimony of any witness, who, by reason of sickness or any other cause, cannot be brought before said committee, at such time and place as the members so authorized may deem expedient; and that they have leave to sit during the sittings of the House.

I desire to say to the House that a witness, whose testimony is deemed very material by the committee, cannot be brought on to Washington. It is not desirable that the whole committee should be compelled to travel any considerable distance to take testimony. The committee, therefore, thought it would relieve them from all difficulty if the House would authorize them to detail two of their number to proceed and take the testimony of this witness. That is all. I presume there will be no objection.

Mr. HOUSTON. I shall object to that resolution at present, unless I hear something more about it. I do not understand it very well, but it seems to be an invasion of, or a very marked departure from, the proceedings of committees of the House heretofore. I desire to know whether the witness will not be able to be here before the session closes? It does seem to me that these investigating committees have already taken a very wide range in eliciting the truth on the subjects they were authorized to investigate, and that if this witness will be likely to be able to be here at any time before the termination of the session it will be infinitely better to wait, than to depart from the rules of the House.

There are two reasons why I think this resolution ought not to pass, unless the circumstances are such as to leave us no discretion. In the first place I object to giving committees permission to travel all over the country; and then again, in my opinion, it is improper that one or two members of a committee shall be permitted to take testimony which must be indorsed by the whole committee, and which the whole House is called upon to indorse.

Mr. STANTON. The only effect of this resolution is to authorize two to make a quorum instead of three, which the rules now require. As I understand it, that is the only change which it makes in that particular.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman is mistaken in this. It is a departure in another very material point. The committees of all descriptions of this House, have their regular place of meeting. This resolution authorizes this committee instead of meeting in their room, to meet in New York, New Orleans, San Francisco, or any other point; for when you once depart from the rule, a majority of the committee may authorize a minority to go all over the country.

Mr. MAYNARD. I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio a single question. I wish to know whether this resolution meets the concurrence of the entire committee?

Mr. STANTON. Certainly; it is reported with the unanimous consent of the committee. I wish to say that the witness whose testimony it is desired should be taken is in Philadelphia, and that two members of the committee will only be absent for two days from the sessions of the House. That is the extent of the power sought to be conferred upon the committee by this resolution. The committee regard the testimony as exceedingly important. We have delayed to close the report for a considerable time, for several weeks, waiting for the testimony of this single witness. It is not probable that he can be brought here during the session, on account of the state of his health. We do not believe the facts can be developed satisfactorily without this testimony. The gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. Moore,] and myself shall, to-morrow, proceed to Philadelphia, if the House gives authority. I call the previous question upon the resolution.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. STANTON moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House, for a few moments, to the subject of the misunderstanding, which we all regretted to observe this morning, between my friend and colleague from New York, [Mr. HASKIN,] and my friend from Ohio, [Mr. Cox,] I am the personal friend of both of these gentlemen, and I have sympathized with both from the time that this unfortunate Kansas entanglement arose. At this hour each has my entire confidence; and no one, sir, has regretted more than I have that any such misunderstanding should have arisen.

I have been present at a personal interview between these gentlemen; and I desire to inform the House, in whose presence their unfriendly controversy took place, that my colleague was actuated in what he said by reflections, not unnatural, but nevertheless, in my opinion, unwarrantable. My colleague felt irritated, because he had supposed that, in the remarks which my friend from Ohio [Mr. Cox] made yesterday, when abandoning his recent associates, that he had taken occasion to send back a Parthian arrow into the camp from which my colleague supposed that he had fled. But, sir, an explanation has taken place; and, on referring to the remarks made by the gentleman from Ohio, they do him, in my judgment signal honor; and the critical examination of them has removed from the mind of my colleague all suspicion that the abandonment by my friend from Ohio of the platform upon which, but a few days since, he, my colleague from New York, and myself stood, was influenced by any improper motive. I believe it is an abandonment that has resulted from principle; and that therefore the path which he followed was the path of duty and the path of honor. I am instructed by my friend and colleague [Mr. HASKIN] to say that he withdraws any imputation upon the personal integrity of my friend from Ohio; and I am authorized by the honorable gentleman from Ohio to say that he cheerfully accepts the explanation which I have risen to make.

Mr. NICHOLS. This Kansas question is disposed of, and heretofore, I think, it has been customary, after a great excitement, to have a calm; therefore I move that when the House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. MORGAN demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. HICKEY, their Chief Clerk, notifying the House that that body had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the Kansas bill.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a statement of the expenses of taking the census of Minnesota Territory; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

And then, on motion of Mr. FLORENCE, the House (at half past three o'clock, p. m.) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, May 3, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. C. H. HALL.

The Journal of Friday last was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SEWARD presented the petition of Matthew Flausburgh, a soldier in the war of the Revolution, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of Joseph Humphries, praying that the Secretary of the Navy may be authorized to test his patent "floating anchor or drag," for vessels to ride by in heavy gales of wind at sea, with a view to its adoption in the Navy; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented a memorial of John Beeson, praying for a warrant for lands on which he had settled in Oregon, and from which he was driven; and also indemnity for losses resulting from the same; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. FOSTER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the memorial of James McCutcheon, praying for an increase of his pension, reported adversely thereon, and asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, to whom was referred the memorial of M. C. Gritzner, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 308) for his relief. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. EVANS, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution by Mr. Foor, on the 26th of January last, in relation to the compensation of the first or principal messenger in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, reported it, with an amendment.

Mr. IVERSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Samuel H. Taylor, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 306) for the relief of Samuel H. Taylor. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the report of the Secretary of the Navy, in answer to a resolution of the Senate for information in relation to the publication of the results of the United States naval exploring expedition to the North Pacific ocean and China seas, and also of the results of the United States naval expedition to the La Plata river, reported in favor of printing the same; and the report was agreed to.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE IN IOWA.

Mr. HARLAN. The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the memorial of the Legislature of the State of Iowa, asking Congress to divert the grant of land heretofore made to that

State for public buildings, to an agricultural college, have instructed me to report a joint resolution to accomplish that object; and as I suppose there will be no objection to its passage, I ask for its consideration now.

The joint resolution (S. No. 39) removing the restrictions upon a certain grant of five sections of land to the State of Iowa, was read, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. As the State of Iowa is desirous of diverting the five sections of land granted by Congress to that State for completing its public buildings to other purposes, the capital of that State having been changed since the grant of the five sections of land was made, the joint resolution proposes to rescind the restriction imposed by the third subdivision of the sixth section of the act granting the land, and to release to the State of Iowa all the right, title, and interest of the United States, in and to those sections of land.

It was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. PUGH gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to authorize the circuit and district courts to provide for the service of process whenever a vacancy exists in the office of marshal of the United States.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. KENNEDY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 304) to establish a line of mail steamships between certain ports in the United States and Great Britain; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. BRIGHT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 305) to complete the construction of military roads in the Territory of Washington; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

Mr. HAMLIN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 307) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to sell the old custom-house and site, in Bath, Maine, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PURCHASE OF LIME POINT.

Mr. BRODERICK submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, requested to inform the Senate what contracts, if any, have been entered into by the Department for the purchase of Lime Point, in California, for military purposes.

CALIFORNIA WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. GWIN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the payment of such claims against the United States as have been favorably reported upon by the board of Army officers, (appointed under the sixth section of the act approved August 31, 1852,) in their report to Congress dated December 5, 1854.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message was received from the House of Representatives by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, informing the Senate that the Speaker had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; which thereupon received the signature of the Vice President.

An act (S. No. 36) to provide for the issuing, service, and return, of original and final process in the circuit and district courts of the United States in certain cases.

An act (S. No. 76) to incorporate Gonzaga College, in the city of Washington and District of Columbia.

An act (H. R. No. 306) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1858.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire now to call up the resolution I offered last week, directing the Committee on Commerce to report the bill referred to them, making an appropriation for deepening the channel over the St. Clair flats, in the State of Michigan.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the following resolution submitted by Mr. CHANDLER on the 24th of April:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to report the bill heretofore referred to them, making an appropriation for the completion of the channel over the St. Clair flats in the State of Michigan, and that the appropriation be reduced to $55,000.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not propose to discuss this proposition, but I should like to have a vote upon it. I hold in my hand a report of the engineer of the work, stating that he has now four dredges and two tug-boats at work on the flats, and he estimates that $55,000 will finish the channel. The channel has stood much better than he anticipated—in fact, is unimpaired; and this little appropriation of $55,000 will complete the work. I hope the Senate will allow this resolution to come to a vote as a test question.

Mr. CLAY. I must object to the consideration of the resolution at this time. The entire committee, with perhaps a single exception, is committed against making any appropriations for works of internal improvement during this session, unless they be indispensable for the preservation of works already constructed to prevent their decay and destruction; and hence the resolution must lead to debate. I certainly shall resist any such instruction to the committee. I trust however, it will be laid over until another day. Indeed, I have a right to object to its consideration now.

Mr. CHANDLER. It has been objected to once.

Mr. HAMLIN. It is now under consideration. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The chair will inform the Senator from Alabama that the resolution is now before the body by a vote of the Senate. It has not been offered to-day: it was offered on a previous occasion.

Mr. CLAY. Then I move to lay the resolution on the table, as I do not wish to invoke any discussion now.

Mr. CHANDLER. The vote on that will be just as satisfactory as a test question. On that motion, therefore, I call for the yeas and nays. I desire this to be a test vote on the appropriation. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SEWARD. I desire to say that the honorable Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. WILSON) has been called home for a day or two, and has paired off with the honorable Senator from Louisiana, (Mr. BENJAMIN.) I was made an umpire to decide what should be party questions between the two gentlemen. I think I shall decide that they have paired off on this question.

The question being taken, resulted—yeas 20, nays 21, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Biggs, Bigler, Clay, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Green, Hammond, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Kennedy, Mason, Pugh, Sebastian, Silldell, and Toombs—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Bright, Broderick, Chandler, Colamer, Crittenden, Doollittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Gwin, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Jones, King, Polk, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, and Trumbull—21.

So the motion to lay on the table was not agreed to.

Mr. CLAY. I call for the reading of the resolution.

The Secretary read it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hold in my hand a letter from the engineer in charge of the work, in which he says.

"The work upon St. Clair flats has been recommenced; and I am happy to inform you that my examinations prove that the cut made last year remains constant. It has not filled up as many predicted.

"Three dredges and one tug are now at work widening the cut. I expect another dredge and another tug from Buffalo for this work in a few days. With these four dredges and two steam tugs, the remnant of the last appropriation will soon be used up. Therefore I have considerable anxiety in relation to the addition for which Congress has been asked. Upon the fate of that bill depends the question of success."

I likewise have his estimate stating that $55,000 will complete this great work. There is around that channel a detour of nearly seven miles; more than four hundred million dollars of commerce are passing over that cut every year; and the small sum of $55,000 will complete a channel that will every year save four or five times that amount. I trust this matter will be brought to a vote. I shall not undertake to discuss it. It is a plain proposition. I shall only say that unless this appropriation be made, and made very soon, the money which has been previously expended will be useless and wasted.

Mr. CLAY. This resolution is a very unusual and extraordinary one in its character, and it is supported in a most extraordinary manner. For the Senate to assume to instruct the Committee on Commerce what they shall do in relation to any measure referred to that committee, is tantamount to taking from them all discretion or judgment about the bill proposed. It is idle for the committee to seek information from the Treasury Department or the War Department in relation to these works, if that is all to go for naught, and they are simply to be the registers of the will of the Senate, as they may dictate it here in a vote of instruction. These matters have all been under the consideration of the committee. They have sought information about them from the proper sources in the Government; and here comes forward the Senator from Michigan, and upon the authority of a private letter to him, offers information to the Senate not obtained from other sources, and seeks, by offering that information, to instruct the Committee on Commerce what they shall do.

Now, sir, the very proposition, when explained, should work its own condemnation. What is the use of our having Cabinet officers to sit at the other end of the avenue? What is the use of having a board of engineers to supervise these works, and to report to the War Department what is requisite; if all this is to be put aside or outweighed by testimony communicated by an officer in a private letter to a member of the Senate?

Why, sir, I regard it as insulting to the committee to instruct them to report a bill with a particular amount of appropriation for any particular work. For myself, I would spurn such instructions. I would refuse to do so if it was contrary to my own judgment. I might report the bill back for the action of the Senate; but as to sitting in a committee-room merely to register the edicts of a majority of the Senate, I should scorn myself if I were capable of doing it. Now, sir, I think that the Senate certainly voted against laying this resolution on the table without due consideration. Where are the reports of the board of engineers?

Mr. CHANDLER. Before the committee—submitted by me.

Mr. CLAY. Where is the report of the Secretary of War?

Mr. CHANDLER. Before the committee.

Mr. CLAY. How does the Senate know that this work has the approval of that officer? I submit that this is a most inappropriate way, and a most unusual manner of proceeding in the Senate—one that is without the warrant of any precedent, so far as I know, and one that I hope will not be followed. I trust that the Senate will not vote for this resolution. If they do so, it will be followed, doubtless, by similar resolutions offered by other Senators interested in local works, and the consequence will be that your Committee on Commerce will dwindle into utter insignificance and uselessness, and you might as well abolish it.

Mr. HAMLIN. I am myself gratified that the Senator from Michigan has seen fit to offer this resolution for the consideration of the Senate. I view it in an entirely different light from the chairman of the Committee on Commerce. I think it is appropriate; I think it is just; I think the action of that committee demanded this resolution.

The Senator from Alabama inquires of us of what use are Cabinet officers; of what use are topographical engineers, if the Senate is to take the direction of these matters into its own hands? Well, sir; I do not know that we have these persons, appropriately or specifically for the purpose of following precisely what they say. We listen to all they have to say, and we shall be guided by whatever they say so far as it commends itself to our judgment; not beyond that. But I ask a question, I think quite as pertinent: what is the use of a Senate, if the Committee on Commerce, or Cabinet officers, or topographical engineers, are to control it? Now, sir, I think this Committee on Commerce is the creature of the Senate, is within its control; and when a majority of that committee, in their own judgment, come to a conclusion that does not meet the judgment of the Senate, what is the use of having a Senate if you do not direct the committee what to do? If they are anything more than the mere servants of this body, I should like very well to know what they are. If the Committee on Commerce is to control all these matters, without reporting a solitary bill back to this body, so that the Senate may either affirm or reject that report, I ask again, what is the use of having a Senate? Is everything within the control of that committee? Are they omnipotent?

I am not saying that they may not be right in their opinion; I am not saying that they are wrong; but I am viewing the position in the light in which the Senator from Alabama has presented it. The Senator has told us this morning himself that the Committee on Commerce have agreed to make no appropriations except in specific cases, where, on examination, it should be found that appropriations were necessary to prevent works from going to decay. That is the judgment of the committee. Is it the judgment of the Senate? That is the question. I do not know that this appropriation is the strongest one that can be presented; I am not well enough informed on the subject to judge; but that it is a case of great merit, I do know.

I said, sir, that I was glad this resolution had been offered, and simply for this reason: the Committee on Commerce, as the chairman has told you, have come to the conclusion to make no recommendation whatever for works of this character. If that be the sense of the Senate, then there is no necessity for the committee taking further action. If it be not the sense of the Senate, and if the Senate, in its judgment, shall deem it advisable to appropriate any sums for any purposes of this kind, they may take a test vote on this resolution, and the committee may report this bill back; and while, as I said, I do not know that it is the strongest case which may be presented, we may get at the judgment of the Senate as to what will be done on the question generally; and for that reason I am glad the resolution was offered.

I take this occasion to say that I did not agree with the majority of the committee in their determination, which has been announced by the chairman, and I will state also that I stood alone. If a majority of the Senate should be of a different opinion from that committee, certainly—here I differ with the chairman—I cannot view it as any disrespect to the committee; I cannot view it as any reflection on the committee, in any way. I doubt not that the committee have acted as they believed wisest and best, although their action did not meet my judgment then; it does not meet my judgment now. I know very well that in the embarrassed state of the Treasury, we ought to be more guarded, more careful, than usual in our expenditures, and we ought to make them in a more limited manner than we should be apt to do under a different state of things; but that we should make none whatever, I do not agree to. I hope the resolution may be allowed to pass the Senate, simply for the purpose of sending this one bill here, and letting us have the judgment of the Senate upon it; and, according to that judgment, I have no doubt the committee would cheerfully act.

Mr. CLAY. A simple instruction to the committee to report back a bill would not in itself be obnoxious to some of the objections which I have made. But, sir, this is a resolution of a different character. It is an instruction to the committee to report back a bill appropriating a particular sum of money for the improvement of this channel; and it is directing the committee, contrary to their own judgment, excepting the single Senator from Maine, as he has just stated, to report a bill which they regard as inexpedient and improper. I say that, under these circumstances, such a resolution is offensive to the committee. It is taking away all discretion from them, and making them do what the Senate may dictate, although they may disapprove of the particular measure.

If the Senator from Michigan had simply asked for a resolution of instruction to the committee to report back his bill for the action of the Senate, I should not have opposed it; but to instruct them to report a bill making a particular appropriation, I do object to, as offensive to the committee, and as unbecoming the Senate.

Mr. HAMLIN. The whole of the matter is in a nutshell. A bill has been referred to the Committee on Commerce, appropriating a larger sum than that which is now named. The engineer says to us that a smaller sum will answer, and the object is only to diminish the sum. When the bill shall have been reported back with a diminished sum, then the whole question will be before the Senate; because, if we act under this resolution, what do we do? We report the bill back with an amendment. There will be the bill before the Senate as it was originally referred, and the amendment in compliance with this resolution. Both propositions will be before the Senate, and it is a simple direction to reduce the amount; that is all.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will state that I had the honor to introduce a bill appropriating $100,000 for the completion of this work, which sum, at that time, I supposed would be requisite. I afterwards applied at the Department, obtained maps and estimates—in fact all the information that could be obtained at the Department—and submitted it to the committee through the honorable Senator from Maine. I do not object at all to the amendment to my resolution suggested by the chairman, so as to leave it a simple resolution to report back the bill. The amount which I have named is the precise amount, or varies but a few dollars from the amount, which the Department says will be requisite to complete the work. I would as soon the committee would report the bill in one shape as another. I modify the resolution so as to provide merely that the committee be instructed to report back the bill.

Mr. IVERSON. I do not myself disagree to the principle which is intended to be inaugurated in this case, of instructing a committee to report a particular bill. My impression is that that is parliamentary; that if the majority of the body desire to have a bill acted upon, and it is delayed by a committee for an unreasonable time, or they are rather obstinate, the Senate has the right to instruct the committee to report the bill. I do not consider it disrespectful to the committee; it is a mere question of policy; but I object to the passage of this resolution upon principle, and I trust the Senate will not pass it. It is the commencement of a system of internal improvement which I think the country is not prepared now to enter into; for if this resolution prevails, and the Committee on Commerce be instructed to report a bill for the improvement of this particular work, appropriating so large an amount of public money—$100,000—as a matter of course, if such a project as this passes, other places will come in for their share; and we shall have bill after bill, instruction after instruction, until we shall have a batch of internal improvement bills on us leading to the expenditure of millions upon millions of the public money. It is simply the commencement, the inauguration, of a scheme of public plunder, by which these works of internal improvement are to be carried on.

Now, sir, that Senators on the other side of the Chamber should vote for this proposition is perfectly reasonable and natural. They are all in favor of the system of internal improvement by the General Government, for many reasons which we all understand, and for this one, if for no other: that they may create as large expenditures of the public money as possible during the existence of a Democratic Administration, so that that Administration may be brought into public odium for its extravagance. That is one reason—a very potent and good one—for them to act upon. But, sir, that is by no means a reason why any gentleman who supports the present Administration of the Government should vote for this or any other proposition of a similar kind. The expenditures of this Government are running up now to an extraordinary extent. I suppose that at this session, although we are endeavoring to economize on small matters, the expenditures will probably go to some seventy or eighty million dollars; and if this system of internal improvement be inaugurated and carried out, as I suppose is the design of this movement, we shall have an expenditure of four or five millions more for these objects; and in proportion as the expenditures of the Administration are swelled up to an enormous extent, so, in proportion, will the enemies of the Administration be able to find fault with it, and to bring it into public odium and discredit before the people.

Sir, I trust that this system will not be approved by the Senate, but that we shall nip it in the bud at once; because, if this appropriation is to be made, I cannot see why hundreds of others ought not to be made, that certainly stand on as good a foundation as this. I can understand no particular reason why this appropriation should be made in preference to five hundred or a thousand other projects calling on the public Treasury for appropriations for improvements in the United States. There is no reason why this work should have particular preference over the others, and why this extraordinary mode should be pursued, (which, although parliamentary, is certainly unusual in the practice of this body, as I understand,) of instructing a committee to bring in a bill contrary to the settled convictions of right of the committee. Let the committee make a general report on this subject, stating the position which that committee assume of opposition to these appropriations, and then let the question come up on general principles and be decided by the Senate; but let us not, in this mode, be making appropriations for particular works. I trust that the resolution will not be passed; at any rate, I trust that the Senators on this side of the Chamber who are in favor of the Administration, and desire to maintain it and the Democratic party in this country, will put their feet on this proposition at the very outset, and stamp their disapprobation upon it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I did not propose to go into a discussion of this question at this time. I merely proposed to submit the resolution as a test question, without discussion, and I had spoken to several Senators on the other side who assented to the proposition. I am perfectly willing to accept the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, and leave the resolution one simply instructing the committee to report a bill without stating the amount of the appropriation.

I will say, however, to the honorable Senator from Georgia, that throughout the Northwest Mr. Buchanan was pledged, from every stump in every northwestern State, as being in favor of this measure. Sir, it is no reason to be urged here that it is not a Democratic measure. It is a Democratic measure. My honorable predecessor [Mr. Cass] introduced a bill here two years ago and carried it through for this same purpose, and I now merely ask a small addition to the appropriation then made to finish the work commenced by him. It is eminently a Democratic measure. I do not propose to discuss it now; but will accept the proposition of the chairman, and hope that the vote will be taken.

Mr. TOOMBS. If this resolution was only for the purpose of getting the Committee on Commerce to report back this bill, and the others of the same class which have been sent to them, there could be no objection to that from any quarter, for they have come to a conclusion on all of them; and that conclusion, I presume, the committee are ready at any time to announce by a report to this body. Upon taking this subject into consideration, with the well-known fact that the revenues of the Government are very much below its ordinary expenditures upon the present basis, the committee, without reference to the question of whether they were generally for or against these improvements, without reference to their previous action or votes on this subject, deemed it inexpedient to appropriate any money to the commencement, at least, of new improvements, and I think the question was reserved as to the necessity of preserving existing works.

So far as I was myself concerned, I did not intend then, and do not intend now, or at any time, to extend, enlarge, or protect any of them. My objections to this system are well known to the Senate and the country. But if, notwithstanding the state of the Treasury, notwithstanding the declaration that has been made again and again by the friends of the internal improvement system in both Houses of Congress for fifteen years, that they would not borrow money for the purpose of carrying on these improvements, if, in spite of all that, they intend to pass the St. Clair flats bill, of course the next thing that will be asked, and, I think, with a very great show of propriety, will be an additional appropriation for the mouth of the Mississippi, for the Ohio, for the St. Mary's, for those five objects which were passed by the last Congress—there were only five, I think—the Patapsco river, St. Clair flats, St. Mary's river, the mouth of the Mississippi, and the Des Moines rapids. The gentlemen of the committee who are usually in favor of these appropriations for what they choose to call national works, considered this an inappropriate time, for the want of money. I say this is inaugurating a new system; it is inaugurating a system never claimed anywhere, never claimed by the friends of it. It is an undeniable fact, which every Senator knows, that there is no money in the Treasury to appropriate to internal improvements—there is hardly enough to pay the ordinary expenses of the Government which you are voting every day, and intend to vote.

This movement presents to the country a new question: whether or not it is sound policy that we shall borrow money and go in debt for the purpose of making internal improvements in the United States. That is the question the Senate are called upon to meet for the first time. Hitherto when these appropriations have been sustained in both Houses of Congress, it has been upon the declaration that there was a surplus in the Treasury; that it was advantageous to put it out; and that, when the Treasury was full, it was right and expedient to use it for the purpose of increasing the commercial facilities of the United States; but the policy of borrowing money for such purposes has been disavowed by all parties at all times, as far as the observations of any public man in either House ever met my attention. But now we are called upon to violate that principle, and go one step further. I think it is likely they will go there, for when public men are on a wrong road there is no stopping them. Smooth is the descent and easy the way to political corruption, as well as to hell, according to the poet's account. I think it very likely that these were pretexts merely, used when we had money; and when we have not money, no doubt they will put out bonds to tens of millions or hundreds of millions, because it is a scheme of a great political party in this country always to expend the public money.

Mr. HUNTER. I rise for the purpose of moving to postpone all prior orders for the purpose of taking up the Indian appropriation bill. The hour of one o'clock has arrived, and I submit the motion to postpone all prior orders and take up that appropriation bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope the Senate will come to a vote on my resolution without further discussion.

Mr. HUNTER. If I thought there would be a vote without discussion, I should not be in the way; but we know there will not be.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am prepared to discuss this question, and desire to do so when the bill comes before the Senate; but I do not wish to do so now.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not wish to discuss it, but I desire to make a single remark in response to what has fallen from the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. Toombs,] before the vote is taken—not by way of discussion. I wish simply to observe—

Mr. BIGLER. I want to make a very few remarks.

Mr. HUNTER. It had better go over until to-morrow.

Mr. CHANDLER. Why not postpone the discussion until the bill comes before the Senate?

Mr. FESSENDEN. For the sake of having the vote taken, I will omit any remarks, even the single one I desired to make, if Senators on the other side will forbear.

Mr. BIGLER. I can make the remark I desire in a minute. The simple principle on which I act—

Mr. HUNTER. I must insist on my motion.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I only yielded on condition that there was to be no debate.

Mr. BIGLER. I yield.

Mr. HUNTER. I submit my motion to take up the Indian appropriation bill.

The motion was not agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 18, noes 21.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, to strike out of the resolution the words "and that the appropriation be reduced to $55,000."

Mr. BIGGS. As I understand, according to the rules of the Senate, the hour of one having arrived, the special order comes up, which supersedes this business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of one having arrived, the Senate cannot continue the consideration of this subject any longer, unless by order of the Senate.

Mr. PUGH. I move to postpone the prior orders, to continue this subject. Let us come to some conclusion upon it.

Mr. HUNTER. I shall vote against that, for we shall be certain to have a debate.

Mr. SLIDELL. I will renew the motion that has been made to lay this resolution on the table.

The Senate is now fuller than it was when that motion was made before. I call for the yeas and nays on my motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and, being taken, resulted—yeas 20, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Bright, Brown, Clay, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Green, Hammond, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Mason, Sebastian, Slidell, and Toombs—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Broderick, Chandler, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Douglas, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Jones, Kennedy, King, Polk, Pugh, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Trumbull, and Wade—25.

So the motion to lay on the table was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that the hour of one o'clock having arrived, the consideration of this resolution cannot be continued, unless by a vote of the Senate directing it to be proceeded with.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the special order be postponed.

Mr. PUGH. I submitted that motion before.

Mr. CLAY. I believe the special order is the bill to repeal the fishing bounties.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the first. There are several others, however.

Mr. CLAY. I hope that will be taken up.

Mr. PUGH. I am in favor of the bill to repeal the fishing bounties, and I expect to vote for it; but I wish to say one or two words in support of my suggestion that we had better dispose of this question at present. I voted first to lay this resolution on the table, supposing it disrespectful to the Committee on Commerce, and I do not now like its phraseology. The usual phraseology of such resolutions, is to discharge the committee from the consideration of the bill, and not to instruct them to report it; but since the chairman of the committee, and others of its members, have notified the Senate that they have come to a conclusion adverse to the bill, I see no disrespect to them in having the bill brought back by a vote of the Senate discharging the committee.

Whether I shall vote for the bill or not, is more than I am yet advised. I did vote for a former bill for this object, and I voted for it on a very distinct statement from the Senators from Michigan, that that was sufficient to complete the work. When it was alleged on the other side, I recollect very particularly, by the Senator from Alabama, that it would not complete the work, it was asserted that it would. I was instructed by the Legislature of my State to vote for the appropriation by name, and having no constitutional difficulties on the question, I obeyed the instruction without hesitation. If the Senator from Michigan will modify his resolution, so as simply to discharge the committee from the further consideration of the bill, I shall vote for it; and when the bill comes before the Senate, if he can satisfy me that this additional sum of money ought to be appropriated, I shall probably vote for his bill.

It is suggested that we are to practice economy. Since when? Since last Friday, when you appropriated, as extra pay to clerks and reporters, more money, I believe, than is mentioned in the bill.

Mr. TOOMBS. Eighty thousand dollars.

Mr. PUGH. This new fit of economy has come since Friday evening. I see no proposition to reduce the enormous extravagance of the Army or of the Navy, nor of anything else. We can even borrow money to carry on the Indian appropriation bill that the Senator from Virginia wishes to bring before us. Now, sir, I am for economy; but I do not like all this economy to be practiced in one place. The most enormous expenses of this Government to-day are its Army and its Navy; and I do not see the weight of a feather laid to stop them. On the contrary, I see by the papers that we are to have new ships built—I do not know how many; we are to go on. When the Treasury was full, I believe but five improvement bills were passed. When the Treasury is empty, none are to pass! Now, I believe that, to a limited extent—not to a universal extent—it is as much the duty of this Government to protect its commerce between the States as it is to take care of the Indians; and if you cannot do it without borrowing money, borrow it. That is my position.

Mr. POLK. The question now is on postponing the special order, I believe.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes, sir, to postpone the special order and continue this subject.

Mr. POLK. I shall oppose that, though I am very willing and anxious that we should have an investigation of the merits of the appropriation asked for the completion of the improvement of the St. Clair flats; but I do not like the shape in which the resolution offered by the Senator from Michigan stands. Though I voted against laying the resolution on the table, I did it with considerable reluctance; because, with the Senator from Ohio, I do not like the shape in which it is put. But I wish an opportunity to have this matter investigated before the Senate—saying at the same time, with the Senator from Ohio, that I desire to obtain the information which can be furnished, and which it is alleged has been in part laid before the committee. I, for one, would not, in the present condition of the Treasury, be willing to vote money for any internal improvements, as such; but if a work has been commenced, which has progressed to a point where a few thousand dollars would save the destruction of a large amount already expended, and result in great benefit to the country, I think it is the dictate of good economy and prudence to make the appropriation, and not let all that has been spent go to waste, and then suffer under the inconvenience to which the commerce of the country has been subjected for years. I hope we shall go on with the special order, and at the proper time we shall take up the resolution of the Senator from Michigan, modify it so that it may go before the committee without any disparagement of the committee, and yet in such a way that the question may be fairly brought before the Senate.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I desire simply to say a word in explanation of my present position on this question. I have, myself, introduced several bills for the improvement of rivers and harbors, which I should be most anxious to see passed; which I should support very earnestly were it not for the condition of the Treasury. We came to examine this subject in the Committee on Commerce, which is not a Committee of Ways and Means—we have no committee precisely answering to the proper Committee of Ways and Means which ought to exist, in my opinion, in our legislative bodies, and which compares the appropriations with the resources of the Government; but we make appropriations through different committees, and then the Committee on Finance finds itself embarrassed by the condition of the Treasury, in many instances rendering it impossible for them, and the Secretary of the Treasury has also told us rendering it impossible for him, to carry out the votes we order, without regard at all to the condition of the Treasury.

Now, we have, at this session, already passed a bill for the issuing of twenty millions of Treasury notes. It is a prevailing impression that a public loan will be required. It cannot be expected that any of those internal improvements which will require vast appropriations, can be continued in that state of the public Treasury. I therefore agreed in the Committee on Commerce to go to this extent: that the committee would, in consequence of this condition of the Treasury, refrain from recommending the prosecution of any works of internal improvements at the present session; but at the same time it is the understanding of the committee that, in all cases where small appropriations would secure work already done, and would really result in economy to the Government, we should make exceptions. Now, this particular work may come within that class of cases; it may be one of those cases; it may be one of those works which a small appropriation would perfect, and which it would be true economy, therefore, to complete at the present time. I do not know the precise condition of the present work. If it be such a work, I should be prepared to vote for it. We intended to obtain the necessary information at the War Department, and report a bill, according to my understanding of what occurred in committee, to preserve and complete such improvements as would go to destruction if the work on them was not continued, but to refrain from all appropriations for the commencement of new works, or the prosecution of works which would not suffer by delay.

That is my position on the subject. I have not changed my opinion as to the duty of the nation in regard to the improvement of harbors and the great navigable streams of the country; but I must have regard, in my votes on this subject, to the condition of the Treasury. I think that condition is such at present as makes it our duty to refrain from large appropriations.

Mr. CHANDLER. I think it can be shown in a very few moments, when the bill comes up, that this is precisely one of those for which the Senator from Louisiana will vote. It is a small appropriation to complete a great work. I hope the special order will be postponed, and that we shall be allowed to come to a vote on this resolution without further discussion.

Mr. PUGH. I will state to the Senator from Michigan, that if the Senator from Louisiana has truly stated the position of the committee that they intend to report such a bill as he has stated, we had better let this resolution lie over, and wait till we have their bill before us.

Mr. BIGLER. The Senator from Louisiana has made precisely the explanation which I desired to have made on this subject. We did decide in committee that we would make no appropriations in favor of new improvements, that it was bad policy to borrow money for the purpose of improving rivers and harbors, but at the same time the exception was distinctly made as to repairs, and as to works where a small sum might be necessary to complete them, in order to protect such works against serious and rapid dilapidation. I acted on that understanding.

Now, sir, the objection which I have to the resolution of the Senator from Michigan is this: take as correct all that he says, this is a single item in a class which it may be proper to protect, a class of repairs or improvements which it may be necessary to make, and in reference to which, as I understand it, the committee have not fully decided. That, I suppose, we shall take up and consider properly. If the Senator's resolution were general to get the sense of the Senate on the question of appropriations for repairs or such improvements as have been so far advanced that a very small sum would complete them and protect them against dilapidation, I should feel that no fair objection could be made to such a resolution, and I am satisfied the committee would act upon it promptly, and if the Senator's improvement of the St. Clair flats were in that class it would be fairly considered; but I do think it a very unusual proposition to select out a single item, and instruct the committee positively as to that item, and say they shall report just so much money, and just such a bill. It is very true the Senate has a perfect right to do so, and the committee would undoubtedly obey, but I suggest that the declaration of a general policy would be better and more conclusive.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have voted for this proposition of the Senator from Michigan, on the single ground that I wished to have some test taken on the question whether the Senate designed to do anything even with regard to protecting improvements that need protection. As a general principle, I should agree with the Committee on Commerce that if the country is in the state that is represented with reference to money, it would be improper to borrow money for the purpose of undertaking new works of this description. But I must say to the honorable Senator from Georgia, [Mr. TOOMBS,] that as yet we have no evidence, that I am aware of, that there is any such condition of the Treasury or of the country. That is to say, if we take the statements of the distinguished gentleman from the State of Georgia, who is at the head of the Treasury Department, and of the President—and as yet we have had nothing from either, contradictory of their statements—they told us at the beginning of the session that there was a temporary necessity for issuing Treasury notes to a limited amount, to meet the incoming revenues of the Government, which would be sufficient in a very short time to relieve the country from all its difficulties. We have, as yet, heard nothing from those high authorities to the contrary, and I suppose we are bound to presume, as no further communication has been made to us, that they told the truth, and that there is to be such an accruing revenue as will meet all the necessary wants of the Government, and relieve the country from the burden which it has taken upon itself by the proposition to borrow twenty millions of money. I presume that the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance agrees in that, because, as yet, we have heard nothing further from the Committee on Finance on that subject. Therefore, I say, the presumption stands that there is money enough, that the revenue will be abundant, that soon these twenty millions will be redeemed, and that we shall have enough, according to the statement of the President and the Secretary of the Treasury, to meet all our wants in every particular, as well these as any others. Hence, while I should agree with the general principle laid down by the gentlemen of the Committee on Commerce in reference to this matter; I think we have no evidence at present that the necessity of appealing to that principle, exists.

It is stated by members of the committee that they have designed to do something with reference to protecting those works which need protection, to go as far as is absolutely necessary; presuming that the funds of the country would not allow them to go further. I would ask if we have any evidence except their say so—and to that I give the same credit which I would to the declaration of any other gentlemen—that even that is intended? Congress has now been in session some five months, and we have heard nothing from that committee on any of these propositions. We have resolved to adjourn on the first Monday of June; but we have not heard one word from that committee, or the committee in the other House, proposing to do anything in regard to making an appropriation even to prevent these works from going to decay. If they really mean anything, or have meant anything of this description, I should like to know why something has not been done, at any rate, in season to give us a little hope that something of that description might be accomplished in the course of this session of Congress? We have had no bill brought in. Numerous bills have been sent to the committee. We have not heard from the first one; and yet we are now arrived at a period of the session when it would be hopeless to take up a general bill of that description with the expectation of passing it through both Houses, unless there is prevalent here a spirit very different from what has prevailed heretofore—certainly a very different spirit from that exhibited by the Senator from Georgia, who says, what we all well know, that he is opposed to the whole system, and will oppose the whole with all the power he can bring to bear on it, and we all know what power he can bring to bear on any subject he chooses to engage in.

I confess that when I hear the declaration of which I have spoken, I regard it in this light: while the committee will assent for the sake of appearances to bring in a bill making this provision, we shall not see that bill until the time has so far gone that there will not be the slightest hope in the world of effecting anything even in regard to protecting those public works which need protection in order to prevent their going to decay. Therefore, I have voted for this proposition on this single idea: that I wish, for the benefit of that committee, to have the sense of the Senate tested whether the Senate will do anything in relation to the matter, whether they will make even small appropriations to prevent public works from being utterly destroyed. This is as good a proposition in my judgment, to test that question on, as any other. I believe the work now proposed to be provided for to be a very important one. I was satisfied of that when the first bill for this improvement was introduced by the late Senator from Michigan, who is now at the head of the Department of State. I voted for it then; I should vote for it now, and if the state of facts is as represented by the Senator from Michigan, we shall know it when the bill is brought in, and the sense of the Senate is to be tested. Notwithstanding we have heard many a time that it is a corrupt mode of legislation to put together in one bill works of a similar description for the sake of carrying them through, I should prefer to have them put together in order that no particular selfishness should be exhibited when we came to vote on one or another, and that gentlemen should show what they intended in reference to the whole. However, as that cannot be done, and as at any rate it is well that the feeling of the Senate should be tested, I hope we shall act on this resolution in the mode proposed.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I wish to offer a substitute for the resolution of the Senator from Michigan, which I think will cover the proposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first motion is to postpone the prior orders.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Let my amendment be read for information.

The Clerk read it, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert:

That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into and report, as speedily as possible, on the expediency of appropriations at this session, for the repairs and security of works heretofore commenced for the improvement of harbors and navigable rivers.

Mr. STUART. This subject, it was understood by me, and I believe by the Senate generally, was to be voted upon without any discussion; but some debate has sprung up, and I rise now, not for the purpose of extending it, but for the purpose of submitting a very few words, which seem to me to be pertinent to the consideration of this question as it now stands.

Mr. HUNTER. Would it not be better to take the vote on postponing the prior orders?

Mr. STUART. It seems to me not. I have inquired, and found that this bill was referred to the Committee on Commerce on the 16th of February; that was some two months and a half ago, time enough, I think, for the committee to have ascertained whether this is a case which falls within their rule, and to have been prepared to report. I agree myself most distinctly with the general proposition at which the committee state they have arrived—that the appropriations should not be, as a general rule, for the commencement of new works, but of sufficient amounts to preserve and complete those which it is true and proper economy to preserve and complete. But, sir, there should be action. The subject has been before the committee for a long time. They have not presented, as the Senator from Maine [Mr. Fessenden] has said, a single one of those bills back to the Senate. Now, I do not conceive that it is disrespectful to the committee, in any degree, to instruct them at any time to report a bill. The report of a bill does not pass it; and it does not assume that the Senate will pass it. It assumes simply that the Senate desires to have the subject before them, so that they may act upon it, and decide it.

There is great force in what was submitted by the Senator from Maine, that if anything is to be done on this question at all practically, the time has arrived certainly when it is necessary to do it. We are within a month of the end of the session. We have spent five months. Various of these measures have been sent to the committee, and none of them have been returned. This question of improving the St. Clair flats is as well understood by every member of the Senate now as any possible subject of legislation can be. It has been before Congress and the country for years. The bill was passed at the last Congress over the veto of the President of the United States by a two-third majority. The whole country is advised upon it, and it is a simple question, now, of whether you will appropriate a small amount of money to complete a great work, a work of great national importance in a naval and military point of view, as well as in a commercial point of view, the whole discussion of which has been exhausted years ago.

Now, sir, will the Senate have this subject before them or not? That is the question presented by this resolution. I cannot agree to the substitute proposed by the honorable Senator from Louisiana, because that is merely to go over the same subject again, and take another five months to examine these questions. Now, I suppose the committee have examined them. I am not willing to believe that five months of the session have transpired, and the committee have not examined any one of these questions.

Mr. HAMLIN. I say, not one.

Mr. CLAY. You speak for yourself, I suppose?

Mr. HAMLIN. I say, as a committee, not one; and I have been present at every meeting.

Mr. STUART. The Senator from Maine is a member of the committee, and, of course, knows more about it than I do; but for the purposes of this vote, I submit that whether the committee has examined this question or not, is a matter of no consequence practically. If the committee has not examined it, the session is near at an end, and the Senate should examine it. If the committee has examined it, and has not reported, there is no reason why it should not report. Now, I would not agree to give any vote in the Senate which could censure the committee, which could impugn its motives, or could affect any member of the committee—not at all; but the business of the country is to be acted upon by the Congress of the country, and to act upon it we must have it before us. I say, therefore, sir, that the single question presented to the Senate to-day is not whether you will pass this bill, but whether you will bring the bill before you. I am for having it brought here; I am for having the sense of the Senate upon it.

I am glad to perceive that the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. Iverson,] and other Senators, acknowledge that the resolution, at least in its present form, modified as it has been by the suggestion of the Senator from Alabama, who is chairman of the committee, presents simply the question of whether the Senate desire this bill brought before them; and fixing the amount of appropriation to be put in it, certainly does not censure the committee; because, as the bill now stands, this measure would reduce the appropriation about one half. It is no reflection possibly on the committee to instruct them to report a bill with the appropriation reduced one half.

It does, then, Mr. President, come to this question when you have done: will the Senate do anything at all in regard to these works of great national consequence? That is really the question. I hope that there will be no difficulty whatever in regard to the respect for the committee which I am sure every member of the Senate feels—certainly I do—but that we shall vote upon this question upon the point of whether we will do anything. If, when the bill is brought before the Senate, it shall not appear to the body that it is one of those works which ought to be appropriated for at this session, upon principles of strict economy and national importance, let it be voted down. I think it is clearly and distinctly one of those cases; but certainly let us bring it in a condition where we can vote upon it.

Mr. CLAY. I wish simply to say a word in reply to what has been said by way of complaint that the committee has not reported on these bills. These reports have been delayed, in the first instance, for want of information from the Departments on which to act; and after that information was obtained, by, I believe, the unanimous voice of the committee, the consideration of these bills was deferred from week to week for other business because of the present condition of the Treasury, it being, as I understood, the unanimous sense of the committee that it was inexpedient to make appropriations for new works. Some of the committee, perhaps a majority, were in favor of appropriations for the repair of old works to prevent their decay and destruction. Like the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. Toombs,] I do not feel that I am committed myself, even to those works. As I understand the action of the committee, it was that they would only consider such works. Now, I do not regard this as one even of that class. During the last Congress some two hundred thousand dollars or upwards—I forget the precise amount, but I believe it was upwards of two hundred thousand dollars—was appropriated to this very work; and we were then assured by both the Senators from Michigan that it would complete the work.

Mr. CHANDLER. Only $50,000 was appropriated.

Mr. CLAY. Well, it matters not whether the amount was $50,000 or $200,000. We were assured by both Senators at that time that it would complete the work. According to my recollection, as suggested by the Senator from Ohio, I asked whether this would be sufficient to complete the work, and intimated that they would come here shortly afterwards and ask for a further appropriation; but this was denied, and we were assured it would complete it. Now they ask more than they said would complete the work. Now they ask $55,000, and the Senator from Michigan says $50,000 is all that was appropriated, and all that was wanted; at the last Congress we were assured it was an amount fully sufficient to do all they desired.

Mr. CHANDLER. When this subject comes up for discussion regularly, I shall be able to give a good and sufficient reason for the work not being completed with the first appropriation. I did not propose to enter into a discussion at this time, and therefore I have said nothing about that; but when the bill comes up, I shall be prepared to explain the whole circumstances connected with the matter.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think I can say truly, that up to the time the Committee on Commerce acted on these matters, there was no unnecessary delay; I agree with the chairman in that. He has stated one reason; the committee waited for information from the Departments; but there was still another reason, and I think a stronger reason than the one he has stated. Propositions were coming in from all sections for appropriations, and the committee deemed it unwise to act on a particular bill, or any particular class of bills, until all the propositions should be before it; and there was, therefore, a necessity for delay to get the information, and to get all the propositions before us so that we could act understandingly. I therefore agree with the chairman fully, that there was no unnecessary delay up to that point. I supposed, from the action of the committee at that time, the chairman was to have made his report to the Senate, and then we should have had the bills all back here.

The action of the committee I did not object to; but as I have stated before, (though not in my place, appropriately,) the committee, as a committee, have not examined a single subject of this class before them. I do not mean to say the chairman has not made himself acquainted with every question; I do not know; but we have never had any action in committee on them, except one morning, and then they were disposed of in gross and on one vote, and I made my objection then that I was in favor of taking them up and acting upon them in detail, leaving me to vote for such as I thought I ought to vote for, and against such as I thought I ought not to vote for.

This resolution, I think, ought not to be objectionable to the committee now, as it is simply a direction to report the bill back again with no recommendation from the committee, favorable or unfavorable, but simply to report the bill back, and let the Senate do what they please, and we should get rid of it much sooner by voting than by discussing it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on postponing all prior orders for the purpose of continuing the subject under consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. STUART. I understood that was a modification of the resolution by my colleague himself, who offered it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But it is offered as an amendment, and requires the action of the Senate. The amendment is to strike out:

"And that the appropriation be reduced to $55,000."

So that the resolution will read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to report the bill, heretofore referred to them, making an appropriation for the completion of the channel over the St. Clair flats, in the State of Michigan.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I now offer my amendment, to strike out all after the word "Resolved," and insert:

That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into and report as speedily as possible on the expediency of appropriations at this session for the repairs and security of the works heretofore commenced for the improvement of harbors and navigable rivers.

Mr. PUGH. I am satisfied with that amendment. It seems to me to be fair. I shall vote for it in preference to the original resolution. I ask for the yeas and nays on it.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 23, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Bright, Brown, Clay, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Green, Hammond, Houston, Hunter, Iversen, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Sliedell, and Toombs—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Broderick, Chandler, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Jones, Kennedy, King, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Trumbull, and Wade—22.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire to give notice that on to-morrow, or some subsequent day, I shall ask leave to introduce a bill making an appropriation of $55,000 for the improvement of the channel over the St. Clair flats.

Mr. PUGH. The question is on the resolution as amended, is it not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, sir.

The resolution, as amended, was adopted.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HUNTER. I now move to postpone all prior orders for the purpose of taking up the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that there is one other State here waiting for admission into the Union; and I have been watching for an opportunity to bring up her bill. I allude to Oregon. The bill has been reported for some time; and I think, as Kansas and Minnesota have gone through the Senate, it is but fair now to take up the Oregon bill and dispose of it. I do not think it will take more than a few minutes; I shall ask, if the motion of the Senator from Virginia does not prevail, that we proceed to the consideration of the bill for the admission of Oregon into the Union.

Mr. CLAY. The next special order, I think, is the bill to repeal the fishing bounties.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the first special order.

Mr. CLAY. I am willing to yield to an appropriation bill, as those bills are indispensable; but I will yield to nothing else. I am induced to yield for another reason: neither of the Senators from Massachusetts is in his seat, and one of them [Mr. Wilson] sent me word that he desired to be present when my bill was taken up, and necessarily would be absent two or three days on account of sickness in his family. I am willing to let it lie over on that account, until to-morrow; but I hope that it will be taken up in its regular order at one o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. HAMLIN. Does the Senator from Alabama mean to take it up to-morrow if the Senator from Massachusetts does not return?

Mr. CLAY. At any rate, then, I shall ask to have it taken up, as he certainly will have time to be heard on it. With the general understanding that it shall come up in order to-morrow at one o'clock, I will give way to the appropriation bill.

Mr. DOUGLAS. There can be no such understanding.

Mr. HUNTER. If we intend to adjourn on the day we have fixed, it is indispensable to give priority to the appropriation bills. I think this one will not detain the Senate long. It is merely the regular Indian bill, making appropriations according to law. I hope it will be taken up.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I really hope that we shall proceed with business in its regular order. The fishing bounties bill has been standing on the Calendar for a considerable length of time, and I understand the gentleman who reported the bill is prepared to go on with its consideration at present. If that is to be waived, and these motions to intervene, here comes forward another Senator, who proposes to admit Oregon into the Union as a State. When we see that, is it not better for us to proceed in regular order and take up the business at it stands on the Calendar, and dispose of it?

I can see no great necessity for pressing the Indian appropriation bill at this time. All the appropriation bills will go through. They have a sufficient weight and influence always to take them through. I do not think the country will suffer a great deal by the delay of a few days in the passage of the appropriation bills; I do not think the Treasury will suffer by that; and I doubt very much whether we shall hear any complaints throughout the country in consequence of approriation bills not being pressed through in such hot haste. I am willing to give gentlemen all the aid I can to take up bills in their proper order.

I wish to say, in this connection, that if I understand the Calendar aright, the homestead bill comes up next after the fishing bounties bill. The friends of that measure have been here quietly, patiently—or perhaps I ought to say impatiently—waiting for a considerable length of time to have that bill reached. I am in hopes that business will go on in its proper order, and that that bill will be taken up and disposed of. The gentleman from Alabama is now ready, and I understand the Senator from Maine is ready, to go into the consideration of the first special order. Why not take it up, and let the Indian appropriation come up in its proper place, and be disposed of in due time? Let us take up first the fishing bounty bill, which is the first special order; next, the homestead bill, and dispose of it as we reach it. I am inclined to think that the great mass of the American people are as deeply interested in the proper distribution of the public lands, particularly when the proposition is to provide homes for the people, as in the appropriation of thousands and millions out of the Treasury, especially when the condition of the Treasury is, to say the least, not at all plethoric. I hope we shall go on with business in its proper order. I do not intend to be importunate; I do not intend to be obtrusive on the Senate; but I have the homestead bill, as I know many others have, deeply at heart, and I intend to press it earnestly on the consideration of the Senate from this time until it shall be disposed of.

Mr. HUNTER. I call the attention of the Senator from Tennessee to the fact that, if the appropriation bills are to wait until all the special orders are disposed of, they will not be taken up until after the day fixed for the adjournment. We have been notified by the President that he will not sign these bills unless he has time to read and examine them. I think, with that notification, it behooves us to, as is generally acknowledged to be proper, take up those bills, and act on them first. At any rate, I must take the sense of the Senate on that proposition.

Mr. BIGGS. The reason assigned by the Senator from Tennessee against the motion of the Senator from Virginia is the strongest reason in the world why I shall vote for the motion of the Senator from Virginia. I cannot but understand the allusion which he makes to the appropriation bills as entirely applicable to the homestead bill, which he has so much at heart; for if there is a measure before Congress that proposes to squander the public treasure in a worse direction than any other, it seems to me it is the favorite projet of the Senator from Tennessee. I think the necessary appropriation bills ought to claim the attention of the Senate in the first place, instead of this measure, new in its character, and so profuse of the public treasure.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. In answer to the gentleman from North Carolina I will say, as I said on a former occasion, that I shall be able to prove that instead of the homestead bill diminishing the receipts into the Treasury, it will have precisely the contrary effect. I pledge him that, if he will unite with the friends of the bill to bring it up, and give it a fair consideration, and pass it, instead of its depleting the Treasury or squandering the public revenue, I shall demonstrate as clearly and conclusively as figures can demonstrate anything, that it will increase the public revenue, and, in fact, it ought to be pressed on the country, at this time, as a revenue measure, calculated, when carried into full and successful operation, to increase the resources of the nation.

Now, sir, I understand the remark of the President in his message, which has been alluded to, to be general; that he will not sign any bill which is passed at a later period than two days prior to the close of the session. Then, it is just as important to have the homestead bill passed two days before the close of the session as any other bill, if we expect the signature of the President, and of that I have no doubt. When the bill is passed, I have no doubt it will be signed by the President. I feel satisfied that the public mind is made up in reference to the measure. I think the sense of the community is very decided upon the subject. If the Senate will now reflect the sense of the country, as it has been reflected on various occasions by the other House, this bill will soon become the law of the land. I hope we shall proceed with business in regular order. But if we are not to do so, I shall press this measure earnestly on the consideration of the Senate from day to day, till the close of the session.

Mr. BIGGS. The Senator from Tennessee assumes that the homestead bill, the favorite of his, is to pass through both branches of Congress, and is to be approved by the President. Now, I do not profess to know anything about the opinion of the President on this particular measure; but for the purpose of excluding a conclusion, I desire to say that if I understand the position of the President of the United States in regard to squandering the public lands, this is the last measure to which he will ever consent to give his approbation; but I trust that it will be strangled in the two Houses of Congress, as it ought to be. If, however, it should pass through both Houses, I entertain a confident hope that the President of the United States will exercise his constitutional power of vetoing such a measure.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I am in hopes that the President of the United States will have a fair opportunity to approve or disapprove of this measure; and I trust we shall not resort to strategy and legislative maneuver to strangle an important bill like this, which is to provide homes for the people. Sir, the measure has already been strangled twice. It passed the popular branch of Congress twice by overwhelming majorities, and it was sent to this body, and here it was strangled. Let us have fair, full, explicit action of the Senate upon the measure, and if the two Houses pass it, let the President have an unincumbered opportunity to approve or disapprove it. I predict now that the President of the United States, when the bill is presented to him, will not withhold his signature.

Mr. STUART. I am very sorry that the discussion is so long in regard to the measure that we shall take up; but inasmuch as it has been so generally indulged in, I beg leave to say that I am most emphatically in favor of reaching the measure which has been brought forward by the Senator from Tennessee. It was made the special order a long time ago, and ought to have been acted upon, and would have been acted upon but for the extended controversy about Kansas. That subject is out of the way temporarily, and I hope we shall come to the consideration of the bill of the Senator from Tennessee. It is undoubtedly true that if you allow the appropriation bills to be brought up at any moment, and at all moments, they will be used as a broad-ax to cut down every other measure. If Senators were ready to proceed with the fishing bounties bill, I should be in favor of taking up that subject, and ending it by taking the vote of the Senate upon the bill; but inasmuch as they are not, I am in favor now of taking up the homestead bill, and ending that; and if Senators are disposed to vote, and not to discuss it at any considerable length, as I think the whole country understands it, we can vote upon it to-day. If, however, Senators are disposed to debate it to the extent of their power, then it ought to come up; it should not be killed by time. I hope the Senate will vote against postponing the special order; and inasmuch as the fishing bounty question is not ready for action, and the homestead bill is ready, let us take up the latter; and therefore I ask for the yeas and nays on this question.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope we shall have the vote. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on postponing the prior orders, and taking up the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. SEWARD. What is the first special order that is to be postponed?

Mr. CLAY. The bill to repeal the fishing bounties.

Mr. WADE. Is the next the homestead bill?

Mr. KING. That is it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There are several special orders. I do not recollect which is next in order.

Mr. SEWARD. The next I understand to be the homestead bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair so understands.

Mr. SLIDELL. I wish to state that there was a special order on the Calendar after the bill of the Senator from Tennessee, in relation to the District of Columbia banks, prohibiting them from issuing bank-notes, and I shall feel it to be my duty to press that bill on the consideration of the Senate. I understand from the chairman of the Committee on Finance that the Indian appropriation bill is of an ordinary character, and not likely to lead to any discussion. Under these circumstances I shall vote with him. I regret that the Senator from Alabama should not have pressed the consideration of his bill to-day. I am told that the Indian bill will not lead to any lengthy discussion. I shall, therefore, now vote for the postponement of prior orders; but hereafter I shall act in concert with my friends from Tennessee and Alabama, in insisting on the regular order of business as it is upon the Calendar.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. In connection with what the Senator from Louisiana has said, I desire to remark that if it is understood that we shall afterwards take up the Calendar and go on with business in regular order, I am willing to consent, if it is more agreeable to the Senate, to take up the Indian bill first, as it is only to occupy a short time.

Mr. HUNTER. All I can say is, that I cannot pledge myself not to move for the consideration of the appropriation bills when they are ready. The Senate, of course, will determine by a majority.

Mr. KING. The yeas and nays having been called, and the object of this vote being to determine whether we shall take up the homestead bill, I shall vote against the postponement simply with a view to take up the homestead bill. I desire to see whether the appropriation bills are constantly to postpone the special orders. Unless that bill can be taken up at a reasonably early day of those now remaining to us, it will be lost. We have notice that it is to be "strangled" in the two Houses. As a test question, whether we are to get it up in good faith and have a vote on it, I shall vote against postponing the special orders, with the understanding that it is to come up.

Mr. CLAY. No, the fishing bounties bill comes up first.

Mr. KING. I understand the fishing bounties bill, on account of the absence of some Senators, will not be taken up. I shall vote to postpone.

Mr. CLAY. I shall ask the Senate to proceed with that bill, if the postponement be not agreed to, unless the Senate choose to postpone it for the absent Senator who desires to be here.

Mr. KING. Let the Senate decide.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 24, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Brown, Clay, Crittenden, Dixon, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Foster, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Harlan, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Kennedy, Mason, Polk, Sebastian, and Sidel—24.
NAYS—Messrs. Broderick, Chandler, Doolittle, Durkee, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Pugh, Seward, Stuart, Trumbull, and Wade—11.

So the motion of Mr. HUNTER was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 5) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1859.

Mr. HUNTER. I will state that this is the regular bill to carry out treaties—all according to law. The Committee on Finance offer no amendments to it.

Mr. SIMMONS. How much is the amount appropriated?

Mr. HUNTER. Between twelve and thirteen hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. BIGGS. Has the bill been read?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Only by its title.

Mr. BIGGS. I desire to hear it all.

The Secretary read the bill at length.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I trust that this bill will not be suffered to pass without some examination and understanding of it. I admit that I have not been able to look carefully into the bill at all; my attention had not been turned to it until it was called up to-day; but it is a bill appropriating, as I understood from the chairman of the Committee on Finance, over a million dollars; and I understood him also to say that it was merely to carry out the law, and that it was a bill about which there could be no controversy. At this time, when our expenses have run up to almost a hundred millions a year, and we are borrowing the money to pay them, and when, as has been intimated in the Senate to-day, in addition to the $20,000,000 which we have borrowed during the present session, a new loan bill is soon to be before us, I am not willing to take these bills by the wholesale without an examination, and I think if we look into them we shall very likely find that there is as great abuse in the Indian department, as in the other departments of the Government. We know that the expenses for the Army and the Navy have run up enormously, and that officers have been making contracts without authority of law, involving the Government to the extent of hundreds of thousands and millions of dollars. On the second page of this bill, I find this item:

"For the pay of the several Indian sub-agents, per act of 31st July, 1854, $10,500."

I have before me that act; it is an appropriation bill, containing, however, some general legislation; but I do not find that that act created any obligation upon the Government to pay $10,500 to sub-agents. I also find in the sixth section of that act, a provision authorizing the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint certain Indian agents (six in all) at salaries, as provided in the next section, of $1,500 each. There is the creation of an office, intended I suppose to be a permanent office, which the President is authorized to appoint, and it would be the duty of subsequent Congresses to provide for the payment of the salary of that officer; but there is no provision in the act of the 31st of July, 1854, creating the office of sub-agent as a permanent office at all. If you will look to that act you will find that there is an appropriation "for the pay of four Indian sub-agents in Oregon Territory, at an annual salary of $1,000 each," and another clause "for the pay of two Indian sub-agents in Washington Territory, for six months, ending June 30th, 1854, $1,000." These appropriations were made to pay I suppose for some specific service performed at that time, but I ask the Chairman of the Finance Committee if it was the intention of Congress to create six permanent offices of Indian sub-agents, by simply making an appropriation to pay for a few of them for that single year? That is the way our expenses are swelled up. Owing perhaps to some extraordinary service which was required that year in Washington and in Oregon Territories, sub-agents were employed, and the Congress of the United States thought proper to make an appropriation to pay them for that year; but was that intended to be the creation of a permanent office?

This bill says, "for the pay of the several sub-agents per act of 31st July, 1854." Now, I should like the chairman of the Committee on Finance to show me what provision in the act of 1854 authorized the permanent establishment of sub-agents, or created such an office. It is very easy to see how our expenses are swelled by this sort of legislation. If Congress, for some reason, appropriates money one year for a specific purpose, has it come to this, that Congress, for all future time, must appropriate the same amount of money for that purpose, and does the appropriation of money at one session of Congress make it obligatory on all subsequent Congresses to appropriate the same thing? Is it to carry out any provision of law when we make the next appropriation? If Congress, this year, appropriates a million dollars to build a dome on this Capitol, does that impose an obligation to appropriate a million next year? If it pays two sub-agents in Oregon, for six months service, $1,000 in 1854, does that impose any obligation in 1858 to employ sub-agents and pay them? I think the distinction is very clear in this act of July 31, 1854, between a permanent officer and one employed for a temporary purpose. There is no foundation in the act, as I understand and construe it, for an appropriation of $10,500 for the payment of sub-agents, because no such officers are created by the act.

There are numerous other items in this bill, which may be founded upon estimates, but they are not founded upon laws. Here is one:

"For presents to Indians, $5,000."

That may be very proper; I do not know but that it is; but is there any law requiring it? Again:

"For provisions for Indians, $11,800."

This does not appear to be by virtue of any act of Congress. I find on the third page an item of $30,000—for what?

"For insurance, transportation, and necessary expenses of delivery of annuities, goods, and provisions, to the Indian tribes in Minnesota, Michigan, and Wisconsin."

Now, for aught I know, it may have cost that; but it looks to me like a very large sum to appropriate $30,000 as a payment for insurance, transportation, and necessary expenses of delivering the annuities to the Indians in Michigan, Wisconsin, and Minnesota. I doubt not that the chairman of the committee has looked into this matter, and I hope he will be able to give the Senate some information in regard to it. Here is another item:

"Contingencies of the Indian department, $36,500."

I am not prepared now to go through with this bill. I only instance these items to show its character, and I should like to know, and I call upon the committee having these bills in charge, to know if there is no way to reduce these expenses. Are we to go on forever making the same appropriations, merely because a former Congress has done it? I hope not. I voted for appropriations at the last Congress which I would not vote for now; and I hope the fact that my vote was cast for appropriations then is not to be given now as a reason why I should vote for similar appropriations. The circumstances are different. Then the Treasury was full. It is a great evil to have the money of the country hoarded up by the Government. I was anxious to deplete the Treasury, and voted larger sums than I should be willing to vote at another time when we have to borrow money in order to meet the appropriations.

Without undertaking to discuss this bill at all, having called attention to these few items, I trust the bill will not be pressed to-day; but that it will be laid aside after the Senate shall have proceeded so far as it may be deemed advisable to do to-day, and leave the matter open, that it may be examined into more carefully, and let us act upon it to-morrow.

Mr. HUNTER. If the Senator chooses to insist on laying the bill over, and the Senate is disposed to indulge him, I am sure I can have no objection; but if he requires time for this bill, I do not know how much he will want for the others that are to come up; for, in truth, nearly the whole of it is to carry out treaty stipulations, and is in pursuance of law.

In regard to the appropriation for the Indian sub-agents, there are a few such appropriations. The same necessity exists for sub-agents now as heretofore. The sub-agents are distributed as follows: three for the tribes in California, four for the tribes in Oregon Territory, two for the tribes in Washington Territory. They have been established not by regular law, saying there shall be so many, but from 1854 up to this time we have appropriated for that number, and we have appropriated the sum which is now asked. I see no objection to that. The same reason which existed then exists now. We have as many Indians to take care of—as many in the very Territories for which these sub-agents were appointed.

Next, as to the provisions: he will find that that is provided for by law. There is a discretion given to the President by the law of 1834, I think it is, in regard to furnishing rations and provisions to the Indians when they come to the posts. This, I believe, is the usual appropriation. So of contingencies. It is impossible that we can provide by law what shall be the appropriation for contingencies. We give this year what we gave last year. It is true that, in the recapitulation, the Secretary says he asks $2,000 more this year than he did last year; but when the Committee on Finance came to examine the estimate for the last year, they found the estimate the same then as now. Probably, as it has just occurred to me, we may have cut down the estimate $2,000 last year; but the estimate is the same this year as last—$36,500 for contingencies. The Senator will find, when he comes to examine the bill, that the greater part of it is simply to carry out treaty stipulations; that, in regard to these items, they are appropriations which have been repeated from year to year by Congress, not because there was a standing law establishing so many officers, but because the necessity which existed when the appropriation was first made has continued to exist since that time.

But, sir, if any Senator says he desires time to look into an appropriation bill numbering as many pages as this, I feel that I cannot press it. I only know that by laying it over until to-morrow, we shall come into conflict with those gentlemen who have special orders, and we shall have another fight to get it up. If they are willing it shall be laid over, I am. If the Senator chooses to move to postpone it, and make it the special order for to-morrow at one o'clock, to take precedence of all others, I shall not oppose that proposition; but I think if there is any bill that is likely to be presented here this year which would not require a very close scrutiny, this is the one. There is a supplemental bill coming up from the House to which the Senator might well direct his attention, but here I think he will see nothing to object to after he has made his examination.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to make an inquiry in regard to the appropriation for these sub-agents—whether there is any evidence that such officers are required other than simply the estimate of the Department for them? The Senate will bear in mind, and also the chairman of the Committee on Finance, that the officer making this estimate is not the one who has particular charge of the Indian department. It may be that these sub-agents are required; but it certainly is a very objectionable mode of legislation, that we are to create officers in this way by simply appropriating money one year to pay them for some extraordinary service. I am not prepared to agree to that appropriation of $10,500. It may be said that it is a small sum, not worth caviling about; but it is the principle I am after. I wish to know whether there is any evidence that this is needed as a permanent office? If so, let us create it; and not simply, by appropriating money, pay for an officer that does not exist by law.

Mr. HUNTER. In 1854 we created three sub-agents for California, four for the tribes in Oregon Territory, and two for the tribes of Washington Territory. These were created upon the suggestion of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior, that they were necessary. They have estimated for them as being necessary ever since, and that is as good a reason for repeating the appropriation from year to year as if there were a permanent law. It is, perhaps, better that such offices as these should be provided for in this way than by a permanent law, because they may not always be wanted—changes take place in the Indian tribes. You may now dispense with one here, and another one may be wanted there. Probably the best mode of providing for them is merely from year to year, as has been done in regard to those ever since 1854. I can give no better reason than that. It is satisfactory to my mind, and has been to the Senate for the last three or four years.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, and read the third time.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I wish to record my vote against the passage of the bill; and I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 26, nays 9; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Bell, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Bright, Brown, Clay, Collamer, Crittenden, Evans, Fessenden, Fitzpatrick, Hammond, Houston, Hunter, Iversen, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, Mason, Polk, Sebastian, and Shidell—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Broderick, Durkee, Foot, Foster, Harlan, King, Pugh, Trumbull, and Wade—9.

So the bill was passed.

HUNGARIAN SETTLERS IN IOWA.

Mr. HARLAN. The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 300) for the relief of the Hungarian settlers upon certain tracts of land in Iowa, hitherto reserved from sale by order of the President, dated January 22, 1855, have directed me to report it without amendment. This is a bill which requires immediate action, if anything is to be done. The case is simply this: some time since Congress authorized the President to withhold a township of land from sale, for the benefit of certain Hungarian refugees; this land has been occupied by the poorer portion of these reserves; but recently it has been ordered into market and is to be sold on the 17th of this month. This bill provides for their relief merely by giving them the liberty to file preemption claims as other settlers. I ask that the bill may be considered at once.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I shall object to the present consideration of the bill. I agreed, as far as I was concerned, that the gentleman should have leave to report it, but I cannot consent to its passage.

Mr. JONES. I hope my friend from Arkansas will withdraw his objection. I ask the Chair, however, whether a single objection has the effect to pass the bill over?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MASON.) Yes, sir, as the bill has just been reported.

Mr. JONES. The lands are to come into market, and unless the bill be passed very soon, it will be of no use to these settlers.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I agreed that the bill might be reported, with the understanding that I was not to be asked to support it. I know nothing of the bill. I think, as a member of the Committee on Public Lands, I ought to know what it is.

Mr. JONES. It came from your committee.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I believe only three members of the committee know anything about it.

Mr. HARLAN. I will say—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Discussion is out of order. The bill goes over, objection being made.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On the motion of Mr. FITZPATRICK, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, May 3, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

The Journal of Friday was read and approved.

CHANGE OF HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. GARTRELL. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That on and after Wednesday next, the House will meet daily at the hour of eleven o'clock, a. m.

Mr. CRAIGIE, of North Carolina. I object.

Mr. GARTRELL. I move that the rules be suspended in order that the resolution may be introduced.

The House was divided; and there were—ayes 73, noes 32.

Mr. CLEMENS. There is no quorum voting, and I therefore demand tellers.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 94, nays 39, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Anderson, Andrews, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Billingshurf, Bingham, Bliss, Boyce, Brayton, Buffinton, Burns, Case, John B. Clark, Clawson, Clemens, John Cochrane, Comins, Curtis, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dewart, Dowdell, Edmundson, English, Foley, Foster, Gartrell, Giddings, Gilmer, Goodwin, Granger, Greenwood, Gregg, Hickman, Howard, Hughes, Jackson, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Lamar, Lawrence, Leach, Leiter, Letcher, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Mason, Morgan, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Niblack, Palmer, Pettit, Peyton, Phelps, Pike, Reilly, Ricaud, Ritchie, Royce, Russell, Seales, Scott, Seward, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Shorter, Samuel A. Smith, Stillworth, Stephens, William Stewart, George Taylor, Tompkins, Tripp, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Watkins, White, Wilson, Woodson, Wortendyke, and Augustus R. Wright—94.

NAYS—Messrs. Adrain, Bennett, Blair, Branch, Bryan, Burlingame, Ezra Clark, Horace F. Clark, Clay, Clingman, Coffay, Burton Craigie, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Dean, Dodd, Grow, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Hatch, Hawkins, Horton, Houston, Kelly, Leidy, McQueen, Maynard, Nichols, Parker, Ready, Reagan, Rufin, Aaron Shaw, Singleton, Tappan, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Winslow, and Zollicoffer—39.

So the rules were suspended, two thirds having voted in favor thereof.

Pending the above call,

Mr. BUFFINTON stated that his colleague, Mr. DAWES, had paired off with Mr. QUITMAN, of Mississippi, until Friday next; and that his colleague, Mr. GOOCH, had paired off with Mr. BONHAM, of South Carolina, for one week from Wednesday next.

Mr. COBB said that he was not within the bar when his name was called. He was detained at the Departments with business of his constituents. If he had been here he would have voted in the affirmative.

Mr. FLORENCE stated that he had paired off with Mr. WALDRON, of Michigan, until Wednesday next.

Mr. GARTRELL demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and, under the operation thereof, the resolution was agreed to.

SESSIONS OF JUDICIARY COMMITTEE.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to ask permission of the House that the committee may hold its sessions during the sessions of the House. The committee have been meeting almost every morning the entire session. We have many witnesses before us, and we could hardly get through their examination in the morning hours heretofore allowed us. One hour being now taken away by the resolution just adopted, it will be impossible to complete our examination of witnesses unless the House give us permission to sit during its sessions.

No objection being made, leave was granted.

TERRITORIAL BUSINESS.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I wish to give notice to the House that to-morrow, after the expiration of the morning hour, I shall move to proceed to the business upon the Speaker's table, with a view to take up the bill for the admission of Minnesota into the Union.

I also ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the usual resolution setting apart two days for the consideration of territorial business.

Mr. GROW. I ask the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] to allow the Minnesota bill to go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and be made the special order from day to day until disposed of.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. That can be done to-morrow, if the House is disposed to do it.

Mr. GROW. A single objection will prevent it then.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I desire to put the bill immediately upon its passage.

The resolution of Mr. STEPHENS was then read; as follows:

Resolved, That Wednesday and Thursday of next week, the 12th and 13th instant, be, and the same are hereby, set apart for the consideration of territorial business.

Mr. CRAIGIE, of North Carolina. I object.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I move to suspend the rules.

Mr. GROW. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection.

The rules were suspended—two thirds voting in favor thereof.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I now offer the resolution, and call the previous question upon it.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and, under the operation thereof, the resolution was adopted.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SELECT COMMITTEE ON KANSAS AFFAIRS.

Mr. BILLINGHURST obtained the floor.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I hope the gentleman from Wisconsin will allow me to make one further motion. I ask the unanimous consent of the House—and I suppose there will be no objection now—to make a report from the committee of fifteen upon Kansas matters—that it, together with the views of the minority of the same committee, may be printed and go upon the Journal.

Mr. MORGAN. I object.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I hope there will be no objection. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] left with me the views of the minority upon his side of the House to present to the House. I hope there will be no objection. Those gentlemen of the committee who acted with me are in favor of it.

Mr. SEWARD. I object to debate; but do not object to the report being made.

The SPEAKER. Objection is not withdrawn.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of House bill No. 248—a bill for the relief of certain settlers upon the public lands in the State of Wisconsin, and that said bill be considered at this time.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Let the bill be read, that we may know what it is.

The bill was read in extenso.

Mr. CRAIG, of North Carolina, objected to the introduction of the resolution.

Mr. BILLINGHURST moved to suspend the rules.

[A message was here received from the Senate, by Mr. DICKINS, their Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had receded from their amendments, disagreed to by this House, to the bill entitled "An act to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1858."]

Mr. BILLINGHURST. If the House will read the report in this case, I think there will be no objection.

Mr. CRAIG, of North Carolina. I object to debate.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. I demand tellers on the motion to suspend the rules.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BUFFINTON, and CRAIG of North Carolina, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 75, noes 49.

So (two thirds not voting in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

SALES OF PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. GROW. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer a joint resolution, to which I presume there will be no objection.

The joint resolution was read for information. It directs that none of the public lands belonging to the United States shall be exposed to public sale, under proclamation of the President, until the same shall have been surveyed and the return thereof filed in the Land Office for the period of ten years.

Mr. CLEMENS. I object.

Mr. GROW. I move to suspend the rules; and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if his purpose is to prevent a settler buying his farm.

Mr. GROW. This resolution leaves the pre-emption laws exactly as they are. It does not interfere with them. They can prove the pre-emption and get their title any time within the ten years. It merely prevents public sales by proclamation of the President.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 74, nays 78; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Andrews, Bennett, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Case, Ezra Clark, Horace F. Clark, Clawson, Colfax, Comins, Cox, Cragin, James Craig, Burton Craig, Curtis, Dainrell, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Foster, Giddings, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Robert H. Hall, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Hickman, Hoar, Horton, Howard, George W. Jones, Kellogg, Kelly, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Leach, Lovejoy, Mason, Morgan, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Ricard, Ritchie, Royce, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Spinner, William Stewart, Tappan, George Taylor, Wade, Walbridge, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, and Israel Washburn—74.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bocoock, Boyce, Branch, Bryan, Burnett, Burns, Caruthers, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Crawford, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Dewart, Dowdell, Edmundson, English, Foley, Garnett, Gartrell, Gillis, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Lawrence W. Hall, Hawkins, Houston, Hughes, Jackson, Jewett, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Lawrence Leidy, Leiter, Letcher, McQueen, Humphrey Marshall, Maynard, Mill, Niblack, Nichols, Peyton, Phelps, Powell, Ready, Reagan, Reilly, Rufin, Russell, Sandidge, Savage, Scales, Seaward, Shorter, Sickles, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, Trippie, Underwood, Watkins, White, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, John V. Wright, and Zolliecoffer—78.

So (two thirds not voting in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

Pending the vote.

Mr. FLORENCE stated that he had paired off with Mr. WALDRON on political questions, and felt a delicacy in voting on this question.

Mr. NICHOLS stated that he was in favor of free trade in lands, and would vote "no."

Mr. FLORENCE stated that his colleagues, Messrs. PHILLIPS and EDIE, had paired off together, and that Mr. LANDY had paired off with another gentleman.

Mr. HOARD stated that Mr. THAYER had paired off with Mr. KEITT.

Mr. CLAWSON stated that Messrs. MOTT and LANDY had paired off together, and Messrs. ROBINS and HUYLER.

Mr. HOPKINS stated that Mr. MURRAY had paired off with his colleague, Mr. CORNING.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. DAVIDSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as truly enrolled:

An act (H. R. No. 306) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th June, 1858;

Joint resolution providing for the payment of certain expenses of holding the United States courts in the Territory of Utah;

An act (S. No. 36) to provide for the issuing, service, and return, of original and final process in the circuit and district courts of the United States in certain cases;

An act (S. No. 76) to incorporate Gonzaga College, in the city of Washington, and District of Columbia;

An act (S. No. 97) to incorporate the Benevolent Christian Association of Washington city;

An act (S. No. 111) to alter the times of holding the circuit and district courts of the United States for the district of Vermont; and

An act (S. No. 161) for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. LETCHER. I ask my friend to withdraw his motion, to allow me to submit a resolution, to which I think there will be no objection.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I withdraw it for that purpose.

DEBATE IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE.

Mr. LETCHER. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That debate in Committee of the Whole during the sessions held in daylight be confined to the bill under consideration, and that evening sessions shall be held when a majority of the committee shall desire it, for the purpose of general debate, but not for the transaction of any other business.

Mr. GROW. I have no objection to the last part of the resolution; but I object to the first part of it.

Mr. LETCHER. Then I move to suspend the rules.

Mr. BLISS. I demand the yeas and nays upon that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I would suggest to the gentleman from Virginia that the first part of the resolution is unnecessary.

Mr. LETCHER. Why, I have offered the resolution at the request of gentlemen upon the other side of the House, who suggested evening sessions.

Mr. GROW. We have no objection to that; but we object to the proposed plan of cutting off general discussion.

Mr. LETCHER. In daylight?

Mr. GROW. Yes.

Mr. LETCHER. Does the gentleman expect to adjourn on the 7th of June? If so, why does he want to occupy the daylight sessions in extraneous debate?

Mr. GIDDINGS. I presume he does not.

Mr. GROW. I am opposed to changing the rules of the House.

Mr. LETCHER. Then, if we have the requisite number, we will suspend the rules; and, if not, I shall have fulfilled my duty to those who requested me to submit the resolution.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. LETCHER. That is exactly the resolution which was adopted last session.

Mr. GROW. I think not.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 91, nays 57; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Anderson, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bocoock, Boyce, Branch, Bryan, Burnett, Burns, Caruthers, John B. Clark, Clawson, Clay, Clemens, Cobb, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Cox, James Craig, Crawford, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Dewart, Dowdell, Edmundson, English, Foley, Garnett, Gartrell, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Lawrence W. Hall, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hawkins, Hickman, Howard, Hughes, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kelly, Lawrence, Letcher, McKibbin, McQueen, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Maynard, Miller, Isaac N. Morris, Niblack, Nichols, Peyton, Phelps, Powell, Reagan, Reilly, Rufin, Russell, Sandidge, Scales, Seaward, Aaron Shaw, Shorter, Sickles, Singleton, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Underwood, Elihu B. Washburne, Watkins, White, Winslow, Woodson, Wortendyke, John V. Wright, and Zolliecoffer—91.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Case, Ezra Clark, Colfax, Comins, Cragin, Curtis, Dainrell, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Iowa, Dean, Dodd, Foster, Giddings, Gilmer, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Robert H. Hall, Horton, Kellogg, Kelsey, Knapp, Leach, Leidy, Leiter, Lovejoy, Morgan, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Ricard, Ritchie, Royce, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Spinner, Tompkins, Wade, Walbridge, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Israel Washburn, and Wilson—57.

So (two thirds not voting in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate by Mr. ASBURY DICKINS, its Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

An act (S. No. 286) to enlarge the Detroit and Saginaw land districts in Michigan; and

An act (S. No. 296) amendatory of an act entitled "An act to establish two additional land districts in the Territory of Minnesota," approved 8th July, 1856.

Also, that the Senate had passed a bill of the House for the relief of Captain James Mac McIntosh, of the United States Navy.

EVENING SESSIONS.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That during the present week it shall be in order each day for the Committee of the Whole to take a recess until seven o'clock, p. m., after which hour general debate may be indulged in, provided that no vote shall be taken at such evening sessions, except on motions that the committee rise and that the House adjourn.

Mr. BURNETT. I object to that resolution, if nobody else does.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I propose to strike out the words "the present week," and insert "during the remainder of the session."

Mr. SICKLES. Oh, no; that will make it still more objectionable.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee. I rise to a question of order. I wish to inquire whether it is not in order for the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to take a recess at any time without the necessity of any such resolution?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is a very doubtful question.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee. I think that that has been the practice of the committee heretofore.

The SPEAKER. Sometimes it has, but at other times the practice has been different.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move to suspend the rules to enable me to offer the resolution.

Mr. GROW. Has my colleague modified his resolution so as to make it apply to the rest of the session?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I propose to do it, but I understand that there is objection.

Mr. GROW. We have no objection to evening sessions.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I object.

The House divided on the motion to suspend the rules; and there were—ayes 89, noes 15; no quorum voting.

Mr. BUFFINTON demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I withdraw the resolution, and move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. FLORENCE. Will my colleague give way to let me introduce a resolution?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I am sorry I cannot oblige my colleague.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I hope we shall not go into committee. I have a memorial here from citizens of Washington in regard to the election riots, and have been trying to get it in for months.

Mr. CLINGMAN. The gentleman can present it under the rules, and have it referred to any committee he desires.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Give me a select committee; that is all I want.

BUSINESS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. GOODE. I wish to ask the House to set apart two days for the transaction of business of the District of Columbia; and I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to allow me to submit a resolution for that purpose.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I would do it with a great deal of pleasure, but I feel that I am bound to insist upon going into the Committee of the Whole, to take up the public business. If the House do not choose to do so, they can vote down my motion.

Mr. GOODE. This House is the only Legislature this District has, and if the House will not set apart some time for its business, it will have no legislation at all.

Mr. CLINGMAN. What days does the gentleman propose to set apart?

Mr. GOODE. Monday and Tuesday, the 24th and 25th of this month.

Mr. SEWARD. I shall object to every special order. Let us have the committees called regularly for reports.

Mr. FLORENCE. Do I understand that my colleague will not allow me to introduce a bill? I appeal to his sympathy and to the sympathy of the House. I am exceedingly unwell, and I desire that this bill shall be referred to a committee. I ask it as a personal favor.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I have a bill which I desire very much to introduce.

Mr. RUSSELL. And I another.

Mr. FLORENCE. Let us, then, have a morning hour.

Mr. CLINGMAN. The gentleman can introduce his bill to-morrow.

Mr. FLORENCE. The committee to which I wish to refer it meets to-morrow morning.

The House divided on Mr. J. GLANCY JONES's motion; and there were—ayes 74, noes 57.

So the motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. BURNETT in the chair.

PENSION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN stated the business first in order to be the consideration of House bill No. 259, granting pensions to the officers and soldiers of the war with Great Britain of 1812, and those engaged in Indian wars during that period; on which Mr. SAVAGE was entitled to the floor.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I raise the point of order which I raised in the former session of the committee—that the appropriation bills take precedence of the pension bill announced by the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules that point of order.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I wish to make my motion. I move to take up the appropriation bill No. 201, and I make my point of order on that. I am desirous of testing the sense of the House on this question. The House understands the reason why I make the motion.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I submit to the Chair this question. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to proceed with the bill which was under consideration in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union before the pension bill, that bill will take precedence now that the special order has expired.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order for this reason: it is true that the appropriation bill to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania refers was under consideration in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union before the bill now pending. The House fixed certain days for the consideration of the bill. The time expired, but the House, by a subsequent resolution, determined to extend the discussion on this bill three hours. The discussion on this bill has been closed. The resolution further provides that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union shall then read the bill by sections, and proceed to vote. The Chair does not know of any instance in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union where the committee has laid aside a bill under such a state of facts, and taken up another bill.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I do not know that there is another case exactly like this in the history of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. As I stated before, I do not want to discuss the point, but I appeal from the decision of the Chair, so as to get at the sense of the committee.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I ask for tellers.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I desire to call the attention of the committee to what is embraced and involved in the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. CLINGMAN. If this is not debatable I object to the gentleman from Maine debating it. I should like to speak on it myself, if it is open to debate.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I understand that this matter is open to debate. Debate is not limited, and it is in order to discuss any question in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order except unanimous consent is given.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. The ruling of the Chair is a direct revolution of the whole practice of the House in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. J. GLANCY JONES] makes the point of order that the bill No. 259 is not the first business in order in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that the special order having expired, it is in order to move to take up any other bill that is pending, and moves to take up one of the appropriation bills, No. 201, which was under consideration in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, before the special order was taken up. The Chair overrules the point of order for the reasons given when the question was presented when the House was last in committee. The House had fixed the 22d, 23d, and 24th of April for the discussion of this pension bill. The time for discussion has expired; but the House, by a subsequent resolution, determined to extend the debate for three hours. A resolution was passed that debate should be closed in three hours after the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union should have resumed its consideration, and that then the bill should be read through by sections, and that the committee should proceed to vote upon it. The Chair holds that the time fixed for the closing of debate having expired, it is not in order now to take up any other business till the order of the House in regard to bill No. 259 shall have been executed.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Can a majority of the House make a special order?

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. CLINGMAN, and WASHBURN of Maine, were appointed.

Mr. SICKLES. I desire to ask the Chair whether the same question was not disposed of the last time we were in committee?

The CHAIRMAN. It was decided, and the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. SICKLES. Was not the appeal taken on the same point?

The CHAIRMAN. It was.

Mr. SICKLES. No business has intervened since.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. It was not the same question.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 39, noes 84.

So the decision of the Chair was reversed.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I now move to take up House bill No. 201, being the bill making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th June, 1859.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the pending amendment.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Page 7, lines one hundred and thirty-eight and one hundred and thirty-nine, strike out the words "the draughtsmen and clerks employed upon the land maps."

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. Before the House

proceeds to the consideration of that amendment, I desire to modify an amendment I offered the other day, when this bill was under consideration. In the amendment adopted by the committee for the compensation of the reporters of the House, I desire to have the words "the present session of Congress" stricken out, and the words "for the second session of the Thirty-Fifth Congress" inserted. This is an appropriation bill for the next fiscal year, and I desire to have this amendment apply to the next session of Congress, and not to the present, as the amendment now stands.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I desire to ask the Chair a question. What becomes of the old soldiers' bill? I would like to know.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman had paid attention to the proceedings of the committee he would have known. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIDSON. I only wanted the reporters to know that I asked the question. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. When the bill was under consideration last, in Committee of the Whole, the gentleman from Ohio offered an amendment making an appropriation for the compensation of the reporters for the present session of Congress. He now proposes to modify that amendment as he has stated.

Mr. REAGAN. That amendment has been voted upon and disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is any objection, the modification cannot be made.

Mr. SEWARD. The amendment was adopted, and cannot now be changed.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. The gentleman from Georgia does not understand the matter. The Clerk drew up the amendment I offered, and made the appropriation apply to the present session of this Congress, when it ought to apply to the next session.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. When the committee was last in session upon this bill, an amendment was offered by the gentleman from Ohio to provide for the compensation of the reporters of this House. I objected to that amendment, and voted against it. The committee, however, voted it in by a decided majority. I understand the gentleman from Ohio now merely asks to correct a verbal inaccuracy. I know it is not in order to go back, but I have no objection to a correction of the phraseology of the proposition which does not alter it in any particular.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia objects.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Then I ask to have the pending amendment reported.

Mr. SEWARD. I do not desire to be understood as objecting.

Mr. REAGAN. I renew the objection.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The pending bill to which this amendment was offered, is the annual appropriation bill for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1859—the next fiscal year. Now, I objected to the amendment at the time it was offered; but the committee voted it in by a decisive majority. The amendment has this verbal inaccuracy about it: that, while the bill is for the expenses of the next fiscal year, the amendment applies to the present fiscal year.

Either the amendment ought to be stricken out, or this inaccuracy ought to be corrected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is well aware of the fact that the committee cannot go back to take up matter that has been passed upon, except by general consent. Objection being made, the Chair has directed the Clerk to report the pending amendment.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Debate on this bill has not yet been closed.

The CHAIRMAN. It has not been.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The amendment has no verbal inaccuracy about it. It is just as it was intended at the time it was offered; and why is it that it is now necessary to change it, and make it apply to the next session? It is because your deficiency bill, signed by the Speaker, and just announced to the House as enrolled, appropriated this same $800 to each reporter for the present session of Congress. It is therefore necessary, in order not to give them two extras for this session, to make this apply to the next session, which will come in the fiscal year for which this bill, now before the committee, is intended to make appropriations. That is the reason. If it remains as it is, of course the House will, when the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union reports back this amendment, vote it down, as you have already made the appropriation for their extra for this present session.

Mr. NICHOLS. Is this bill open to general discussion now?

The CHAIRMAN. It is, so soon as the pending amendment is reported.

Mr. NICHOLS. But is it not open for general discussion on this amendment, as well as on all the other sections of the bill? I understand the general debate is not closed yet.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

Mr. NICHOLS. Then I understand it is open to debate, not only with regard to this amendment, but to all the provisions of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. NICHOLS. In that view I propose to discuss it.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I hope my colleague will give me leave to give notice that when this bill shall be reported to the House, I will offer the amendment that I have suggested.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending amendment to the bill is to strike out, in lines one hundred and thirty-eight and one hundred and thirty-nine, the following words:

"The draughtsmen and clerks employed on the land maps."

So that the bill, if amended, will read:

For the compensation of clerks to committees, and temporary clerks in the office of the Clerk of the House of Representatives, $25,000.

Mr. COBB. Will the gentleman from Ohio permit me to have that amendment modified?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is entitled to the floor.

Mr. NICHOLS. In the deficiency bill just passed, and which has probably by this time received the signature of the President, the extra compensation to the reporters of the Globe for this year is provided for. My colleague now desires that a provision of the same character shall be made for the payment of the reporters for the next year, in this bill; as it has been for the various appropriation bills in the years past.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether I may be able to get the floor again; but I wish to say now, in correction of many things that were said in regard to this appropriation, that, several years ago, when the question of advancing the salaries of the employees of the House was mooted in Congress, the gentlemen who then comprised this corps, eight in number, asked to enjoy the same advantages, inasmuch as their services were less easily dispensed with than those of any of the employees of the House. The reporters asked to have the advantage of the gratuities which the House and Senate were voting to their employees from time to time. On their petition an investigation was had; and a former member of Congress from the State of Missouri, (Mr. Hall,) made a report to the House. That report stated the fact that these men were in the employment of a private citizen; and in order that the fluctuations of political parties in this House might have no effect on the debates, or govern them in the least, and to insure their faithful services, recommended that the House should give them this reward for faithful services. I expect that my friend from Tennessee will recollect the incident, and the time also, when this appropriation commenced. From that day to this, this amount has been awarded to them. Now, whether the item is provided in this bill or not I do not know, nor do I care; but it has been the custom of the House to provide for it in the regular appropriation bills. It is provided for this session in the deficiency bill; and the question simply arises, whether we should provide for it now in the appropriation bill for the coming fiscal year, or whether we should wait and put it into another deficiency bill next session? That is the question, as I understand it, in regard to this item for the reporters.

But, Mr. Chairman, the bill is under consideration in all its provisions, I desire to give notice now, that under the five-minute rule I shall propose to reduce the amount appropriated from line one hundred and ninety-two to line one hundred and ninety-five, for the compensation of the Secretary of State, the assistant Secretary of State, clerks, messengers, assistant messengers, and laborers in the office, $3,600. This, Mr. Chairman, may appear to be an insignificant reduction, and if the $3,600 by which I propose to reduce the amount, were all to be affected by it, I should not take the trouble of moving the amendment. Now, Mr. Chairman, there is in the Department of State, a division called the bureau of statistics. It was created by an act approved August, 1856. The third section of the act creating the bureau, is as follows:

"And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of State be, and he hereby is, authorized and required to appoint one clerk, who shall have charge of the statistics in the said Department, and shall be called Superintendent of Statistics, and shall receive a salary of $2,000 per annum, and shall be allowed, as an assistant, one clerk of the third class, which clerk the Secretary of State is hereby authorized to appoint."

In order that my motion may not be mistaken about this matter, I wanted to bring it to the attention of the House, that the House may either change the system or abolish the office under the present system.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio if he has any doubt as to the fact of every dollar of appropriation inserted in this bill being in accordance with law?

Mr. NICHOLS. I have not, sir.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Does the gentleman propose to repeal the law, or to make it void by striking out the appropriations for offices created by law? I wish to understand if that is the point.

Mr. NICHOLS. I understand that every section of the bill is open to discussion. I propose at the proper time to offer the amendment which I have indicated. I have a right to travel over the ground occupied by this bill, and to dispute, if I see proper to do so, the necessity of all its appropriations. The general debate, as I understand it, is not closed, and if gentlemen will hear me for ten minutes, that is all the time I will consume. I have indicated the purpose for which I rose, and I desire to state the reasons which have animated me in this motion. And I frankly say, Mr. Chairman, that I make these observations more for the sake of bringing the matter to the attention of the House, and of the proper committees of the House, so that the office, if unnecessary, may be abolished, than of any permanent effect on the bill itself.

Now, sir, I have put in writing my reasons for the motion I have made, and I proceed to read them:

My attention was first called to this subject by the difficulty experienced by the Committee on Printing in deciding how to print the "Annual Report on Foreign Commerce from the State Department, for 1856." The gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN], then chairman of the Committee on Commerce, had introduced a resolution, which was adopted, that it should be printed in quarto. A reconsideration was carried on my motion on the last night of the session; but the Committee on Printing found itself, subsequently, forced, by the character of the work and the magnitude of the tabular statements, to accede to the expensive quarto form. Well, the printing of this volume of about four hundred and fifty pages, cost nearly nine thousand dollars, simply for the regular number of copies, no extra copies being called for, or about three dollars each copy, an extraordinary price, because the work was very difficult to print. At the commencement of the present session the "annual report for 1857" came in and was ordered to be printed, and must, of necessity, be printed in quarto form, and at like expense, as the former. In view of these circumstances I was led to examine the printed report to ascertain its character, and whether the value of its contents was commensurate with the extraordinary expense incurred. With much information of a fixed and standard character, and of great value, I found much more which was ephemeral; and I saw plainly that it must always be the case, that before the commercial information embodied in such a report could be got before the country in this form at the end of a year, it would have lost much, if not all, of its importance. Still, if a small annual document in octavo form could be put forth each year, it might be well to do it; but on the present plan that is impossible.

Within the last four years more than two hundred thousand dollars have been expended in foreign commercial statistics. The printing alone, of the four volumes on commercial relations, cost $170,000. This money has not been wasted—far from it: the result of the expenditure does credit to the country, and always will; but to prolong it, especially in the present condition of the Treasury, would not only be prodigal, but needless. It will be many years before any considerable expenditure for this object will again be required. Annual statements on this subject of foreign commerce, in an expensive form, are needless. Changes in commercial regulations, in all countries, are of almost daily occurrence. It is only digests of statements for series of years, and deductions drawn from the comparisons, that are of value to warrant the vast expense of the collection, preparation, and publication of such matter—the most expensive of all matter. The last report on foreign commercial relations, prior to the large work just completed, was made by Mr. Webster in 1842—sixteen years ago; and, since the Government was founded, there have been only three such reports, the first being made by Mr. Jefferson in 1793.

It was proposed to make this bureau of statistics a collector of mercantile facts, of mercantile laws, and mercantile changes—a detailed statement of the foreign commerce of the country, from time to time, and strictly adapted to the wants of the country. It was proposed to follow the system now adopted in France, by their Chamber of Commerce there, under which they gathered up the details of the commerce of the country and of the world, and published them in the shape of tracts for monthly issue among the bankers, merchants, and business men of the country. But that system was not carried out. When Mr. Marcy left the office, he left it with a work which had been collected under his administration of the office, which, as I humbly conceive, does credit to him as the head, and to those under him in the Department who prepared the work. I allude, sir, to the Commercial Relations. But how is it now with the annual report? They gather up statistics and figures during the year, and they are submitted to Congress, and are ordered to be printed, and the result is, that by the time the whole matter has reached the country the status has changed, and the tables are not reliable; by the time the document meets the public eye its facts, figures, and conclusions are but so much dead matter.

Now, sir, the expense annually incurred on this useless system has been the subject of investigation and remark at the State Department, and so convinced was the former head of the bureau of statistics of the utter inutilty of the concern, that he recommended to the head of the State Department that the office, in its present condition, was no longer necessary. I apprehend, sir, that the gentlemen of the Ways and Means Committee, who have charge of this matter, can apply the pruning knife to the useless expenditures at the State Department, if they will make inquiry into the facts. They will find, I think, that the resignation of the former superintendent of the bureau of statistics was accepted upon the express declaration of the present Secretary of State, that, in his view, the office was no longer necessary, and ought to be abolished. And yet, in these estimates from the State Department, we find that the salaries of these officers are provided for. I do not know whether the movement for the abrogation of this system should originate in the Committee of Ways and Means or in the Committee of Commerce, or in some other committee; but if the system must be continued at all, let us at least change it.

Mr. WINSLOW. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that the subject is now under consideration in a bill before the Committee on the Library.

Mr. NICHOLS. I am glad to hear it. I have been led to make these remarks from the investigation I have made into the subject from my connection with the printing of the work—nothing more and nothing less. But whilst I say this, sir, I do not pretend to say that, under a proper system, under proper management, this bureau might be made the means of the greatest practical utility and good to the country. If you adopt the English or French system, and report at brief periods such information as is of value to the business of the country, depend upon it, this bureau will amount to something.

I cannot take my seat without paying a just tribute to the late Mr. Marcy and Mr. Flagg, who had charge of the preparations of the volume known as the Commercial Relations. I do not intend that that tribute shall rest upon my word alone. But I want the House to understand the distinction which exists between the report on commercial relations and the annual statistics gathered up and embodied in the annual report from the State Department. The one contains all the commercial laws of the world—the comparative tariffs, the consular returns, and a vast body of information for American merchants, gathered from every avenue of trade in the world, and embodying the experience of years. The other is restricted simply to the port regulations and the changes from day to day in the commercial interests of the world. Thus, for instance, a regulation prevails one month in a country, and the next month it is altered; and the matter of momentary interest thus collected month by month is gathered up and put in the annual report. It is furnished to us as the existing law or commercial regulations of a country, when, in fact, it is dead and useless.

Now, I propose to introduce authorities in reference to this work called Commercial Statistics; or, the Commercial Relations of the United States with all Nations. Sir, I hold in my hand several testimonials from foreign sources—one from the leading commercial paper of England, and another from the department of agriculture and commerce in France.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I wish the gentleman would allow me, before he takes his seat, to say a word. The debate not having been closed, he has a right to discuss any subject, I suppose.

Mr. NICHOLS. No, sir; not any subject.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Well, any subject connected with the appropriations. I merely wish to correct what is, perhaps, an erroneous impression. I would say to the gentleman from Ohio that perhaps I do not differ with him much in regard to the necessity of reform; but I wish to inform the gentleman and the committee that Congress has provided by law for the performance of this duty. It has created these officers. It is a duty incumbent upon the Department to estimate for their salaries. They have only sent to Congress an estimate of the money necessary to carry out its will. I wish to say further that the proper committee has been called upon by the Department to bring about the reform suggested by the Government.

But I wish, if he chooses to have a reform, that he would pursue the proper course; and that is to repeal the law and remedy the evil by striking at the heart of it, and not to raise questions on the appropriation bills, nor to imply a want of disposition on the part of the Committee of Ways and Means to be sufficiently economical. The gentleman knows that it is made the positive duty of the Executive and heads of Departments to submit to Congress estimates for appropriations necessary for the discharge of duties imposed on them by the law. I am with the gentleman perhaps to the fullest extent in his effort to economize our expenditures. I am willing to go for every legitimate reform. But this, sir, is a matter over which the Committee of Ways and Means has no discretionary power. The gentleman has alluded to that committee as the proper committee to inaugurate reforms. The gentleman knows that that committee has no such power. If the Committee of Ways and Means were to come into the House and undertake to refuse to include in the appropriation bills appropriations under law, because they thought the law unwise and inexpedient, the gentleman himself would be the first to rise in his seat and censure the committee for an exercise of undue power. It is not for the Committee of Ways and Means to inquire in regard to the wisdom of the law authorizing an appropriation; but its province is to provide appropriations for the execution of existing laws. If there be any fault, it is with Congress. Congress has made the law, which for its execution requires an appropriation; and if this appropriation is not proper, then let the laws be repealed. It is Congress that directs that the Executive Departments shall execute certain laws; and to do so it is necessary that these appropriations should be made.

Mr. NICHOLS. I would inquire of the gentleman whether the former superintendent did not resign his office under the express declaration that a discharge of the duties of the officer was no longer necessary; and whether, after that, and during this year, a successor was appointed?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I will reply to the gentleman with great pleasure. I have never inquired in reference to that fact. I do not know what induced the gentleman alluded to to resign the office.

Mr. KELLY. I have made some inquiry on this subject, and from the best information I could get, I learn that Mr. Flagg was compelled to resign because there were charges made against him to the effect that he had employed women ostensibly at four dollars a day, and only paid them at two dollars a day, requiring their receipts for four dollars a day. This fact was ascertained by the gentleman who represents the Committee on Commerce of the Senate. When he found that such was the case, he went to the State Department and said that if Mr. Flagg was not turned out of that office he would expose the matter to the country. This was the reason why Mr. Flagg was compelled to resign.

So far as the bureau itself is concerned, every gentleman knows that there is no bureau in the Government that has been so effective in giving the country valuable statistical information. But Mr. Flagg being compelled to resign, now comes to Congress and makes the effort to abolish a bureau which has been of so much benefit to the country.

Mr. NICHOLS. I beg leave to say that, so far as my action here is concerned, Mr. Flagg has nothing to do with it whatever. He has been connected with that bureau, but I have spoken to him hardly half a dozen times. Let me say one thing to the gentleman from New York. Whatever may be the secret reasons which may be urged here, as having caused Mr. Flagg's removal, I can produce a letter from General Cass to him, in which it is stated that his resignation is accepted because the duties before appertaining to the bureau were no longer necessary.

Mr. KELLY. If information on the subject be desired for the House and the country, let a resolution be introduced and passed, calling on the State Department to furnish it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Does the gentleman make a charge against Mr. Flagg?

Mr. KELLY. I do not make any charge. I only give what information I have derived from a source believed by me to be reliable.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. State your source of information?

Mr. KELLY. The State Department itself.

Mr. NICHOLS. I do not want now to go into outside controversy. My effort now is to take a proper view of what the public necessity requires us to do in this matter. And let me say to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means that my object is accomplished in the declaration of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. Winslow,] and the declaration of the gentleman himself. It is nothing to me who fills the office. They are all children of one family; and I am none of them; and I am sure that I have no right to intermeddle with Democratic domestic affairs. [Laughter.] I do not care for the distribution of their Democratic patronage. I do not want it myself, and have no friends who want it; and I do not propose to go into that matter. That was not my object in rising. While I want to get rid of the causes of useless expenditures of the public money, yet, sir, I want to retain upon the statute-book what is worthy of commendation, and what is really for the public good.

I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. J. GLANCY JONES] that I do not find fault with the Committee of Ways and Means. I do not think that I have evinced any such disposition in the remarks which I have made.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. On behalf of the committee, I do not shrink from a scrutiny of the acts of that committee, in the aggregate or individually. My friend will remember that he held out the opinion that it was the duty of that committee to reform these expenditures. I reply to that, that the Committee of Ways and Means have no power to go behind the law. Their duty properly is, to provide appropriations called for by the law.

Mr. NICHOLS. The gentleman has misapprehended me. I have no object to embarrass the gentleman at all; I have only, in my remarks, pointed the Committee of Ways and Means to the places where the expenditures of the Government might be reduced. I did not refer to the Committee of Ways and Means alone; I referred to the committees to which these subjects appropriately belong. I know no reason why estimates based upon a law no longer necessary, or which has expended its force, may not be reviewed in an appropriation bill.

Mr. WINSLOW. With the permission of my friend from Ohio, I will state what I know about this matter. There is a bill before the Committee on the Library providing for the distribution of the public documents now on hand in the library. There are in the State Department a large mass of books and documents, in number about five hundred thousand. The proposition was to provide for the distribution of all these. It was also desirable to remove the copyright books from the State to the Interior Department, and to relieve the Department of that matter not properly appertaining to its duties. I was informed that the necessity of a continuance of the bureau of statistics had ceased. It is proper to say that I had no conference with the head of the State Department, but the information received by me was from Mr. Flagg. I looked into the matter, and certainly came to the conclusion that my friend from Ohio has reached—that the usual annual publication of the commercial statistics was wholly useless, and that the suppression of that bureau would save to the Government some fifteen thousand dollars. The usual reports may still continue, but, in my judgment, ought more properly to be reported to the Treasury Department. If their publication hereafter may be desirable, a digest every five or ten years would be much more useful. I intended, therefore, to insert, by way of amendment to the bill now before the Library Committee, a clause to repeal the law providing for such publication. As I remarked, I had no communication with the Department of State, preferring to wait until the bill was perfected, to submit it to that Department and to the Interior Department for any suggestions they might have to make. I repeat, however, that I entirely agree with my friend from Ohio in his conclusions.

Mr. NICHOLS. I desire to conclude what I have to say. I wish the gentleman from New York to understand that, in reference to anything he may say about troubles in the Democratic camp, which may have led to the removal of any of its children, I desire to enter into no discussion. I have nothing to do with it, then, or the difficulties of this happy family.

Mr. KELLY. I think the gentleman from Ohio is entirely in error. The duty of the statisticians in the State Department is to collate and compile all the reports made by consuls at foreign ports on commercial matters, and everything which pertains to the welfare and benefit of this Government. It is done not only for the benefit of commercial men, but for the benefit of the community generally; and I think the abolition of that particular branch of the Government would be entirely wrong. The whole expense of keeping it up amounts to very little.

I say again that the whole of this matter originated—though I do not attribute it to the gentleman from Ohio—on the part of disappointed gentlemen who had been turned out of office, and in nothing else.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I had some connection, in the last Congress, with this work on commercial relations, to which allusion has been made. I think I introduced the act of August 18, 1856, from the Committee on Commerce, by which this bureau was created. I think that is so; though I have given this matter very little attention during this session of Congress. The House and the country know the result which has flowed from the passage of that act. This work has been printed, and has gone to the country, and its merits have been passed upon, both by Congress and by the country. I think it will be conceded that it is one of the most useful works which has ever been printed by the Government.

I was not aware that it was the intention to keep up, or to establish such a system as is proposed now. I very much doubt the policy of carrying the system any further than it has been carried. Whether the particular mode by which the gentleman from Ohio proposes to reach that end is the best, I do not propose to say. I think it is a subject to which the attention of the members of the House might well be directed, whether the benefits to be derived from a continuance of this system are worth what it will cost to the Government.

But my principal object in asking my friend to yield me the floor was to say a word here in reference to Mr. Flagg. I have had some acquaintance with that gentleman from my connection with this matter during the last Congress, and I am astonished at the charges the gentleman from New York has made here to-day; and I think it is due to Mr. Flagg that the gentleman from New York should state his authority. Those charges go to the country, and reflect severely upon Mr. Flagg.

Mr. KELLY. I have made no charges.

Mr. NICHOLS. I desire to conclude my remarks, but the gentlemen are consuming my time.

Mr. KELLY. I desire to say—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is not in order.

Mr. KELLY. I desire to say this: if the gentleman desires to have this matter investigated, let him introduce a resolution for that purpose.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hardly think it fair for the gentleman from New York to get up here and make charges upon rumor against an honorable man—a man who has held an important position, and has discharged his duties, as I think every gentleman will concede, with signal ability.

Mr. KELLY. I have made no charge, and shall make no charge, against the gentleman.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Will the gentleman state his authority for what he has said?

Mr. NICHOLS. I cannot agree to yield any further. I have something further to say upon this subject myself.

Mr. KELLY. I will say—

Mr. NICHOLS. Inasmuch as I have declined to yield to the gentleman from New York, I must resume the floor from the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. KELLY. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is entitled to the floor.

Mr. NICHOLS. With all these extraneous matters—with the discussion of family differences and difficulties, which have led to the removal of one man and the substitution of another—I have nothing to do, and I desire to have nothing to do with them. Such was not my object in raising this discussion.

I am extremely gratified to hear from the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WINSLOW] that the very subject which has occupied my attention for some time has also occupied the attention of an appropriate committee of the House. I was gratified to hear that he has arrived at the same conclusion that I have arrived at. I do not know who fills this office. It is nothing to me who does. As I said, sir, I am happy to hear the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WINSLOW] say that his committee has arrived at the same conclusion which I wished to indicate when I rose this morning and took the floor. So far as the character of the work, which is the sole and only result of this bureau, is concerned, I only ask that the Clerk read the extracts which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

"The London Athenaeum of February 20, 1858, in noticing volume four of the 'Commercial Relations,' says: 'The highest praise is due to the House of Representatives for publishing this comprehensive and really national report, which brings into one view the entire commercial status of the United States with the entire world.'"

Mr. NICHOLS. And again, sir, I ask the Clerk to read the following:

The Clerk read:

[Translation.]

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,

COMMERCE, AND PUBLIC WORKS,

PARIS, March 25, 1857.

SIR: You did me the honor to transmit to me, on the 7th of this month, a copy of a document on the commercial relations of the United States with foreign countries, entitled 'Commercial Digests.' This document forms the first volume of a publication which is to be composed of three volumes, which has been ordered by the House of Representatives, and is executed under the direction of the Secretary of State by Mr. Edmund Flagg, an officer of the State Department. You call my special attention to this work, which has been suggested, you say, by the Annales du Commerce Extérieur, and, particularly, to the report [letter] at the commencement, in which Mr. Edmund Flagg mentions with praise the publication emanating from the Department of Agriculture and Commerce.

I thank you for having sent me this book, which is particularly interesting to my department. The Minister of France at Washington had already communicated to the Imperial Government the remarkable report [letter] of Mr. Flagg to Mr. Marey; and I had noticed the friendly terms in which it speaks of the Annales du Commerce Extérieur. These commendations acquire a still greater value in presence of the work which you have been pleased to send to me. The volume sums up methodically the relations of the United States with the different foreign countries, as well as the tariffs, and the regulations of customs and of navigation, and the maritime exhibits of those countries. It contains, also, an analysis of all treaties of commerce and navigation contracted by the United States—an analysis which is made on the model of the synopsis of treaties contracted by France, published in the Annales du Commerce Extérieur. It contains, in short, abundant and useful information; and I am happy to recognize in it marked improvement over works of the same character previously published by the American Government. A further improvement will be accomplished when, in accordance with the wish of Mr. Flagg, Congress shall prescribe a continuous, periodical, and practically useful publication, like that which my department has constantly issued for many years.

I should be very much obliged to you if you could procure for the use of the bureau of Foreign Commerce a second copy of the Commercial Digests, and hereafter forward to me, in duplicate, copies of the other volumes as soon as they shall have appeared.

Accept, sir, the assurance of my entire consideration.

ROUHER,

Minister of Agriculture, Commerce, and Public Works.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, one word in reference to the statement made by the gentleman from New York as to the utility of the bureau as at present organized. The gentleman from North Carolina said that his committee, which had given the subject a careful consideration, thought it was unnecessary. I think so too, and I will give my reasons for that opinion. If it be desirable to collect statements of this character, then it is desirable that they shall be collated and analyzed. Here (exhibiting a copy) is a volume of statistics collected under an old law—the law of 1842. Unless you confine this thing to a digest of the results of trade which have been obtained, and which digest shall be given periodically, the collection of statistics amounts to a mere nonentity. Before these mere statistical tables are got out there will have been changes and modifications, and they will then be utterly unreliable. I believe the Government could make a department of the kind useful to the country. I believe that the man who last presided over the State Department had correct ideas on the subject when he proposed a monthly or a semi-monthly report of the results of trade throughout the world. With comprehensive grasp of intellect, that great statesman, in his range of thought and ideas, traversed the whole world; he sought the improvements in the arts, sciences, and the manufactures of all nations—with their commercial changes, and the cause of their growth in commercial prosperity. He sought to make the arts, the sciences, the commercial knowledge, and the prosperity of the globe, subordinate to the interests and prosperity of our own people; but such, sir, is not the ruling spirit of that Department now.

Mr. MAYNARD. I should like to know who is the present head of the bureau?

Mr. NICHOLS. These interruptions have entirely broken the thread of my remarks. I find that I have occupied about enough of the time of the committee with this question. I believe, I will say in conclusion, that there ought to be a good statistical bureau, and that it should be transferred from the State to the Treasury Department, to which it properly belongs. I am sorry that anything I have said may have given occasion for a disturbance in the internal economy of the party of my Democratic friends; and I trust, sir, these gentlemen who have developed the fact that they are not, as might be hoped, a "happy family," will believe me when I say that I had no object in view which would provoke recriminations in any part of this Hall.

Mr. RUFFIN obtained the floor, but yielded to Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. With the gentleman's permission, I will send to the Clerk's desk the law under which this thing is done.

The Clerk read, as follows:

An act to amend an act entitled "An act requiring foreign regulations of commerce to be laid annually before Congress," approved August 16, 1842, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in addition to the changes and modifications in the commercial systems of other nations, now required by said act, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of State to lay before Congress annually, within sixty days after the commencement of each ordinary session, as a part of said report, all other commercial information communicated to the State Department by consular and diplomatic agents of this Government abroad, or contained in the official publications of other Governments, which he shall deem sufficiently important.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That to enable the Secretary of State to make said report, it is hereby declared to be the duty of consuls and commercial agents of the United States in foreign countries, to procure and transmit to the Department of State authentic commercial information respecting said countries, of such character, and in such manner and form, and at such times, as said Department may, from time to time prescribe; and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of State, in said annual report, to specify the names of any of said officers who may have been remiss in their duty enjoined by this act.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of State be, and is hereby, authorized and required to appoint one clerk, who shall have charge of statistics in said Department, and shall be called "Superintendent of Statistics," and shall receive a salary of two thousand dollars per annum, and shall be allowed as an assistant one clerk of the third class, which clerk the Secretary of State is hereby authorized and required to appoint.

Approved, August 18, 1856.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

Here the committee rose informally; and Mr. MILLSON having taken the chair, in the absence of the Speaker, a message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. JAMES BUCHANAN HENRY, his Private Secretary, informing the House that the President had approved an act for the relief of Duncan Robertson; and, also, that he was directed to deliver to the House of Representatives a message in writing.

The message was accompanied by a vast pile of documents, and caused much laughter.

The committee then resumed its session.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, that must be a very important message which has just been received from the President. I suppose that it must involve the safety and perpetuity of this Union, from the quantity of papers that accompanies it. I move that this committee rise, that it may be read. I want to know what has brought this immense amount of papers here. I want to know if this is the result of the great controversy about Cuba, or if the Mormons are about to invade the Capitol. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina has the floor.

Mr. RUFFIN. I will yield to the gentleman from Tennessee, as I presume I shall have the floor when we go into committee again.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Then I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BURNETT reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly House bill No. 201, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the House, I ask that the message just received from the President be taken up and read.

No objection was made.

The SPEAKER then laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

In compliance with the resolutions of the House of Representatives of 19th January, 1857, and 3d February, 1858, I herewith transmit the report of the Secretary of the Interior, with accompanying documents.

JAMES BUCHANAN.

WASHINGTON, May 3, 1853.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to have those documents read, and let them be put somewhere where the House can see them. [A laugh.]

Mr. CLINGMAN. Let the communication of the Secretary of the Interior be read.

The communication of the Secretary of the Interior was read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF INTERIOR, April 30, 1853.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith copies of the correspondence and documents called for by the resolutions of the House of Representatives of January 19, 1857, and February 3, 1858; also a copy of the letter of the Acting Commissioner of Indian Affairs, transmitting the same to this Department, dated the 28th instant.

With great respect, your obedient servant,

J. THOMPSON, Secretary of Interior.

To the President.

Mr. FAULKNER. I should like to have those resolutions which are referred to in the message read, so that we may know what these documents refer to.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Let us first have the letter of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs read.

The letter was read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS, April 28, 1858.

Sir: In obedience to your direction, I have the honor to transmit herewith copies of correspondence between this office and the superintendents, agents, &c., of the superintendencies of Oregon, Washington, and California, in relation to Indian Affairs, as required by House resolution of January 19, 1857, referred here by your predecessor on the 21st of the same month; also copies of the correspondence between this office and the superintendents, agents, &c., of the superintendencies of Oregon and Washington in relation to Indian Affairs, and those having reference to the official conduct of Anson Dart, late superintendent of Indian Affairs in Oregon, as required by House resolution of February 3, 1858, referred by the House resolution of February 3, 1858, referred here by you, on the 6th of the same month.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
CHARLES E. MIX,

Acting Commissioner.

Hon. J. THOMPSON, Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I believe that this communication is in answer to a resolution offered by myself, and I move that it be laid upon the table, and printed.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object to the printing of a word until it has been read. Just put the papers up on the desk, and let us see them.

Mr. MORGAN. I am told that it required five clerks for nine months merely to copy these papers.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I am informed that it took nine clerks for six months.

Mr. MORGAN. Well, I have my information from headquarters.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I learn, further, that all the information contained in these papers is not worth one hour's labor.

Mr. MORGAN. That is a fact.

The SPEAKER. The communication seems to be in answer to a resolution of the House adopted January 19, 1857.

Mr. FAULKNER. Let it be read.

The SPEAKER. It is not before the Chair.

Mr. LETCHER. The Clerk has the Journal here.

The SPEAKER. It was a resolution of a preceding Congress.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Is it in order to move to lay the whole matter on the table, without printing?

The SPEAKER. There is a motion pending to lay on the table and print, and the gentleman can attain his object by asking for a division of that question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Well, I ask for a division.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Have we a right to have the documents read before we are called to vote on printing?

The SPEAKER. If a majority of the House orders the reading the Chair will have them read.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Can you call upon any of us to vote for or against the printing of those papers before we know what they are?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that on a motion to print, the papers need not be read unless the House orders it.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I do not understand that kind of legislation.

Mr. PHELPS. Let us have the resolution read to which this is a response.

The SPEAKER. It is in response to two resolutions of 19th January, 1857, and 3d February, 1858.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I was under the impression that this communication was in response to a resolution offered by me this session. I find, however, that the bulk of the documents are not in response to that resolution, so that the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MORGAN] do not apply to my resolution. My resolution called for information in reference to the official conduct of Anson Dart. That information is important, and I trust that at least that portion of the documents will be printed.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to inquire whether—

Mr. PHELPS. I desire to have the resolution read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

"January 19, 1857. Mr. Sage, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

"Resolved, That the President be requested to furnish to this House all the correspondence and documents, not incompatible with the public interest, relating to Indian Affairs in the department of the Pacific—those of the Interior as well as those of the War Department."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Would it not be competent to have those documents referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs without being printed? If it becomes necessary that they should be printed—

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that as there is a motion pending to lay on the table, a motion to refer would not be in order.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that motion, and let the matter be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs; a little examination would enable them to know whether any portion of this matter ought to be printed, and how much. I hope the subject will be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I want to make a question of order; and that is, that before we are called to vote on this question, I have a right to have the paper read.

Mr. CRAIG, of North Carolina. It was ruled by the Speaker of last Congress, on that same subject, that it did not require a majority to have a paper read, but that if any single member required the reading of a paper, he had a right to have it read before the vote was taken.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Exactly, sir; and I think that to be the right construction under the rule.

The SPEAKER. That had reference to the report of a committee.

Mr. CRAIG, of North Carolina. It was as to a report of a committee of conference that the construction here referred to was made.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I desire to withdraw my motion to print.

Mr. HALL, of Ohio. I renew it.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I ask the gentleman to withdraw his motion for a moment, and let me submit the motion I speak of. If the gentleman does not withdraw it, I hope it will be voted down.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Let the proposition be put and voted down, and then the gentleman from North Carolina can make his proposition.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Do I understand that the wish of the gentleman is to move to refer these documents to the Committee on Indian Affairs?

Mr. CLINGMAN. It is.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. And then to have the question taken on the motion to print?

Mr. CLINGMAN. Yes.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I have no objection.

Mr. CLINGMAN. The gentleman having withdrawn the motion, I move to refer the message of the President to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. HALL, of Ohio. I renewed the motion to lay on the table and print.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I renew my question of order. The first thing is to have these papers read before the House disposes of them, that we may know how to dispose of them.

The SPEAKER. Is there any objection to the papers being read.

Mr. CLEMENS, Mr. CLINGMAN, and others, objected.

The question was taken, "Shall the papers be read?" and it was decided in the negative.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I did not make the motion to have the papers read, but I asked my right, as a member of the House, that I may vote intelligently, to have these papers read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the question of order raised by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Then I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. GROW. I ask for the reading of the 57th rule.

The rule was read, as follows:

"When the reading of a paper is called for, and the same is objected to by any member, it shall be determined by a vote of the House."

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was taken; and the appeal was laid on the table.

The question recurred on Mr. CLINGMAN's motion.

Mr. HALL, of Ohio. Was my motion not entertained?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not recognize the gentleman from Ohio when he rose.

Mr. HALL, of Ohio. A motion was made by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GREENWOOD] to lay on the table and print. He withdrew that motion, and I immediately renewed it. I ask the Chair whether he entertained my motion?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would have entertained the motion, if he had recognized the gentleman from Ohio. At the time the gentleman from Ohio rose, the Chair was considering the question of order raised by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I am willing that the gentleman's motion may go in, if it does not cut off mine.

The SPEAKER. If the motion to lay on the table be received, the motion to refer cannot be entertained.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Then I hope my motion will be adopted.

Mr. HALL, of Ohio. I inquire of the Chair whether it is in order for me to move to amend the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina by moving to lay on the table and print? If so, I wish to make that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the motion to lay on the table would take precedence of the motion to refer.

Mr. HALL, of Ohio. Then I make the motion that the papers be laid on the table and printed.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois, (in his seat.) I suppose that is for the benefit of the gentleman's colleague, Mr. Steadman.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Is it in order to call for a division of the question?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Then I call for a division.

The SPEAKER stated the first question to be on the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. PHELPS. I desire to know how large those packages of papers are. I suppose the resolution of the last session of Congress was offered by the gentleman from New York on account of the dissensions that had arisen in the Territories of Oregon and Washington, between General Wool and the Governors of those Territories—

Mr. CLEMENS. I object to debate.

Mr. PHELPS. I suppose the resolution was introduced for that purpose—

Mr. CLEMENS. I object to any further debate.

Mr. PENDLETON. This matter refers to claims to the amount of $5,000,000.

Mr. MORGAN. If gentlemen will allow me one moment, I can tell them for what purpose those papers were called for.

Mr. BURNETT. I object to discussion.

Mr. MORGAN. I only want to say one word.

Mr. LETCHER. I hope the gentlemen will be allowed to be heard. I want to know what this is about.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I insist that the gentleman has a right to be heard.

Mr. BURNETT. I have no objection to the gentleman from New York being heard, if the motion to lay on the table be withdrawn. If it be, then the gentleman has a right to be heard; but I am for enforcing the rules of the House so long as we have them.

Mr. HALL, of Ohio. I decline to withdraw my motion.

Mr. GROW. Is there not a motion to print pending?

The SPEAKER. There is; but the Chair thinks the motion to lay on the table takes precedence.

Mr. MORGAN. It is of no sort of consequence to have those papers printed.

The motion to lay the communication and the accompanying papers on the table was then agreed to.

The question recurring on the motion to print, Mr. STEVENSON demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. MORGAN. The gentleman who at the last Congress (Mr. Sage) moved the resolution to which these papers are a response, merely had this object in view—

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I rise to a question of order. I desire to know whether this matter is debatable on a motion to lay on the table?

The SPEAKER. The pending motion is a motion to print; and that is debatable.

Mr. MORGAN. The only object of that gentleman was to get at the correspondence relating to General Wool. A portion of it had been published already, and he desired to have what remained. All this mass of labor which is now presented to us has grown out of his desire in that matter. He had no idea that it would amount to this vast mass of documents, nor had the House any idea of it, or they would never have ordered it.

Mr. RITCHIE. I call the previous question upon the motion to print.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his demand, and allow me a single moment.

Mr. RITCHIE. I will if the gentleman will renew the motion.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I will. There may be something in that mass of documents which is important to the defense of General Wool, or somebody else. Why should gentlemen object to having the documents referred to some committee of the House, if others are of opinion that any portion of this correspondence ought to be published. I would not object to the Committee on Printing, though I suppose the Committee on Indian Affairs is the appropriate committee.

Mr. CRAIG, of North Carolina. I rise to a question of order. It is not in order to discuss the question of reference on a motion to print.

The SPEAKER. The motion to print, it has been decided uniformly, opens the merits of the whole question.

Mr. CLINGMAN. That is very clear; but, in fact, my motion to commit to the Committee on Indian Affairs is pending. The Chair decides that this motion takes precedence of mine. If this motion should fail, of course the House may adopt mine.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The communication and documents have already been laid on the table.

Mr. CLINGMAN. My only object is to have such portions printed as may be necessary to the defense of General Wool or others.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Several gentlemen in this part of the Hall have asked that the bundle of papers might be placed upon the desk, so that the House can see them. I hope it will be done.

Mr. LETCHER. Just to see whether the table will bear them. [Laughter.]

The documents accompanying the message were here placed upon the Clerk's table, making a pile of papers some four feet in height.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Will the gentleman from North Carolina give way for a moment?

Mr. CLINGMAN. I will hear what the gentleman has to say.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I wish merely to say that here is information that has been obtained at a cost to the Government of from ten to twenty thousand dollars. I speak in round numbers. I think it due to the dignity of this House, due to the country, and due to the Departments of the Government, that these papers should be referred, as suggested by the gentleman from North Carolina, to the appropriate committee, in order that they may determine whether any portion of those papers are necessary for our information, for the good of the country, and, therefore, ought to be printed. I am opposed to all this wholesale printing; yet if there is anything in that bundle of papers which is necessary for our information, I am willing to have it published.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I merely wish to say, in conclusion, that I know nothing about the nature of the papers. There is no necessity for printing all of them, and if any portion is to be printed, I prefer that some committee should act upon them first. I will renew the demand for the previous question, as I promised the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I give notice that I shall move to refer the papers to a special committee of ninety-nine. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROW. With power to sit during the recess.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. With the permission of the gentleman from North Carolina, I would say that I understand that this is only a response to that resolution from the Interior Department, and perhaps those from the War and Treasury Departments are yet to come. [Laughter.]

The previous question was then seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The question first recurred on the motion to print.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois, called for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion to print was disagreed to.

Mr. RITCHIE moved to reconsider the vote by which the papers were laid on the table; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. RITCHIE moved to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to print; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. PHELPS moved that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

So the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BURNETT in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the on which the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. RUFFIN] was entitled to the floor.

EXECUTIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL,

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. How much of the time of the gentleman from North Carolina is unexpired?

The CHAIRMAN. Three quarters of an hour.

Mr. RUFFIN. I rise for the purpose of offering an amendment to the pending amendment. I move to strike out in lines one hundred and thirty-eight and one hundred and thirty-nine the words, "draughtsmen and clerks employed on the land maps." Strike out in line one hundred and forty-one, "$25,000," and insert, "$8,440;" and add to the end of the section as follows:

And that the resolution of the 4th of May, A. D. 1848, directing the Clerk to procure a map of the public lands in each State, and directing that said maps be revised and extended after each session of Congress, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

I will state what the amendment is, so that gentlemen may understand it.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I desire that the original amendment may be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The original amendment is to strike out the words, "the draughtsmen and clerks employed on the land maps."

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I now raise the question of order, that the amendment of the gentleman is not in order, because it proposes new legislation.

Mr. RUFFIN. In reply to that, I would state that this was merely a resolution of the House which I propose to repeal; and certainly it is proper in an appropriation bill to repeal a mere resolution of the House—not a law of the land, not a joint resolution of both Houses, but a resolution of the House merely.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be compelled by the rules to sustain the point of order taken by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. RUFFIN. Do I understand the Chair to rule that my amendment is not in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order, as it proposes general legislation.

Mr. RUFFIN. I suppose, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment, without the latter clause, proposing to repeal the resolution would be in order. Therefore, I modify my amendment by striking out that clause. The amendment will then be to strike out in lines one hundred and thirty-eight and one hundred and thirty-nine the words "draughtsmen and clerks employed on the land maps," and in line one hundred and forty-one strike out "$25,000," and insert in lieu thereof "$8,440." The section would then read, "for the compensation of the clerks of committees and temporary clerks in the office of the Clerk of the House of Representatives, $8,440," thereby leaving out entirely the appropriation in regard to the land clerks. That was my object. My object was to bring the matter to the attention of the House, and I supposed it could be done just as well in this way as in any other. There can be no question about the propriety of it. Let the House refuse to make the appropriation, and when the report comes in from the Committee on Public Lands, the House can repeal the law. There can be no difficulty about it then. All the information is before the House. The letter from the Secretary of the Interior, and the letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, were both published in the Globe in the proceedings the other day, and I suppose that all the members of the House have read those letters.

It seems to me that this is one of those expenditures which with great propriety we may lop off; for, as I said before, in the course of the debate before the House, I have not been able to find any necessity for these clerks. The effect of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio, reducing the number of the clerks from nine to five, would be to render the whole matter perfectly useless. The law of the 4th May, 1848, requires that the Clerk of the House of Representatives shall procure a land map of each State, and cause these maps to be revised and extended after each session of Congress.

Now, by the proposition before the House, that number, nine, is reduced to five. They are still required to revise and extend these maps of States, and also to extend their labors to the maps of the Territories. I wish to know from the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands whether it is possible for five men to keep up the work both for the States and Territories? for he will admit that unless the work be kept up to date it is of no benefit to the Committee on Public Lands whatever. I wish to know of the chairman of that committee if nine clerks have not been able to keep up the work of the States, how he expects that five men can keep up these maps for both States and Territories? If nine clerks have been behindhand so many months, how must it be when there are but five clerks to attend to the maps of both States and Territories?

Mr. COBB. As for that, I believe that twenty-five good men would do more actual service here than the whole two hundred and thirty-four of us. As far as my opinion is concerned, I believe I expressed it pretty fully the other day. I stated then that I thought four clerks were enough. Most of these maps have been colored up until several of the States which I could mention have scarcely a white spot on them, and I have been of the opinion all the while, that one draughtsman and two clerks could accomplish the object designed; but the Committee on Public Lands differed with me, and recommended two draughtsmen and three clerks. I am satisfied with the proposition, and if the committee does not report some action in the matter, I will bring before the House a proposition of the terms on which these maps may be kept up, and I believe two men will be able to bring up these matters. But I am clearly of opinion that this work ought to be kept up, either under the Clerk of the House, or under the Secretary of the Interior. I am satisfied of that, but I think that five clerks are more than is necessary.

Mr. RUFFIN. I would like the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands to explain to the House how it is that, according to the letter of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, these nine clerks, who have faithfully done the work of six men, have failed to keep the work up on the maps of the States alone?

Mr. COBB'S reply was not heard by the reporter.

Mr. RUFFIN. That is what the draughtsman says. I suppose they scarcely work at all, from what I have heard.

Mr. McQUEEN. I have had occasion to look into this matter as a member of the Committee on Public Lands, and I go further even than my friend. I believe this whole thing of preparing special maps for the committee to be unnecessary work. I believe it to be an idle expenditure of the public money, without the slightest benefit to the country. This whole thing commenced in 1848, when a simple resolution was passed by the House requiring the Clerk to furnish stained maps to the Committee on Public Lands, to aid them in their examinations. The work was commenced by two clerks, who, it seems, at first answered the purpose designed by the resolution. Afterwards the number was increased to nine clerks.

Mr. COBB. First to four.

Mr. McQUEEN. I may be mistaken about that; but at any rate the number was afterwards increased to nine clerks, appointed by the Clerk of this House, who has no more supervision over the public lands of the country than I have. These nine clerks are entirely exempt from the restraints imposed on those who are employed under the Commissioner of Public Lands, who are enjoined to secrecy, and prevented from furnishing maps and information to speculators and jobbers in the public lands. The salary of these clerks is $2,000; or rather $1,800 each for the clerks, and $2,100 and $2,200 for the draughtsmen. Afterwards, and whilst these nine clerks were still employed, eight or ten extra clerks were employed—for how long a period I do not now remember—but, according to my recollection, there were eighteen clerks employed at $1,800 each, a year. For what? If called upon to answer as an honorable man, I should say to increase the patronage of the Clerk of the House, and for no good to the country.

I know, Mr. Chairman, that it is argued that the Committee on Public Lands are furnished in this way with the information they require much more promptly and reliably than if they were dependent on the General Land Office. I utterly deny the proposition. Sir, I have been a member of the Committee on Public Lands, and have endeavored to discharge my duties upon that committee faithfully; and if I have seen the first reference made to these stained maps by which we have derived one particle of benefit, I do not know it. It is well known that when companies are formed for the purpose of constructing railroads, or of obtaining appropriations of public lands for any purpose, they are formed outside of the Capitol; they come here with their plans laid out to construct a railroad from one point to another, and they pay no regard to lands that may have been granted or disposed of to private individuals or corporations. It is also well known that when information is wanted by the committee, the chairman has only to refer the matter to the Commissioner of Public Lands, who furnishes maps and all the information necessary to show how much land the proposed route will take, and how much of that land has been granted or disposed of. There is no necessity whatever, then, of having stained maps to refer to; because the Commissioner of Public Lands can furnish all the information needed, and furnish it as accurately as these men do.

But there is another great objection to this system, to which I have already alluded. I understand that, by a rule of the General Land Office, all the clerks employed there are enjoined to secrecy, in order that land speculators and land jobbers may not obtain advantage over other citizens of the country. There is thus a restraint upon them, and they are removed, or some other punishment is inflicted, if they make such disclosures. But there is no restriction upon these clerks under the Clerk of the House of Representatives. He can know nothing of it; and these clerks, for aught I know, can furnish land speculators with information which gives them advantages over other citizens; and that is a great objection.

Mr. COBB. I desire to say a word, with the leave of the gentleman. When this resolution was first introduced into the Committee on Public Lands in 1848, I was satisfied that these clerks should be under the control of the Commissioner of Public Lands, and I have been anxious from that time to the present that they should be placed under the control of the Secretary of the Interior—an office which has since been created. These clerks have access to all the records of the Land Office, and there is no restraint at all upon them in relation to any information which they might give. I do not know that any of them have ever given such information, but I am satisfied that if the work is to be kept up at all, it ought to be kept up under the control of the Department as recommended by the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of the General Land Office. That is my opinion.

When the resolution was introduced, in 1848, by Mr. Collamer, then chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, as I explained the other day, there was a Democratic Administration and a Democratic Commissioner of Public Lands, but a Whig House, and we all know that political parties like to keep all the patronage they can within their own power. After awhile the position of parties was reversed, and then the Democrats were just as anxious to keep this patronage in their hands as the Whigs had been. And then, again, after awhile the Republicans got the power here, and they were just as anxious to keep it. But my judgment always has been that these clerks ought to be under the control of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. McQUEEN. I must now claim the floor, for the gentleman is occupying more time than I intended to occupy myself, and I had not quite finished the very little I had to say when he interrupted me.

I am satisfied, Mr. Chairman, that this is a useless expenditure of the public money. I am satisfied that $16,500 a year has been expended upon this work, for some years past, without any value to the country. I venture the assertion, notwithstanding all the arguments I have heard, that, if we were to go into the committee-room of the Committee on Public Lands, and look at these maps, there is not a member on this floor who would vote fifty dollars for them all. Why, sir, you can purchase the best atlas published in this country for twelve or fifteen dollars; and there is not a gentleman here who would give a good atlas for all the maps that have been compiled by these clerks since 1848. I see no benefit to the country from the continuance of this system. I see in it an idle waste of the public money.

Gentlemen talk about small economy. I want to say to gentlemen that most of the abuses which have grown up to great magnitude under this Government, and which have led to the lavish pouring out of the public money from the Treasury, commenced in the most insignificant manner. This system commenced with one or two clerks, and then it went up to nine regular clerks, and nine or ten extra ones; and, if you extend it to the Territories, twenty-five clerks will be required, at a corresponding cost. I can see that this adds to the patronage of the Clerk of this House to the extent of nine officers, at salaries from $1,800 to $2,200 a year. I have seen these clerks, and applicants for their places, crowd round the door of this House when the caucuses have been sitting here for the nomination of Clerk. Hungry seekers after leaves and fishes, I can see very well how they manage to live off the honest earnings of the tax-payers of the country. I can see how injustice may result to our citizens by things which I have mentioned. These clerks are away from this Hall, in the Land Office department; and away, sir, from the control of the Clerk. There they can gather all valuable information that is about, and then they may give it out to land speculators.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I would ask the gentleman whether he has ever heard that any one of those clerks has communicated information outside?

Mr. McQUEEN. I want the gentleman to understand that I make no assertion in the matter. I would vouch for very little which I hear. If there is any place where I hesitate at everything, that place is this. I might be sold out of my boots in making any statement, unless from my own knowledge I was satisfied it was exactly so. I have heard, I will say to the gentleman from Michigan, that such things have been done, but from whom I cannot recollect.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. Has the gentleman ever heard of any specific allegation made against any of these clerks, that information was unlawfully communicated?

Mr. McQUEEN. I have never heard of any prosecution for any such offense. I have never heard any specific allegation. I have heard, but from whom I cannot say, that information has been obtained from these clerks.

Mr. Chairman, I say that unless it can be shown that these clerks, and this expense, are to the advantage of the country, they ought to be done away with. This may be a small matter, but if let alone it will grow, and cause, after a while, a lavish expenditure of the public money. From as small, I have seen appropriations grow up to millions. There are the water-works for this city. First, we were asked for $100,000; and now who is there that does not expect its cost to reach $4,000,000? If this work be extended to the Territories as well as the States, an additional force of clerks will be necessary, and the expense will go on until it reaches hundreds of thousands. Here is the place to stop it. I have no idea of agreeing to lavish expenditures. If I can cut off this expenditure, this useless expenditure of $16,000, I shall be gratified.

When gentlemen talk of the small economy of curtailing patronage, I would remind them that by holding on to this patronage, whether useless or not, we are educating men to come here and live upon the Treasury at the expense of the honest tax-payers throughout the country, and without giving in return the least benefit. They live upon the Treasury, while the people derive no good from the patronage extended to such clerks. It may grow up into a great system, and entirely destroy the rights of labor of the honest citizen. I object to it.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I will, with the permission of the gentleman from North Carolina, say a word. I had no desire to say a word on this question; but being a member of the Committee on Public Lands, I deem it my duty, in the absence of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MONTGOMERY,] to make a remark. The gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. McQUEEN,] my colleague on the committee, has spoken of the extravagant expenditures of the public money. If there is any man in this House more against unnecessary expenditure of the public money than another, that man is myself. Under no circumstances should I vote a dollar out of the Treasury, unless I believed that it was for the public good.

Sir, it has been stated—I think it was stated here in debate the other day—that some of the clerks employed under authority of the Clerk of this House had given information to certain land speculators to the disadvantage of the public service. I should like to know who the clerk is that has unlawfully given this information.

Mr. RUFFIN. I heard no such statement. To whom does the gentleman refer?

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I think that it was stated the other day, or it was, at least, insinuated. It has been again referred to by my honorable friend from South Carolina.

Mr. McQUEEN. The gentleman from Michigan asked me if I heard anything of the sort. I replied that I had made no reference to it as a fact. I had heard something of the sort, but from whom I could not undertake to say. I do not know a single clerk who is involved in this whole matter.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. What I object to is this: that any statement shall be made against clerks in the employ of the Government, without the specific charge stated, and against whom it is made. If any of the clerks have been guilty of an offense, let their names be given, and let the Clerk of this House dismiss them. I know the Clerk of this House well, and I know that if any clerk under his employment had committed an offense of the kind charged, he would at once dismiss him. This much is due to that gentleman.

The gentleman has spoken of the desire of members to get their friends places. I am not troubled in that respect. I do not know a clerk employed there, except one. I have no clerk there, and I am glad to say I have only one or two from my district in any of the Departments at Washington.

Mr. McQUEEN. I have none.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. When gentlemen have come and asked me to get them clerkships, I have advised them, as a friend, against taking positions in the Departments at Washington. I do not know these map clerks; and I am governed, sir, in my advocacy of this measure by no such motive as might be inferred from the remarks of my honorable friend from South Carolina. This question came up before the Committee on Public Lands. It was amply discussed, and a large majority of that committee were in favor of continuing three clerks and two draughtsmen, believing that they would be necessary to carry out the original design. The honorable chairman has that resolution in his charge, ready for presentation to the House at the proper time.

One word more. My friend from South Carolina asked, with an air of triumph, why it is that nine clerks have not kept this work up, and yet, with a reduction to five, it can be kept up, especially when new Territories are coming in, and they have to be mapped under this system? I will answer the gentleman, and once for all. It is well known that the old land States have already been mapped. The lands there have been taken up and mapped. That portion of the work is not to be done again. When the new Territories are being surveyed, when numerous land grants are being asked, these maps are necessary. I have in my drawer, from my colleague on the committee, [Mr. MONTGOMERY,] bills granting lands to the Territories of Kansas and Nebraska. It is necessary to have maps of the land in these new Territories. And when it is all-important that this work should be kept up, now it is that some gentlemen upon this floor, in my judgment a little more penny-wise than pound-foolish, come forward and oppose that which has not been opposed since the resolution was adopted—some six or seven years ago, I believe. Now, sir, I have examined these maps carefully—and I think I am a pretty good judge of work of that kind, for I have the honor of having been a clerk almost all the days of my life. Go to those maps, and you see, at a glance, by the coloring, what lands have been taken up, and what are vacant; and you are saved the trouble and labor of going to the office of the Commissioner of Public Lands, and there obtaining that information from the plats and field-notes, and the entire record. That is one reason why I would have them continued.

The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McQUEEN] says he does not believe that any member has referred to those maps during this session. The gentleman is mistaken. I know he would make no remark which he did not believe to be strictly true, but I myself have had several occasions to examine those maps for obtaining information—information which it would have taken me a long time to obtain in any other manner.

Mr. RUFFIN. I have but a few minutes left, and I must resume.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I desired to say something further in regard to this matter, but I thank the gentleman from North Carolina for yielding me thus much of his time.

Mr. RUFFIN. I have but a very few words to say. Now, sir, as to this thing of trying to make an issue as to whether these clerks have ever given any information improperly, I do not think it is at all before the House. I am astonished that gentlemen should attempt to make such an issue here. My friend from Indiana said the other day that such an imputation was made. Nobody has charged them with doing so, to my knowledge. But it is said that they could give this information, and that these insinuations were taken from the letters of the Secretary of the Interior, and of Commissioner Hendricks, which have been read. It is said that they may do it, and that they are not controlled by the same regulations which govern clerks in the other Departments of the Government. In addressing a letter to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, we asked him whether, in his opinion, these maps were necessary or not? Here is his reply:

"In answer to the first inquiry, I have to state that, in the opinion of this office, the construction of these maps is not necessary, certainly not to this office, in the preparation of answers to calls from the House or committees, our statistics and data being prepared wholly irrespective of those maps, and without reference to or reliance on them."

And he goes on to say:

"I beg leave to add that the present arrangement is one of great inconvenience to us, as we have no control over the clerks employed in this business, and who have free access to books and papers not allowed to any other persons, and consequently without any responsibility in the matter to the department in charge of the land archives and the administration of the public lands for which it is responsible."

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DAVIS] speaks of having bills in his drawer for railroads in Nebraska and Kansas. Now, I ask the gentleman if we have any map of those Territories that we can refer to? We have to act in the dark as regards those Territories, so far as these maps are concerned. The resolution never extended the labor of the clerks to those Territories.

But the gentleman says he will answer my question as to how five men could keep up the work, by saying that the maps for the States are now nearly completed. But I state the fact, and I challenge any member of the committee to deny it, that when we had the chief draughtsman before us, he informed us that the maps of the several States were four or five months behindhand. The day has now been fixed for the adjournment of Congress, and those maps are not completed, and are not likely to be completed this session. Then, I ask, what benefit they can be to this committee? They are not in the committee-room at all; and of what possible benefit can they be to us? I do not see why the Committee on Public Lands—although my colleague on that committee [Mr. COBB] the other day claimed that it was the most important committee of the House—should have ten clerks, when you know it is a difficult matter for the other committees to get one clerk. We have one clerk in our room. We could send him to the Land Office to get this information; but instead of that we must have nine clerks, with enormous salaries paid through the whole year. I do contend that gentlemen here who have pledged themselves before the people in favor of reform, cannot justify themselves in the continuance of these clerks upon any principle of justice, or upon any principle of right to the Government. It seems to me that although this is comparatively a small matter, it is one of those cases in which we should inaugurate a reform; because the House has entire control and jurisdiction over it. Try it one or two years, and if we cannot get along without these clerks, it will be time for Congress to pass a resolution to reinstate them. Congress once got along well enough without them, and it seems to me there is no difficulty in doing it again.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Is it in order to reply to the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not, as general debate is now closed upon the bill.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES obtained the floor.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I propose to move an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is entitled to the floor.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I do not propose to occupy much time, as it is important that we should progress with this bill. Debate having closed, I avail myself of this opportunity to say what I desire to say, as I shall not be able to do so at any other time.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I merely wish to say a word in reply to the gentleman from North Carolina. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to me for that purpose?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I will allow the gentleman to speak, and take it out of my time.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I desire to say but a few words in relation to the question discussed by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. RUFFIN.] I have no sort of interest in the matter whatever, and am entirely willing to concur in the amendment proposed by the Committee on Public Lands. I think it very probable that the reduction of force proposed by that committee may be entirely proper; but, from what I know of the labors of that board of clerks, or bureau, I think it ought not to be entirely abolished.

It is said that it is the object to keep up this system for the purpose of having places for appointees. Now it is a singular fact that the chief of that bureau has been retained under the administration of all parties in this House, so entirely competent and qualified has it been apparent to the Clerks of the House, of all parties, that he has been. And I feel free to say, from ten years' acquaintance with him, that I think he is entitled to as much confidence as any man in this country. I need only state this fact to have a complete answer to the idea that has been advanced, that these offices are retained for the purpose of having places for partisan friends—that if that were so, the Clerk would surely give the best place to one who was of his own political cast of opinion. The reverse has been the case. Under Clerks of all parties, the present head of that bureau has been retained, because all have had confidence in his capacity and usefulness.

One word in regard to an insinuation that has been thrown out that information is communicated by the clerks holding office in connection with this branch of the public service. For my own part I do not object to their giving information to members of this House. I believe that to do so was one of the objects of their appointment. The law created the bureau for the purpose of furnishing a place to which members could resort for information.

Mr. COBB. The resolution says that it was for the use of the Committee on Public Lands, and the House of Representatives.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. It was for that purpose. Any member can apply there and get information which he can get nowhere else in Washington. I have had frequent occasion to apply to them for information, and I have always been able to obtain it at once, and accurately. I might here, also, state a fact which has come to my knowledge. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUITMAN] introduced a resolution some time ago, calling for a large amount and great variety of information in regard to the public lands. It was found impossible by the Commissioner of the General Land Office to furnish that information without taking months for the purpose of its preparation and condensation; but on application to the chief of this bureau, it was obtained and furnished in a few days, and sent to the House. If it had not been for that bureau, it could not have been furnished during the session.

Mr. RUFFIN. Could not the Clerk of the House change the clerks, and leave the head of the bureau unmolested?

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I know about the head of the bureau. I do not know how it is in regard to the other clerks. I have no interest in them. I know the chief, Mr. Parker, and have known him for ten years past. I know that the Clerk of the House would not be inclined to change the clerks, and leave the best place unprovided by the appointment of one of his own friends.

The opinion expressed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office that this bureau is unnecessary, is an opinion which may be taken for what it is worth. The opinion of Mr. Hendricks in regard to anything in his own office is important and reliable; but he is here speaking of something entirely outside of his office, and over which he has no control—a matter of which he can furnish no better opinion than those of any of us here. He is, doubtless, anxious to get the appointment of these clerks under his bureau, as the gentleman from South Carolina has said.

Mr. COBB. Mr. Hendricks may be considered as officious in this matter. His opinion in writing was called out by a resolution of the Committee on Public Lands asking him for it. I never before that heard him express an opinion on the subject.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I have no reflection to make against Mr. Hendricks derogatory to his character, personal or official. As the Commissioner of the Public Lands, I have entire confidence in him. I only say, that on this subject he knows no more than anybody else. He has given his opinion on it, but it is entitled to no more weight than that of anybody else.

Now for the statement that this work is four or five months behindhand. These returns are only made once a quarter, and it is clear that they cannot be up. When the returns come in, the clerks go to work upon them. It is impossible not to be behind. The work, however, is cleared up as fast as it comes in.

I am willing to vote for the amendment proposed by the Committee on Public Lands, but I think that it would be detrimental to the public service, and injurious to the interest of the land States, to have this appropriation stricken out, and this force swept away. I am satisfied of this fact from considerable acquaintance with the matter.

The old States have had their land already worked out by these clerks, and now the work can be carried on by a smaller force. When these clerks were appointed, large arrears were to be brought up. They are all up now, and this is an answer to the gentleman from South Carolina. That reduced force, I think, can do the work that is to be done, and for the resolution of the Committee on Public Lands I am willing to vote; but not for this striking down of the appropriation.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. It is due from me to the Commissioner of the General Land Office to say this: I had a conversation with him on this subject. His objection to these clerks was founded upon the fact that they were not under his control—not that they were not appointed by him. His objection does not arise because he has not their appointment.

Mr. BOYCE. I will ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to yield to me.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BOYCE. Mr. Chairman, I sought the floor some days since, as soon as possible after the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUITMAN] had stated his objections to the bill then before the House, reported from the committee of conference in relation to the admission of Kansas. The high regard I have for that gentleman induces me to treat his dissent upon this occasion from the almost unanimous action of the southern delegations in both Houses, with great respect. The gentleman's objections to the proposed bill were twofold. First, that it was a letting down on the part of the South from the position we had heretofore held upon this subject. Second, that the reference of the land grant proposition to a vote of the people of Kansas, was an infringement of State rights. Even if I were to grant the truth of the first objection, it might not be conclusive; because the question would still be, was the present proposition wise? If that question be answered in the affirmative, as I think it must necessarily be, should we be estopped from taking it because we had previously taken an indefensible position? I think not. If our past position was unwisely taken, instead of clinging to error, we should make haste to put ourselves on the impregnable ground of common sense and truth. But I do not admit that we have changed our ground. What had we been contending for? That Kansas should not be rejected because she had a slave constitution, and that Congress should not intervene and prescribe how that constitution should be framed by the people of Kansas. The bill from the committee concedes both of these positions as claimed by us. The bill, conceding both these propositions, only requires the assent of the people of Kansas to what is confessedly a reasonable proposition in reference to the public domain. We have never contended that Kansas should be admitted with her unjust ordinance operative in regard to the public lands. All of our action upon this subject has been in repudiation of that ordinance. We now say to the people as exactly what we have said all the time—repudiate that ordinance, agree to what is customary and right in regard to the public land, and you are in the Union under the Lecompton constitution; we only vary the mode of obtaining that result. The first objection of the gentleman from Mississippi is, I submit, unfounded.

I proceed now to the second objection. This requires a more extended consideration, and involves a wide range of argumentation on constitutional law, which will furnish, I think, a satisfactory answer to the objection.

The Territorial Legislature of Kansas called a convention to frame a State constitution. This convention framed what is known as the Lecompton constitution, and applied for admission. Whatever vitality this constitution has was derived primarily from the Territorial Legislature. I consider that the Territorial Legislature had no power to originate an authoritative State organization. Certain provisions in the Kansas-Nebraska bill have been supposed to confer this power. The words of the said act bearing on this point are as follows: The Territorial Legislature shall have power over "all rightful subjects of legislation consistent with the Constitution and said act, and the people are left perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject, however, to the Constitution of the United States."

These provisions do not, in my opinion, operate as an enabling act, and do not, therefore, authorize the people of Kansas to set up a State government in subversion of the territorial government. These provisions are to be construed in subordination to the scope and purpose of the Kansas and Nebraska bill. That bill was a bill for a territorial government, and all the powers conferred by it are conferred subject to this idea. That is to say, the Kansas and Nebraska bill confers certain powers of self-government, but they are all to be taken subject to the continuance of the territorial government, and with that view. No power is conferred under that act to displace the territorial government and set up a new government. Further, if the territorial authorities of Kansas could substitute a State government, what was the necessity of the enabling act which was recommended by President Pierce in 1856, and reported from the Committee on Territories to the Senate; and why the enabling act known as the Toombs bill, which passed the Senate, and was sustained in the House by the Democratic party? It would seem, from these facts, that the Executive, the Senate, and nearly one half of the House of Representatives, considered an enabling act necessary; or, in other words, that the Territorial Legislature did not have power to set up a State government absolutely. If the Kansas-Nebraska bill is not an enabling act, it is very evident the Territorial Legislature could not, ex proprio vigore, move conclusively in the matter. The correct doctrine upon this point was announced by Mr. Butler, Attorney General of the United States, in the Arkansas case, when the Territorial Legislature originated proceedings for a State organization—that the inhabitants of a Territory had no right to do any act designed or calculated to subvert or supersede the existing territorial government, without the previous consent of Congress, though they might peaceably assemble and sign a petition, and accompany it with a written constitution, as a part of their petition, for authority to form a State government, provided such measures were in subordination to the territorial government, and in entire subserviency to the power of Congress to adopt or disregard their application. According to these principles, then, the proceedings which have taken place in Kansas in reference to State organization, have not, and cannot of themselves, constitute Kansas a perfect State. She is now only a State potential, not a State imperative, a State that may be, not a State that must be. What Kansas has done amounts to nothing more, in effect, than a petition for admission. It is true Congress can waive objections to the irregularity of the proceedings, and consent to the admission of Kansas. The proceedings may be sufficiently binding upon the people of Kansas, but they are not of complete validity unless assented to by us. Kansas is not, therefore, a State outside of the Union. She is only a Territory asking admission under proceedings for State organization, binding upon her, but not upon us.

It may be said that the people of a Territory have a right to admission as a State into the Union. I admit this to be true to a certain extent; but it is a right which cannot be urged to the injury of the existing States. In the case of Kansas it has been thought the claim for admission was strengthened by the provisions of the treaty acquiring Louisiana, as follows:

"The inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated in the union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States."

But I do not consider the claim of the people of Kansas Territory to admission in any degree strengthened by this treaty, any more than such claim was strengthened by the ordinance of 1787, in reference to the Territories formed north of the Ohio river; because the claim of the people of a Territory to admission, resulting independently of all treaties or ordinances, from the genius of our institutions, is as strong as it can be not to be imperative, but subordinate to the well being of the existing States, according to the judgment of Congress justly exercised. Or, to vary the form of stating this proposition, no treaty or ordinance can compel Congress to admit a State which it considers ought not to be admitted; but no Congress could rightfully refuse to admit a State to whose admission there was no just exception. For example, no Congress could rightfully object to the admission of a slave State simply as such. Under the modifications, then, above stated, a Territory has a right to admission; but this right cannot arise, supposing the case is unexceptionable upon all other grounds, until the Territory has a population equal to the ratio of representation, that is to say, ninety-three thousand four and twenty. The Constitution of the United States authorizes Congress to determine the ratio of representation, with a provision that each State shall have at least one member. When Congress has determined that ratio, it is the same thing, in effect, as if the Constitution had established it, for being done by virtue of the power conferred in the Constitution, it is the same thing as if contained in the Constitution. In other words, the ratio of representation, as determined by Congress, becomes the constitutional ratio of representation. The people of a Territory have no just cause of complaint for non-admission until they possess a population equal to the ratio of representation, for they cannot claim more than equality with the people of the States; in other words, they cannot claim a Representative in the House of Representatives, which is one of the incidents of admission, until their population entitles them to it according to the existing rule. Congress, it is true, may waive the rule, and admit a State with a deficient population; but it is an exercise of power which should be made with great prudence. I have thus far considered the right of a Territory to admission. To complete the view of the subject, it is necessary to regard it in another aspect—the power of Congress in reference to the Territories, and the admission of new States.

From the origin of the Government to the present day, the power of Congress to govern the Territories by some form of territorial government has been universally conceded. It is not necessary, for our present purposes, to inquire as to the source of this power in the Constitution, its existence being a matter of general consent. This doctrine necessarily repudiates what is called squatter sovereignty, and implies that no government ignoring the government established by Congress over the Territories can rightfully be instituted there without the consent of Congress. Upon this point we have the authority of Mr. Calhoun, who said, in the case of Michigan:

"My opinion was, and still is, that the movement of the people of Michigan, in forming for themselves a State constitution, without waiting for the assent of Congress, was revolutionary, as it threw off the authority of the United States over the Territory; and that we were left at liberty to treat the proceedings as revolutionary, and to remand her to her territorial condition, or to waive the irregularity, and to recognize what was done as rightfully done, as our authority alone was concerned."

There is no mode by which a State government can be rightfully instituted in a Territory, except by the precedent assent of Congress, or a subsequent waiver of objection.

As to the power of Congress to admit new States, the Constitution says Congress "may admit" new States. This implies discretion, not an arbitrary, but a sound discretion. There are five distinct grounds, as I conceive, upon which Congress may decline to admit new States:

1. That the constitution is anti-republican, or at war with the Federal Constitution.
2. That the boundaries are not satisfactory.
3. That the right of the General Government to the public lands is disregarded.
4. That the population is not sufficient.
5. That the people of the Territory are unfit for self-government.

In reference to the first ground of rejection, suppose a State should insert a clause in her constitution establishing titles of nobility, or prohibiting the rendition of fugitive slaves: surely Congress might decline to admit her. Again, suppose a State should extend her boundaries over all the Territories, or an undue portion of them: could not Congress reject her application? Or suppose a State confiscates all the public lands within her boundaries: shall she be admitted? Surely not; because the public lands belong to the States for their common benefit, and Congress, as the trustee for the States of these lands, could not, without a gross dereliction of duty, abandon them to the exorbitant demand of an unscrupulous State. Suppose five hundred men apply for admission as a State: shall they be admitted? Certainly not.

Then population is one of the just grounds of rejection. Suppose the people of Utah apply for admission: is Congress obliged to receive them? I think not; and I say this not from their peculiar faith, but from their government being a spiritual despotism, which I think unfits them for the proper administration of the republican form of government.

So much on the principles of constitutional law applicable to the admission of new States. I propose now to make a practical application of these principles to the case of Kansas.

1. Kansas is not a State out of the Union, but a Territory, applying for admission as a State, which may be so admitted by the waiver on the part of Congress of all irregularities, or which may be treated as a Territory by Congress.

2. The population of Kansas being grossly inadequate, in reference to the standard of representation, not being over thirty-five thousand, when it should be ninety-three thousand four hundred and twenty, Kansas cannot claim admission as a right, though Congress might waive the objection.

3. The Lecompton convention, in violation of every consideration of right and usage, laid claim, by the ordinance attached to their constitution, to $29,000,000 worth of the public land in Kansas, when, according to the liberal grants heretofore made by Congress to the new States, they were only entitled to $4,000,000 worth. If this claim had been made by a Free-Soil convention in Kansas, every fair mind at the South would have revolted at it as a stupendous enormity. Does the fact that the convention making it called itself pro-slavery, and was presided over by Calhoun, instead of by Lane, render it less objectionable? I think not. If the public domain in the Territories is to be surrendered, I should, instead of surrendering it to the unjust demands of an inchoate State, infinitely prefer to give it to the survivors of the brave men who, in the wars of the Republic, have defended her rights upon the field of battle. This action of the Lecompton convention has always been utterly repugnant to my sense of what was expedient and just.

Holding these views, I felt no difficulty in acceding to the bill recommended by the committee of conference.

I was willing to waive all irregularities and admit Kansas into the Union, on the condition precedent that the people of Kansas agree to the customary and reasonable propositions submitted to them by Congress in regard to the public lands. If Kansas were a State outside of the Union, I would not consider it consistent with the principles of States rights for Congress thus to appeal to a vote of the people. We could then only refer this question to a convention; but Kansas still being a Territory, we might refer this question to the people.

This is not the first time that Congress has prescribed conditions upon the admission of new States. It has been done repeatedly. Iowa was admitted into the Union on the express condition that she should not interfere with the primary disposal of the public lands, nor levy any tax on them whilst remaining the property of the United States. In the case of Iowa, the propositions of Congress in reference to the public lands were required to be assented to by the people, in their township elections, or by the Legislature in virtue of the power conferred by the constitutional convention. In the case of Michigan, the assent of Congress was given on the condition precedent that she should, by a convention, agree to certain boundaries. In the case of California, her admission was coupled with the express condition that the people of said State, through their Legislature or otherwise, should never interfere with the primary disposal of the public lands, and should do no act whereby the title of the United States to, and right to dispose of, the same should be impaired or questioned. It is worthy of remark, in this connection, that since the State of California has been admitted, the supreme court of that State, in the case of Hicks vs. Bell, (3 California Reports, 219, 227,) have decided that the mines of gold and silver on the public lands are as much the property of the State of California, by virtue of her sovereignty, as are similar mines on the lands of private citizens. The court in this case say:

"In reference to the ownership of the public lands, the United States only occupied the position of any private proprietor, with the exception of an express exemption from State taxation. The mines of gold and silver on the public lands are as much the property of this State, by virtue of her sovereignty, as are silver mines on the lands of private citizens. She has, therefore, solely the right to authorize them to be worked, to pass laws for their regulation, to license miners, and to affix such terms and conditions as she may deem proper to the freedom of their use."

This decision deprives the General Government of almost all valuable interest in the public lands of California, and shows the necessity of a precise understanding of the rights of the Federal Government in the public lands within the limits of a State applying for admission, and the propriety of such understanding being assented to by the new State as a condition precedent to her admission. The neglect of this proper precaution has opened a wide field for controversy between the State of California and the Federal Government, in which the Federal Government is destined necessarily to be worsted.

Alabama was admitted into the Union on the condition of receiving only a certain portion of the public lands, not taxing the residue, and that the navigable waters in the State should always remain public highways, free to the citizens of the United States, without tax or toll.

The State of Arkansas was "admitted into the Union, on the express condition" that the people of said State should never interfere with the primary disposal of the public lands, nor levy a tax on the public lands.

The State of Florida was admitted into the Union "on the express condition" that she should not interfere with the primary disposal of the public lands, nor levy any tax on the public lands.

The State of Illinois was admitted also on condition of not taxing the public lands until five years after they were sold.

Indiana was also admitted on certain conditions in reference to the public lands, one of which was non-taxation of them for five years after they were sold by the United States.

Louisiana was admitted on certain conditions, among others that the Mississippi, and the navigable rivers and waters leading into the same, and the Gulf of Mexico, should be common highways, and free from taxes or tolls.

Mississippi was admitted on condition of relinquishing all claim to the public lands, exempting them from taxation, and that the navigable rivers should be public highways.

Missouri was admitted on condition of non-interference with the primary disposal of the soil, and non-taxation of the public lands, and non-residents not to be taxed higher than residents.

Ohio was admitted on condition of non-taxation of the public lands until after five years from their sale by the General Government.

Texas was admitted on several conditions: the right of the United States to adjust all disputes about boundaries with other Governments; cessation of the public works; retention of the lands by Texas; non-liability of the United States for the debts of Texas; the right to form four new States, with or without slavery as to those lying south of 36° 30'.

Wisconsin was admitted on condition that the State should not interfere with the primary disposal of the public land, nor tax the same, nor tax non-residents higher than residents.

The practice of admitting States with conditions has been pursued for a long period, as we have seen by reference to all the States admitted, from Louisiana down to the present time. Usually the conditions have been prescribed in the enabling acts, sometimes in the act of admission, as a part of the terms of admission. In the case of Michigan they are expressly put as conditions precedent to admission. There is no difference, in principle, between prescribing in advance the conditions on which a State may be admitted, or admitting on conditions afterwards to be performed, or making the conditions precedent to the act of admission; whichever is the most efficacious may be resorted to. The condition precedent is most likely to leave less ground for future controversy, and is therefore the best.

I considered that this bill offered the best attainable solution of the question, so far as the South is concerned. If Kansas accept the propositions we have made in reference to the public land, then she is admitted, and we have carried our point—a barren victory except the moral triumph of admitting a slave State north of 36° 30'.

If she does not accept the proposition, then she remains out of the Union until she has ninety-three thousand four hundred and twenty population. I consider it a matter of great importance; so far as the South is concerned, besides being right in itself, that Territories should not be admitted as States until they have sufficient population; because all of the Territories, unless, possibly, it may be the Territory west of Arkansas, will be free Territories. And if we begin the system of playing off half-settled Territories as States, the North has the game in her own hands; for she has Dacotah, Nebraska, Utah, New Mexico, Washington, Oregon, and future subdivisions of these. She has her hands full of these cards, while we have, at best, but one. I have thus expressed my views upon this question, which I would have done at an earlier hour if I could have gotten the floor.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES, Mr. Chairman, there is nothing here in this bill but appropriations based upon estimates from the Treasury Department, which, it is known, have reduced the expenditures, so far as they could, to the minimum point, in consequence of the financial condition of the country. The expenditures have been reduced to the lowest possible amount that was required to carry on the Government under the law.

This much I say by way of a general remark. I do not intend to occupy the hour to which I am entitled under the rule. I propose to occupy only ten or fifteen minutes. The hour under the rules is allotted for the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to reply to attacks upon items of the bill. So far as the defense of this bill is concerned, I have only to defend it from two attacks, and those upon appropriations in the bill in compliance with existing law. While I should concur most heartily in any proper measure of reform, I do ask the committee deliberately to consider what they are about, and the responsibility which they will assume if they undertake, directly in violation of law, to cut down the appropriations. I will say to the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. McQUEEN,] that while I believe the object he desires to attain is a desirable object, he cannot reach it in this way.

Mr. McQUEEN. I ask the gentleman if a reduction of the appropriation would not virtually repeal the law for all practical purposes?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. That is just the difficulty I wish to draw the gentleman's attention to. It does not do that thing. I am anxious that the committee should, at least, act intelligently upon this subject.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I am making a promiscuous speech, and I would rather finish my remarks.

Mr. HOUSTON. I wish to make a suggestion just at this point, as the gentleman may desire to reply to it. These clerks were employed under a simple resolution of this House; not under an act of Congress, but under a resolve of this body. If this body should determine by another resolve not to continue them, of course they would be disbanded, and that resolve of this body may as well be arrived at and attained by refusing to make the appropriation, as by saying in another resolution that the former resolution is repealed. The truth is, that resolution under which they were employed, does not now exist; it is not now of force, because it was a mere temporary resolution, and these clerks have only been continued in employment because we have made appropriations for continuing them. Now, if we refuse the appropriation we as absolutely repeal the authority under which they are employed, as if we were to pass a resolution saying that they should be no longer continued.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I thought the gentleman was going to ask me a question.

Mr. HOUSTON. I was going to ask a question, but the gentleman said he was speaking promiscuously, and I asked my question promiscuously. [A laugh.] The gentleman can gather it up.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. No, sir, I cannot gather it up. I was not arguing on the merits of the appropriations. The only points made against the appropriations in this bill thus far have been two motions to reduce appropriations—one provided for by a law of Congress and the other by a resolution of this House.

Now, I care not whether these appropriations are reduced or not; but, as I may not again have occasion to refer to it, I do want the committee either to decide that they intend to bring about the work of reform by decreasing the appropriation bills, and thus taking the responsibility of this mode of legislation, or that they will inaugurate a proper system by the introduction into the House of bills and resolutions to repeal existing abuses.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NICHOLS] gave notice that, at a particular stage of the bill, he would move to strike out the appropriation for the purpose of sustaining the bureau of statistics connected with foreign commerce. He announced, however, after making his speech, that he had attained his purpose in bringing the subject before the House and the country, and should not make the motion. There is no occasion for me, therefore, to make any remarks upon that subject.

I wish, however, to call the attention of the committee to this appropriation for land-map clerks. The House of Representatives, in 1848, passed a resolution providing that the Clerk of the House should employ clerks—there was no limitation as to the number—to perform certain work connected with the Committee on Public Lands of this House. Appropriations for that purpose have been made every year from that time down to the present. This system is in accordance with the estimate of the Clerk, based on the recommendation of the Committee on Public Lands. The majority of the committee, I understand, are prepared to report that five clerks are sufficient instead of nine, and it was upon that basis that the Clerk sent his estimate to the Committee of Ways and Means. Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish it to be distinctly understood that I have nothing to say on the subject of abolishing this whole force; but I say again to the gentleman from South Carolina, that if it is attempted to be done in this indirect way the effect will be this: the resolution under which these clerks are employed will still stand, and the Clerk of the House will either have to take the responsibility of disregarding and setting aside an unreppealed resolution of this House, and refusing to have done the work which we have ordered him to have done, or else to continue the work, employ the clerks, and come here at the end of the next fiscal year, and claim at our hands payment for work done under a resolution passed by this House.

If the gentleman should introduce a bill or resolution into the House to repeal the resolution under which these clerks are employed, I should not have a word to say against it. But this appropriation is based upon that resolution, upon the report of the Committee on Public Lands, and the estimate made by the Clerk in the discharge of his duty.

These remarks are general. I make them not so much because I wish to retain this particular appropriation, as because I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. McQUEEN], and the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON], now to this mode of legislation. We are within four weeks of the close of the session. We have got to pass some twelve or fourteen appropriation bills. Gentlemen know how difficult it is to keep a quorum in Committee of the Whole, and the disposition gentlemen have to leave their seats when such measures are pending. If you introduce this mode of legislation, of reforming the abuses and extravagances of the Government by reducing the appropriations rather than by passing bills and resolutions of repeal—I say if you introduce this mode of legislation at this period of the session, there is no telling what it will lead to.

I hope, therefore, that the gentleman from South Carolina will inaugurate a new mode of reforming these things. I believe that the gentleman has run into extravagance, and I am for reform.

Mr. McQUEEN. Does not the gentleman know that my colleague made the motion to attach a repeal of the resolution creating this bureau? Was it not the gentleman that objected, and had it ruled out of order? If I cannot get the repeal, I would like to have this stricken out.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I did not object, though I believed that it was not in order. The objection was made by another gentleman. I hesitated whether I should object or not. I have no objection to reform. I only object to the mode in which it is proposed to be accomplished. If we introduce general legislation into appropriation bills, where is it going to stop?

Mr. GARNETT. Really the remarks which the gentleman is making are interesting to the House. I will ask him whether it is consistent with the rules fastened upon us to attempt to reform the Government by legislation? Nobody can introduce a bill or a resolution looking to reform, but if there be an objection, a suspension of the rule is required, and then only a few days when that can be done. The consequence is, that the very moment you strike at any abuse, some one of the two hundred and thirty and odd members will rise and object, some one who has some friend or is in some way interested in the perpetuation of that abuse. Therefore, it is in the power of a single man—not to stop the wheels of Government, for they always go on—but to stop all practical effort for reform. For years past, the consequence has been, and I appeal to the gentleman to bear me out, the only reform made in the public expenditures has been in the appropriation bills. One of the regulations which determines whether appropriations shall be transferred from one Department to another, was passed in an appropriation bill during Mr. Fillmore's administration when the Democrats had the House, and made an attack upon expenditures under the opposite party. If gentlemen will go back, they will find that for ten or fifteen years past, everything that has been done in the way of reform, has been done in the appropriation bills, where it was not in the power of the minority to prevent action on the measure proposed.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. If the opinion of the House of Representatives be, that the rules should be done away with, in order to commence a wise system of reform, very well; that can easily be done.

Mr. GARNETT. How often is it proper to introduce a resolution?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. It is in order on Monday to move to suspend the rules.

Mr. GARNETT. Two thirds are required to do that.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The gentleman will hear me for a moment. I know that, for some years, there was a vicious habit indulged in here to insert general legislation into appropriation bills; and, when the gentleman from Virginia is a little older here in the House, he will see that, if carried out, his argument would lead to endless mischief. It is the evil of which I have complained, and still complain. The gentleman's argument would bring us again to the evil from which we are escaping. In years gone by, the appropriation bills were loaded with general legislation, against the wish of the Committee of Ways and Means. I will say here, what is due to my predecessors, that, for the last three, six, or ten years, the effort has been made, when that committee has been in the control of the Democratic party, to reform this system, and to keep out general legislation from the appropriation bills.

The evil is this. As the gentleman from Virginia has remarked, the wheels of Government must go on. There is a long list of private claims against the Government. A day is fixed for the adjournment. The day approaches. There is a long list of unfortunate private bills which have been unacted on. Then there is an earnest and strong effort to get business through by crowding all these measures upon the appropriation bills. It is well understood throughout the country. It is said, "get your claim upon the appropriation bill, and it will go through." I know that the effort of the Committee of Ways and Means has been for years to prevent any propositions not germane from being attached to the appropriation bills. They have nearly succeeded in having clean appropriation bills passed. I only follow the path marked out by the experience of my predecessors. They have succeeded in having almost generally adopted that nothing shall go into an appropriation bill unless that which is in accordance with existing law. The Executive Departments find by the laws upon the statute-book that they are required to do certain things. They cannot disregard the law. Suppose one of the Departments is enjoined to employ certain officers. The Department cannot refuse to comply. To enable it to execute the law, it sends an estimate for an appropriation to be passed by Congress. This is what the Department has done here; and yet gentlemen talk about reform. There is the law which demands that a certain thing shall be done, and the appropriation here is to enable the Department to execute the law.

Now the gentleman has suggested a remedy, and I wish to draw the attention of the committee to that subject; for I have no interest in this thing except to carry out the very object the gentleman from Virginia and the gentleman from North Carolina have in view. If you introduce this system of amending appropriation bills whenever this committee, by a majority, wish to pay the reporters—a thing which some gentlemen object to—or wish anything else, you will find that a majority of the Committee of the Whole will put into the appropriation bills, over the head of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and over the head of the chairman of the Committee of the Whole, appropriations for measures which the gentleman and myself would both condemn. The only safe course is to adhere to the law. Reforms must begin at home; reforms must begin with your own body; and if that body tends to corrupt legislation, begin with it. Do not set your own laws at defiance. Do not allow laws to remain upon your statute-books, and then refuse to pay the money required by them. Gentlemen might, upon the same principle, refuse to appropriate money to pay the salaries of the President of the United States and the Cabinet officers. The only safety is in adhering to the law, and when you want to reform, reform in the right way—repeal the law. But if you cannot repeal the law, submit to it as long as it is in force.

I stated that I would not occupy more than ten minutes; I merely rose to make these general remarks, and I certainly have the right to appeal to members, particularly on this side of the House, if they want to adjourn on the first Monday of June, to go to work and pass the appropriation bills; I trust gentlemen will not encourage the system of effecting reforms directly in the teeth of the law, by simply refusing to make appropriations to carry them out. As this debt exists, and the work is ordered to be performed, if you refuse payment, you put the executive officers in the position of either bidding defiance to the law, or of having the work done, and then coming here next year asking for money in a deficiency bill to pay for it. There is no economy in reducing the bill now, if you have to place it next year in a deficiency bill. I will concur with the gentleman from Virginia, as I will with the gentlemen from Alabama and South Carolina, in any measure of reform they will propose which I think will subserve the public good.

The gentleman from Alabama has said that if you refuse to appropriate the money now, it will be a virtual repeal. Does the gentleman mean to say that the Clerk of this House shall refuse to obey the law? There is a resolution of this House enjoining upon the Clerk the performance of certain duties. The Committee on Public Lands have said they want five clerks, instead of nine, to perform that duty. If the House refuses to appropriate the money, do I understand the gentleman from Alabama to say that it is rendered any less the duty of the Clerk to see that this duty is performed, the law still remaining upon the statute-book?

Mr. HOUSTON. Most certainly I say so; and I suppose every other gentleman of the committee will say so. I suppose my friend from Pennsylvania will be of the same opinion when he reflects further upon the subject. This not being a law, is simply kept alive by the appropriations. There is no law which requires this appropriation, or the employment of these clerks. They were employed some years ago by a resolution of this body, and, as a matter of course, it exists only for the time being. It does not continue beyond the session at which it was adopted; and that resolution, as such, is now of no more force than if you had passed forty resolutions rescinding or abrogating it. A resolution was the inception of the practice, and the practice has been kept up by making annual appropriations. Hence the whole thing rests upon the appropriations. There is now no law or resolution which is in force.

A word upon another point. Every gentleman in this House, and especially those who for any length of time have been members of this House, will bear me witness that I have always resisted improper legislation in appropriation bills. But gentlemen of the first ability in this land, gentlemen who have occupied the highest positions in the two Houses of Congress, have contended with great plausibility and power that when you appropriate money in an appropriation bill, you have the right to pass restrictive laws as to its use after it is appropriated. You have the right to accompany the appropriation in an appropriation bill with such legislation as will make its application upon the part of the Departments of the Government faithful and proper. It has not been very unusual to accompany appropriations with legislation. A gentleman who occupied the position of the head of the Committee of Ways and Means with much ability, and who justly won for himself as much distinction as any gentleman who preceded or has succeeded him—I refer to General McKay, of North Carolina—was the author of more reforms connected with the expenditures of this Government than any other statesman who ever lived. And if the gentleman from Pennsylvania will examine the appropriation bills of his day he will find that almost all of those reforms are contained in appropriation bills.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The resolution under which these clerks are employed has been the subject of different constructions, and the question is a matter of construction. If it is the pleasure of this committee that the Clerk of this House shall put upon that resolution the construction contended for by the gentleman from Alabama, I have no complaint to make, but I want the committee to act intelligently upon the subject, and for that reason I will read the resolution:

"Resolved, That there be prepared by the procurement of the Clerk for the use of this House, and the Committee thereof, on Public Lands, a map of public lands in each State, showing the state of the survey, and also what has been sold; and that the same be prepared under the supervision of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and said maps shall be revised and extended after each session of Congress."

Not for any particular Congress, but that they should be revised after each session of Congress.

Mr. McQUEEN. By the permission of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I would say that I doubt that this resolution ever contemplated that the Clerk of the House should employ one clerk. It intended merely that the Clerk of the House should procure maps, &c.—not that he should appoint clerks, not that he should establish a bureau, not that he should have the appointment of one, five, or ten clerks. I doubt very much if ever he had the right to appoint any clerks. He should have gone to the Commissioner of Public Lands and procured the maps.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. On this subject I do not take issue with the gentleman; I only wish to draw the attention of the committee to this mode of effecting general legislation in appropriation bills. Here is a resolution, which was adopted by this House; and under that the Clerk, from that day to this, has employed three, four, six, or nine clerks, to perform the work. If it is the understanding of the House that the resolution was intended to apply to a single session of Congress, all I have to say is, that, at every session of Congress, from that day to this, these clerks have been estimated for, and paid. The estimate was sent by the Clerk of the House to the Committee of Ways and Means, indorsed by the report of the majority of the Committee on Public Lands.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that is all I have to say in regard to this subject. But to return for a moment to the mode in which this thing is proposed to be done. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Housron] has said something about the subject of reform, and I concur with him generally in his views. I believe that Mr. McKay did as much as any living man to reform this Government; and to the extent of my humble abilities I have tried to follow in his footsteps; and I believe that this Administration has done the same thing. If this committee would take up the estimates submitted to the Departments, and see with what industry the pruning knife has been applied to cut down the expenditures of the Government from one end of the country to the other, notwithstanding the cry that many would be brought to ruin by the general suspension of the business of the Government, they would be able to have some appreciation of the earnest desire of the head of each Department of the Government to bring the expenditures down to the lowest possible point consistent with the execution of the laws and the carrying on of the Government. And the Committee of Ways and Means have gone further, and have taken the responsibility of cutting down the estimates.

When I move to take up the fortification bill tomorrow the committee will see that the Committee of Ways and Means have reduced the appropriations from two million to three hundred and fifty thousand dollars; and I hope that that action of the Committee of Ways and Means will be sustained. We have taken the responsibility whenever we could; but we never deemed ourselves at liberty to disregard laws or resolutions when estimates are based upon them.

I believe I have succeeded in making my views fully understood, and I will not detain the committee longer.

Mr. CLAY moved that the committee rise.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Will the gentleman withdraw that motion for a moment? The gentleman from Pennsylvania has yielded me the floor.

Mr. CLAY. The question is, who has the floor? I do not know that the gentleman from Pennsylvania has the right to give the floor to anybody.

The question was taken on Mr. CLAY's motion; and it was agreed to.

So the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BURNETT reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the Union generally, and particularly House bill No. 201, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. KELSEY. I desire to offer the following resolution.

Mr. BURNETT. I object to the resolution, because there is no quorum present. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. KELSEY. I suppose I have a right to offer my resolution, and to move to suspend the rules. It has not been ascertained whether there is a quorum present or not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky makes the question to the Chair that there is no quorum present. The Chair will ascertain whether there is a quorum present or not.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I rise to a personal explanation.

The SPEAKER. There is no quorum present. The question was taken on Mr. BURNETT's motion; and it was agreed to.

And thereupon (at twenty minutes past four o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GREEN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 36) explanatory of an act entitled "An act for the relief of George Chorpennning, jr.," approved March 3, 1857; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. PUGH, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 311) to supply vacancies in certain offices; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BROWN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 310) for the preservation of order, and protection of persons and property in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. BROWN. I desire to say in reference to this bill, that the whole subject of the police of this city has passed from before the District committee, on account of the report made some time ago, and the bill which passed here, but was lost in the House of Representatives. In introducing this bill I do not mean to commit myself to all its provisions; I do not approve of all of them; but I desire to get the committee again in possession of the subject, and hope they may ingraft something on the original stock which may be accepted. With that view, I move the reference of this bill to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS IN PHILADELPHIA.

Mr. BIGLER. The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the joint resolution from the House of Representatives (No. 26) authorizing the arrangement and disposal of public buildings in the city of Philadelphia, have instructed me to report the same back, with a recommendation that it do pass. I desire to say that this resolution is a single section, very important in its character, and I hope the Senate will allow it to pass this morning. It is desirable that it be passed immediately.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

It proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury, the Postmaster General, and the Attorney General, so to arrange the buildings and grounds in the city of Philadelphia, now used or intended to be used for custom-house, post office, or courts, or offices belonging thereto, as shall, in their opinion, be best adapted for either and all of those offices and purposes; with a proviso, that the expense so incurred shall not exceed the sum already appropriated for any or all of those purposes, and such sum as may be received for the sale of any building or ground now used for either of such purposes as shall not be further necessary for public purposes. It also proposes to authorize the President of the United States to sell at private or public sale, as he may deem best, any of the buildings or grounds referred to in the resolution which may not be necessary for public purposes.

Mr. HALE. I move to strike out the words "private or" before "public sale." I am opposed altogether to leaving to the executive officers discretion to sell public buildings and grounds at private sale, particularly after the great clamor that has been made in regard to frauds about the sale of the late military reservations. I do not know whether they are well founded or ill founded, and I do not care; but it is better to shut the door and not leave executive officers to sell lands and buildings at private sale. I move to strike out the words "private or."

Mr. BIGLER. I have not the slightest objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think it would be wise to add another amendment; to insert the words "after fixing a minimum price," so that there shall be no objection whatever. It is said, sometimes, that there is collusion between bidders, and property is sold for much less than it should be. If the Department is first authorized to establish a minimum price, and then dispose of the property at auction, all objections are removed.

Mr. BIGLER. I am perfectly willing to have this resolution in any shape that will protect the public interests. I presume the resolution in its present shape will answer that purpose. It is not at all probable that there will be any sale of property. It is possible, however, that it may be found desirable to sell a portion of the real estate which the Government now owns in Philadelphia, in order to make a better arrangement of the public buildings there. The Senator from Maine thinks the amendment essential. I do not, but I have no objection to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maine, in line fifteen, before the word "at," to insert "after fixing a minimum price," so that it will read "authorized to sell, after fixing a minimum price, at public sale."

Mr. COLLAMER. I would suggest to gentlemen that it has occurred to my mind that the difficulties which seem to have been encountered in relation to these sales are not avoided by either of the amendments which have been suggested. In order to prevent combinations on the one hand, by which public sales go too low, and at the same time to prevent men knowing what others have offered, I consider the true and right practical method would be on the contract system, to advertise for proposals publicly, to receive those proposals by a given day, in writing, so that each bidder should not know what the other has offered. Then let the bids be accepted or rejected altogether, if, in the discretion of the Executive, there is not a fair offer made. That is the way in which contracts are made in many of our Departments, especially in the Post Office Department; and I think it has been found by experience to be the true and right way. I would propose that amendment as a substitute for this proposition; namely, to provide for a sale after advertising for proposals, on the contract system.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator propose that as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Maine?

Mr. COLLAMER. Put it in the alternative—"or by advertising for proposals."

Mr. BIGLER. It might be put in as a proviso.

Mr. COLLAMER. Yes, sir, let the provision for the public sale stand as it now is in the joint resolution, and add a proviso giving a discretion to take the course I have suggested.

Mr. BIGLER. I am willing to make almost any amendment to this resolution to satisfy honorable Senators, although I think it is perfectly right and safe as it is. The sale, if there be one made, is to be for the benefit of the Government buildings in the city of Philadelphia, and for the improvements that will be made there. It is not a sale for the Government. It is not proposed to sell property, the proceeds of which are to go into the Treasury; but the proceeds are to be applied to these buildings and improvements. However, I am perfectly satisfied to take the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, and I am sure these officers are anxious to be relieved from any responsibility or hazard that may be connected with this business.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. There is an objection which has hardly yet been alluded to. Whilst this resolution diverts and gives a privilege in regard to the method of using an appropriation already made, I am under the impression that it makes an additional large appropriation for these objects. The extent of that additional appropriation I do not know, nor is there any explanation given of it.

Mr. COLLAMER. I did not mean to make any remarks in relation to that.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Then I shall call attention to it myself. In the first place, appropriations were made for the erection of a court house, custom-house, and post office, in the city of Philadelphia, which were deemed sufficient. I have no question that the appropriations which were made were deemed amply sufficient at the time; yet there is a provision in this resolution for the sale of property which the Government of the United States now owns—how much of it there may be, we know nothing—and for the conversion of the proceeds of those sales to the same objects for which the original appropriations were made. Now, I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania to give us some idea of the value of the property which is to be thus sold and converted.

Mr. BIGLER. The Government of the United States a few years ago purchased a property for a post office in Philadelphia—the old Bank of Pennsylvania building. In 1854, a law was passed authorizing that purchase, which was made in 1856.

Mr. COLLAMER. Was not the old United States Bank building purchased for a custom-house long before that time?

Mr. BIGLER. Yes, sir. The Government owns the property to which I have referred, and the property on which the United States court buildings are erected, or expected to be erected. The object is not to appropriate an additional sum of money to any one of these objects; but great diversity of opinion exists in Philadelphia as to the proper location of the post office. It has been a subject of controversy. The members of the other House from Philadelphia, after considering the subject during all of the preceding part of the session, agreed to this adjustment: to refer the whole subject to the respective Departments interested, the Treasury Department, the Post Office Department, and the law department, in order to make proper arrangements for these buildings.

Mr. COLLAMER. Is not the old United States Bank building, under the operation of this resolution, subject to be sold?

Mr. BIGLER. The principal point of controversy is whether the custom-house shall remain where it is, or whether it be not better for the convenience of the public to remove the custom-house to the building of the Bank of Pennsylvania, which was purchased for a post office, and place the post office, on Chestnut street, the location of the present custom-house. That is the principal point of controversy. I am free to say that I have not been able to discover the necessity of any sale of property. I cannot understand how such a necessity can arise, unless it may turn out that the amount of ground for the custom-house, as now owned, will be larger than would be necessary for the post office.

Mr. COLLAMER. I would ask the gentleman whether, under this resolution, they would not be authorized to sell the present custom-house, if they thought it advisable? Does he think it gives that authority?

Mr. BIGLER. I think not.

Mr. COLLAMER. If they choose to make this arrangement in such a manner as they think supersedes the necessity of using as a custom-house the old United States marble bank, they may sell it. Does not this authorize that?

Mr. BIGLER. No, sir.

Mr. COLLAMER. I desire to have the joint resolution read again.

Mr. BROWN. It is very evident that we cannot this morning get through with this joint resolution. It is a much larger question than we anticipated when we took it up. I move to postpone its further consideration until to-morrow. We cannot pass a bill here, which evidently involves the doubtful disposition of a million dollars' worth of property, in this sort of way.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

ALEXANDER J. ATOCHA.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I move that the Court of Claims be requested to return to the Senate the papers in the case of Alexander J. Atocha, which were referred to the Court of Claims at a former period of the session.

Mr. SLIDELL. That would require the consideration of the Senate. I object to it now.

Mr. HUNTER. And so do I.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, it will lie over.

RELATIONS WITH PARAGUAY.

Mr. MASON, (during the morning hour.) I ask the Senate to take up for consideration what was the unfinished business a few days ago—the resolution reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations in reference to our affairs with the Government of Paraguay.

The motion was temporarily withdrawn to allow reports to be made.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. If there is nothing pressing before the Senate, I would ask that a bill of considerable public importance be taken up—being the bill amending the act of 1852 in regard to the system of public printing. If objection is made, I will not urge it now; but I believe it will save to the public Treasury about a million dollars a year. Its object is to systematize and reduce to some kind of order our printing laws. I shall be glad if the Senate will take up the bill and consider it. I do not believe it will give rise to debate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia has made a motion to take up a joint resolution, which has precedence. He yielded to the Senator from Arkansas, because he wanted to make a report. Does the Senator from Virginia waive his motion?

Mr. MASON. I am sorry that I cannot yield to the Senator. The joint resolution to which I refer is a measure of great public interest, and has been under discussion; and I must ask for its consideration.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I will of course not press my bill under these circumstances; but I will say that I do not think the Senator from Virginia has the right to the floor until the time comes for the order of business which he moves to be taken up. He cannot hold it whilst reports and petitions are still ready to be presented during the morning hour. That is my impression, but I will not make any point on him.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has no hesitation in saying that the Senator is right, strictly.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I will not persist; I yield to the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia had several times proposed to take it up.

Mr. HARLAN. I hope the Senator from Virginia will allow the bill (S. No. 300) to be taken up and disposed of.

Mr. MASON. I am sorry I cannot, for there are but fifteen minutes remaining before one o'clock. I should be happy to oblige the Senator, but I cannot do it.

Mr. HARLAN. The reason why I desire that bill taken up is, that the lands to which it relates are to go to sale on the 17th of this month, and it is important that the bill should be passed at once.

Mr. MASON. I regret that I cannot yield to the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia to take up the joint resolution to which he has referred.

Mr. CLAY. It seems to me hardly worth while to take that up now. It is within a quarter of an hour of the time when the special order comes up.

Mr. MASON. I hope the Senator will give me that quarter of an hour.

Mr. CLAY. Very well; I will do so.

The motion of Mr. Mason was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. No. 28) for the adjustment of differences with the Republic of Paraguay, the pending question being on the amendment offered by Mr. COLLAMER, to strike out the words, "and use such force."

Mr. MASON. I will only say that if the amendment be adopted it destroys the resolution.

Mr. COLLAMER. I do not regard that amendment as destroying the effect of the resolution; but if so, it should be destroyed.

Mr. MALLORY. The Senator from Virginia tells us that to adopt the amendment would destroy the resolution. Well, sir, if you adopt the amendment, the President will take such measures, under his own responsibility, as in his judgment will attain this end; but he will not be authorized by this resolution, in taking such measures, to use the force of the country to enforce them. I cannot see, therefore, the justice with which he says it would destroy the resolution.

In the face of the fact that we have never apprized Paraguay that we have a quarrel with her at all, that we have never asked her to redress any wrong, and never notified her that we have taken offense, I must repeat that it is departing from the well-established policy of this Government to convey that information to her through the medium of force, in the first instance, particularly when the very document which is presented here, accompanying this resolution, contains a message from the President of Paraguay himself, notifying the American Government that he is ready immediately to make a treaty with them covering all subjects of difference, notifying the agent who went there that he would make it with him, expressing the desire that this Government would send a minister plenipotentiary there for the purpose of making a treaty. Sir, this Government has uniformly dealt with great liberality towards all weaker Powers. It has put up with a great many differences, and has abstained from demanding redress by force until peaceful measures had been tried. But if you resort to this method first with the little province of Paraguay, a little independent Republic, it is a departure from the well-established practice of this Government, and you will defeat the desired end. The end of this body is not merely to obtain redress for the single injury of firing into the Water Witch, but that is all this resolution contemplates. Our object is to participate in the opening trade of Paraguay, with which country Brazil, and France, and England have now commercial treaties. We desire to participate in the benefits of that commerce. If you go to Paraguay with a naval force to demand redress before you have apprized her of her wrong, you may get the redress, but that Government will show no disposition to make a commercial treaty with you on the footing of other nations. It is for this reason, and not to oppose the policy which is indicated here, that I desire that this amendment may pass, and that we may not in this way authorize the President to use force in the first instance, until peaceful measures have been tried.

Mr. MASON. I had hoped the honorable Senator from Florida would not have gone over the same topics we debated when the question was before the Senate heretofore. I hope it will be remembered that the President of the United States, on his responsibility as the Executive in conducting our intercourse with foreign Powers, has recommended, in this instance, because of this unatoned for and wanton aggression on the life of an American citizen by a very remote Power, very difficult to get at, and a very feeble one, that, while he is asking redress, Congress shall authorize him to enforce it by the use of force, if it should become necessary. From the known character of the Government of Paraguay, and from the known character of the man at its head, the so-called President of the Republic, it is apparent that it would be idle to send a functionary there to demand redress, unless he could be empowered to let them understand that if atonement were not made, they would be compelled to yield. I said, therefore, I think with propriety, that, if the amendment be adopted, it will destroy the resolution. In speaking of the Executive, I by no means intend to speak more of the present Executive than of any other; but the Constitution has lodged with the Executive the conduct of our intercourse with foreign nations. It is for Congress to establish the relations, but he conducts the intercourse; and the reason assigned in his message for asking this authority, arising out of a wanton and murderous attack upon a ship, not in the waters of that Republic, yet unatoned for, seems to me to require, at the hands of Congress, that this power should be given. I hope the question will be taken. I do not want to consume time. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SIMMONS. There has been a suggestion of a recent treaty between France and Brazil with this Power, and I wish merely to mention that they went there with just such a force as the President of the United States now asks to make this negotiation. The recent treaty with them was made under precisely the same circumstances that it is now asked we shall negotiate. I hope the President will be authorized to use force.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 21, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Broderick, Chandler, Collamer, Crittenden, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hamlin, Harlan, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, King, Mallory, Seward, Stuart, Trumbull, and Wade—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benjamin, Bigler, Brown, Clay, Dixon, Douglas, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Green, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Mason, Polk, Sebastian, Simmons, Slidell, and Toombs—19.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MASON. I move that the resolution lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

A message was received from the President of the United States by Mr. HENRY, his Secretary, announcing that the President had approved and signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions:

An act to incorporate Gonzaga College, in the city of Washington, and District of Columbia.

An act for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union.

An act to alter the times for holding the circuit and district courts of the United States for the district of Vermont.

An act to incorporate the Benevolent Christian Association, of Washington city.

An act to provide for the issuing, service, and return of original and final process in the circuit and district courts of the United States in certain cases.

A resolution providing for the payment of certain expenses of holding the United States courts in the Territory of Utah.

HUNGARIAN SETTLERS IN IOWA.

Mr. JONES. I hope the Senate will now agree to take up the bill (S. No. 300) for the relief of Hungarians in my State, which my colleague reported yesterday from the Committee on Public Lands, to which there was no objection, except on the part of my friend from Arkansas, who said he only wanted a little while to look into it. The public sales come on in a few days, and these poor people will be deprived of the privilege of entering their lands unless this bill is passed. It is recommended by the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I object to the passage of the bill, unless it is confined to these people. This can be done by a slight amendment in the second section; but, as I now understand it, it is not confined to these people. If that amendment can be made, I shall not object.

Mr. STUART. There will be no objection to that amendment.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill (S. No. 300) for the relief of the Hungarian settlers upon certain tracts of land in Iowa, hitherto reserved from sale by order of the President, dated January 22, 1855.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour has arrived for the consideration of the special order, but if it be the general sense of the Senate, the consideration of this bill will be continued.

Mr. JONES. I ask general consent.

Mr. CLAY. I will give it five minutes. If it creates any debate, I shall insist that it be laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will take it as the sense of the Senate that the bill shall be continued for the present.

The bill was read through.

It extends the right of preemption to the Hungarian settlers on that body of land reserved from sale or location by order of the President of the United States, dated January 22, 1855. All persons so entitled to the right of preemption, who may have gone on the lands and continued to inhabit and improve them, are to hold their claims, not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres to each preemptor, against any other subsequent claims whatever. The claimants under settlement and cultivation, made prior to January 22, 1855, or before the passage of this bill, are to make known their claim, in writing, to the register at Chariton, within three months from the date of publication in the district of notice to the claimants of the privileges granted by the bill, to be given by the Commissioner of the General Land Office; and in all cases proof and payment must be made at the land office within twelve months from the date of publication of the notice.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. The bill, as will be seen by its title, is a bill for the relief of certain Hungarian settlers on certain tracts hitherto reserved by the President from sale; but the second section goes on to say that "all persons"—that does not include Hungarians only—"all persons entitled to the right of preemption to the above described lands by this act, who may have gone on to said lands prior to January 22, 1855"—that they might have done and acquired the right of preemption; but it says also, "or since that time." They may have never acquired it at all.

Mr. STUART. Allow me to suggest to the Senator whether it would not answer his purpose to strike out "persons" and insert "such Hungarians."

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. That is what I desire. I am not disposed to make a contest with these people. They were unfortunate, they have come here, and we have commenced a course of kindness to them, and I am not disposed to take the responsibility of putting an end to it. I wish them to have the land; I really feel in that way towards them; but I am not disposed, under cover of that, to have a preemption law passed which sets aside all the regular preemption laws for the benefit of anybody else. Let us do that which we really design, and not be passing an act which reaches everybody and anybody. I move to strike out the words "all persons," in the first line of the second section, and insert "all such Hungarians." I will further say, in regard to the bill, that it is very peculiar; and whilst I shall vote for it myself, I am not entirely satisfied about the direction it gives.

Mr. JONES. This bill was drawn at the General Land Office with great care, by the Commissioner himself, who understands the case perfectly well, much better than I do, or my colleague, I suppose, or anybody else. It is made to apply to their case alone. The original intention was to give lands to these Hungarians, as lands had been given to the Poles in Illinois, but we have been unable to have the land given to them. They ought to have it for nothing, in my opinion, because of their being exiles from their own country. Being unable to purchase this land, they have been waiting for two or three years, until they could have money to pay for it. They think they have money to pay for it now, and they only ask, like all other settlers on the public lands, to be allowed to pay $1.25 an acre. They are bona fide settlers, and have honestly made improvements on the lands, which are no better than other lands in the State. I think it is a great hardship that they should not be permitted to enter their lands. I think the amendment of my friend from Arkansas is an ungenerous amendment. The captain of the Hungarians who settled on this tract made valuable improvements, but became dissatisfied with the country, sold his improvements to one of his countrymen who came afterwards, and who was not included originally in the list, and went to Texas to reside. Now, by my friend's amendment, the successor of that man will be deprived, I am afraid, of the right to enter by preemption. I believe, however, his neighbors would not interfere with him; and, therefore, rather than see the bill put by, I am willing to agree to the amendment.

Mr. STUART. I do not think the amendment will affect that.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I do not think the opposition is ungenerous; I am willing to give these men the benefit of the preemption laws as far as I am concerned, but I do not think it ought to embrace other people than these Hungarians. The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. BROWN. I have no intention to oppose the bill beyond simply indicating my objection to it. I shall vote against it. I think all these grants of land under the circumstances proposed in the bill originally, and all amendments to secure such grants, are wrong. I have no idea that we ought to invite exiles from all parts of the world, or that when they come we should show them this mark of special favor. I rose simply to indicate my decided, distinct, emphatic opposition to this whole thing, but I shall not detain the Senate.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OREGON BILL.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I move now that the Senate proceed to consider the bill for the admission of Oregon into the Union.

Mr. CLAY. That will require the postponement of the special order, which I hope the Senate will not put aside.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I dislike to antagonize with my friend from Alabama, but I feel it to be my duty to insist on this bill being taken up, as it is the last State admission bill, and I fear if it does not go to the House of Representatives very soon, it will be in danger of being killed. I will say in regard to the fishing bounty bill, that I am ready to take it up at any time, though I confess I have not investigated it, and I shall rely much on the Senator from Alabama, when it shall be taken up, to enlighten me on the merits of the question. I feel bound to insist on my motion to postpone all prior orders for the purpose of taking up the Oregon bill. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GWIN. There is nothing which could induce me to commit an act of discourtesy toward the Senator from Alabama; but I wish the bill for the admission of Oregon to come up, and without intending the slightest disrespect to him, I shall feel it my duty to insist on considering it before every other measure.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I presume no one could deem my motion an act of discourtesy to any Senator. Certainly I would not make the motion if it could be so construed; but we are bound to consult our own sense of public duty in regard to the taking up of measures of public importance.

Mr. CLAY. I should not regard it as any act of discourtesy; I am not so tenacious of my dignity or rights as that; but it would be a great favor to me if the Senate would now take up the special order; for I am laboring under a headache, which will grow worse as the evening passes on. I want to get through with the special order.

Mr. GWIN. I hope the Senator from Illinois will not press this question to-day, as the Senator from Alabama came here prepared to make a speech.

Mr. DOUGLAS. If the Senator from Alabama came for the purpose of making a speech this morning, I will waive it until his speech is finished.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It requires unanimous consent to withdraw the motion, the yeas and nays having been ordered. The Chair hears no objection, however.

FISHING BOUNTIES.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The first special order is the bill (S. No. 10) repealing all laws, or parts of laws, allowing bounties to vessels employed in the bank or other cod fisheries; and that bill is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FOOT. I submit to the Chair whether that is the first special order. I see, by reference to the Calendar, which lies on my table, that the resolution offered by the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. DOOLITTLE,] some time ago, respecting the action of Commodore Paulding, is the oldest special order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair directed the Secretary to put the special orders in their appropriate order on the Calendar, and was informed that this bill was the oldest special order.

Mr. CLAY. It is the oldest special order.

Mr. GWIN. I will state to the Senator from Vermont that the special order which is the oldest, the resolution of the Senator from Wisconsin, was consolidated with the bill of the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MASON.]

Mr. FOOT. The resolution of the honorable Senator from Wisconsin was made the special order on the 14th, and the bill of the Senator from Alabama on the 19th of January. It so stands on the Calendar.

Mr. GWIN. I think on a subsequent day the joint resolution of the Senator from Wisconsin came up before the Pacific railroad bill, and then it was agreed that the joint resolution and the bill reported by the Senator from Virginia, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, should be considered together. I think that order was entered on the Journal at the time, which makes this the first special order. I make the suggestion.

Mr. FOOT. I am not inclined to interpose an objection to the consideration of the bill repealing the act in reference to fishing bounties, as the Senator from Alabama is understood to be prepared on that question this morning; but I have an objection to the displacement of the resolution which has been considered, I admit, in connection with the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations on the same general subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct in supposing that the resolution of the Senator from Wisconsin, in regard to Commodore Paulding, is the oldest special order. The Chair's recollection, however, coincides with that of the Senator from California.

Mr. SLIDELL. I will state to the Senator from Vermont that that order was made at my instance. I do not know whether it appears on the Journal or not; but I suggested that they should be consolidated, and the Senate assented to it at the time.

Mr. FOOT. Then they being consolidated, the question would be whether the resolution, which was first made the special order, or the report of the committee subsequently made, should take precedence and control as to time.

Mr. SLIDELL. That is a question I should not pretend to decide. I should have thought, by the laws of gravitation, the more important matter would have swallowed up the less important, and the medal business would have yielded.

Mr. FOOT. Then the question arises which is the most important matter. But, sir, I will not urge the question at present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the objection is not pressed, the Chair will examine the question between now and to-morrow.

Mr. FOOT. I am not disposed to press it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I trust it will be waived, for the reason that I waived my motion to allow the Senator from Alabama to make his speech. If I had known that he came in prepared to speak, I should not have made my motion, and I waived it only for that purpose.

Mr. CLAY. I am obliged to the Senators from Vermont and Illinois for not pressing their motions to postpone the consideration of this bill. At the same time, however, it is due to the Senator from Illinois to say that, in urging the consideration of this bill, at this time, I do not wish him to understand that I accede to his proposition, that when I have concluded the Oregon bill shall be taken up. I shall urge the consideration of the bill now pending until the Senate come to a final vote upon it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will state very frankly that I did not understand there was any arrangement. I only gave notice that I waived my motion out of courtesy, and that I should renew it when the Senator should get through.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, "the catching of cod is a very momentous concern," said Fisher Ames in the First Congress of the Union; and, sir, this sentiment has been repeated so often, and so emphatically, that many persons, without an examination of the subject, have taken it for granted that "the catching of cod is a very momentous concern." Indeed, considering the peculiar, extraordinary, and exclusive favor with which cod catching has been treated by the Congress of the United States, any one might conclude that the catching of cod is a most momentous concern.

It is my purpose to inquire into the reason why Mr. Ames said, in 1789, that the catching of cod is a most momentous concern, for the purpose of of vindicating him from the suspicion of trifling with the truth, and of alleging what he did not believe, for the sake of achieving some sectional advantage. The dignity, purity, and elevation of his character, forbid the idea that he would have been guilty of any such assertion if he had not really believed it true. A comparison of the relations of cod fishing to the tonnage, commerce, revenue, and seamen of the United States, at that day, will show that he did not speak without warrant of reason, and authority of facts; and a similar comparison of those relations at this day, will show that, however truly it may have been uttered by him, it would be simply ridiculous and absurd, at this time, to say that "the catching of cod is a very momentous concern."

However, sir, before proceeding to exhibit this comparison, I must show the peculiar and extraordinary favor with which this interest has been treated. How much was paid to the fisheries, under the system of allowances, in lieu of drawback to the shippers or exporters of fish, I am not prepared to say; but since 1792, when the system of tonnage allowances was adopted, there have been paid to the cod-fisheries the sum of $12,128,532. They have received, annually, an average sum exceeding two hundred and five thousand dollars. During the last ten years, they have received an annual average sum of $323,046. This large sum has been divided among about fifteen thousand persons, supposing that the fishermen have shared the bounty together with the owners of the fishing vessels, or it has been divided among only about two or, at most, three thousand owners of fishing vessels. Of this sum of $12,128,532, the States of Maine and Massachusetts have received more than eleven twelfths, or $11,295,298, while the other States have received, in the aggregate, but $833,234. Of the two thousand and eighty-eight vessels in the trade last year, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-eight were owned in the States of Maine and Massachusetts; the remaining one hundred and sixty were divided between three States; Connecticut owning one hundred and thirty-four, New Hampshire but twenty-five, and Rhode Island but one. Of the fourteen thousand six hundred and sixteen fishermen reported to be employed in this trade, thirteen thousand four hundred and ninety-six belong to Maine and Massachusetts, and the remaining one thousand one hundred and twenty to three States; Connecticut having nine hundred and thirty-eight, New Hampshire one hundred and seventy-five, and Rhode Island but seven.

Thus, sir, it appears that this is a purely local interest confined to a very small section of the United States, and a small class of the citizens of the United States, found, I may say, within but two States of the Union. Now, considering the small number of persons who have participated in this bounty of the Government, and the large benefit which has been bestowed upon them, it is matter of special wonder that it should have been tolerated so long, and might justly induce the opinion that it had been, in the consideration of Congress, of most momentous concern.

The inducements, or arguments, in favor of the fishing allowances presented by Mr. Ames, Mr. Gerry, and other distinguished advocates of that interest, in 1792, were that it would increase the commerce, the revenue, and the seamen of the United States. Mr. Gerry said, "to support fisheries is to support the revenue;" and he undertook to show "the diminution of revenue in consequence of the failure of the fisheries." Mr. Ames said, "it is an immense fund of wealth," and "will enrich while it will protect the nation." From the exhibition which I shall make of the relative importance of this interest compared with the other interests of the United States at that time, I repeat, these assertions were not without warrant of reason.

The total tonnage of the United States in 1790 was but two hundred and seventy-four thousand three hundred and seventy-seven tons, of which that employed in the cod fisheries was thirty-one thousand eight hundred and forty-two tons; the proportion of the cod-fish tonnage to the other tonnage of the United States being as one to seven, or in other words, the cod-fish tonnage constituting, at that time, one eighth of the entire tonnage of the United States. But how is it at this time? In 1857, the total tonnage of the United States, in round numbers, was, say five millions—for it wanted only fifty-nine thousand of that number—of which that employed in the cod-fisheries was but one hundred and four thousand five hundred and seventy-three tons, the proportion of the cod-fish tonnage to the other tonnage of the United States being as one to forty-seven, or, in other words, constituting but one forty-eighth part of the entire tonnage of the United States. Since 1790 the cod-fish tonnage has increased but three fold, while the other tonnage of the United States has been increased about twenty fold.

So in respect to commerce. Mr. Ames said, in 1789, that, in 1774, previous to the Revolution, the value of exported cod was upwards of a million dollars. If so, at that time it constituted one sixth of the whole commerce of the United States; for the value of the aggregate domestic products of the United States, at that time, was but $6,165,413. In 1804, the total domestic exports of the United States were $41,467,477; of which exported cod made $2,400,000. At that time, the proportion was as one to seventeen and two tenths. In 1857, however, the total domestic exports of the United States were $338,985,065; of which the value of the exported cod was but $570,348; the proportion being about as one to six hundred. The decrease in the value of exported cod, since 1804, has been $1,829,652; while the increase in value of the other domestic exports of the United States has been $297,517,588.

So in respect to revenue. As I have shown before, at first the exports of cod amounted to about one sixth of the total exports of the United States, and, of course, brought in foreign goods in exchange, which furnished, I may say, one sixth of the revenue of the United States. At this day, however, as I shall show after a while, the cod fisheries, instead of adding to, are annually abstracting from the revenue of the United States. Where they put one dollar into the Treasury they draw more than twelve out.

Thus it appears that all the predictions of the value of the cod fisheries as an immense source of wealth made by their advocates, in 1792, have proven false and delusive. At this time they form but a forty-eighth part of the tonnage of the United States, but a six hundredth part of the commerce of the United States, and instead of adding to the revenue, they annually abstract from the revenue nearly three hundred thousand dollars more than they put in. Who then, at this day, considering the cod fisheries in their relation to the commerce, the tonnage, and the revenue of the United States, can say that they are of very momentous concern?

But, sir, it will be urged as it was urged in that day, that the cod fisheries are the nurseries of American seamen. This, too, was urged with some show of reason in 1792, for at that time cod fishermen composed perhaps about one half of the American seamen. We had at that time no other fishery except the whale fishery. We had no fisheries around the coast of Florida, or in the Gulf of Mexico, or on the Pacific coast; no herring, no mackerel fishery, no fishery in the great lakes in the Northwest. We had but little commerce, and not sufficient vessels or seamen even to carry that. Then it was said with apparent reason that the cod fishery is the nursery of seamen; but at this time, as I have shown, the cod fishery bears an unimportant relation to the commerce and tonnage of the United States. At this time, instead of composing nearly half of all the seamen of the United States, it composes not exceeding one thirteenth part, for we have over one hundred and sixty thousand seamen engaged in the mackerel fishery, in the whale fishery, in the merchant service, and in the military marine of the United States; while there are but thirteen thousand employed in the cod fisheries.
